In the evening I went to the Concert de l'Opera. Orchestra of about a hundred, and chorus of ninety,—Litolf conducting. They played a little better than our H. M. A., but not very well. In the slow movements they leave our orchestra very far behind, but in the allegros they don't seem quite at home. The concert began with the Freischütz overture. The opening movement was beautifully played—the allegro regularly butchered. The Hector Berlioz pieces that followed were very interesting. They were three movements from his "Damnation de Faust"—Menuet des Feux-follets, Valse des Sylphes and Marche Hongroise. The Menuet is spirituel and taking, rather than beautiful; but the Valse, for muted violins, now and then some flutes, reeds and horns, with harp obligato, is a gem. It was enthusiastically bissée. The Marche Hongroise is maddening (in a good sense). It is one of the most entraînant things that I know of in music. We next had a Suite for orchestra by Saint-Saëns, conducted by the composer. It is what the newspaper critics call "a thoughtful and musician-like composition" for the legitimate old Mos Haydn orchestra, which had rather a soothing effect after Berlioz, who would make music out of a cart-load of bricks if it came into his head to do so. There are many and great beauties in it, and also much science, the introductory pastorelle, in especial, being at times painfully contrapuntal. But the whole had rather the air of a first-rate exercise than a composition for the concert-room. Somehow these modern Frenchmen, when they write anything in the extreme classical and unsensational way, remind me of a passage in Thackeray referring to Pendennis and Blanche Amory: "O! Phyllis and Corydon! Here are two used up London rakes, walking about country lanes, and imagining themselves in love." ("Je change, peut-être, quelque chose au texte, mais c'est le fond des idées.")

We then had an air from Mozart's "Prise de Jericho" (whatever that may be) sung by Mlle. Revoux. Then followed a fragment for chorus, solo, soprano, and orchestra: "L'exorcisme des Djinns" from the

* This statement is simply a falsehood.—Ed. M. W.

"Salam" Symphonic orientale, by Reyer, conducted by the composer. Very fine and exciting; well sustained and full of fire. Then came the Beethoven Symphony in A. Pretty well played. The orchestras here don't seem to enter into the spirit of Beethoven's later works. The Allegretto was better given than I have ever heard it. Imagine the whole opera house at each pause in the movement and at each stage in the crescendo shouting bravo, as only Frenchmen can shout. When the cello and violas had finished the theme in A minor, Bravo! When the 2nd violins had done, Bravo!! Bravo! When the whole orchestra had repeated the theme, BRAVO!!! Hah! ouh! Hah!!!—When the Theme in A major, for flutes, clarinets, and bassoons with wailing accompaniment for violins, modulated into C major, Ahh—h! Oh! Bravo!—and at every Bravo, old Litolf would wave his baton more ferociously. Then came a most beautiful march for strings and flutes, and a solo and chorus from Gluck's "Alceste," given to perfection. The march was interspersed with "Ah's!" and "Oh's!"—Then came Schumann's "Träumerei" from the Kinder-Scenen, arranged for muted strings, oboe, and horn, wonderfully played. This sort of thing is very much the fashion here; but I think I like it on the piano better. It was bisssé. Then followed a scherzo of Schumann's, which was very pretty and took well. The whole thing wound up with the Hallelujah Chorus—pronounced Alléluia, with a decided french "u,"—"Il reignera, etc.,—sung with great spirit and precision however. I am not sure that I don't prefer the chorus without organ, and sung and played as perfectly as it was last night, to our accustomed style. Every vocal and instrumental part stood out distinctly. The tenors especially were splendidly metallic and strong. FIL.

Music in Boston.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT. (Music Hall, Thursday Afternoon, Dec. 2). Another stormy day, yet another great crowd! The Orchestra was within a man or two of its full number, and in uncommonly good condition—so far as the strings were concerned. The programme was fulfilled as promised in our last. The three selections of Part I. were new to a Boston audience. It was worth the while to make acquaintance with an Overture of so familiar a name as that to Spontini's "La Vestale." Italian by birth and education, making a great figure in the operatic world of Paris and of Berlin, his music to its native facile fluency added the pomp and splendor of the French stage and something of the solidity and depth of German art. The Overture is very short, with a noble, thoughtful opening, out of which springs a subtle, passionate Allegro, that develops full of interest, but ends after the commonplace Italian (Rossini) pattern with empty reiteration of emphasis. It was played with spirit and precision, opening the feast with zest.

The Concert Aria for Bass voice: "Mentre ti lascio," by Mozart, was a good thing for Mr. WHITNEY and for all who heard him. The music is full of turns and phrases so unmistakably Mozart-ish, that you could shut your eyes and fancy Leporello or Don Juan on the stage before you. But it is a noble aria and was nobly sung; there seemed more vitality than usual in the singer's round, rich, heavy tones,—less of a certain hollowiness which has sometimes been the only deduction from the complete satisfaction they came so near to giving. Intelligent conception, quiet dignity of manner, pure and earnest style, marked the entire performance. Of course the orchestral background placed the song in a mellower and richer light, for it was Mozart's. As surely as his singer stands before the instruments, do fascinating little flowers, side thoughts of melody, spring spontaneously from clarinet, bassoon, &c., anticipating, echoing, illustrating whatever he will sing. Exquisite art it all is, yet not a note seems calculated, or put in with laborious purpose. In the couple of smaller pieces, ballads, in Part II., with Mr. LEONHARD's piano accompaniment, the singer was very happy. The new "Romance" by Robert Franz, (dedicated to an amateur in this city, and published here from the original MS.) is a very simple and complete expression of the sad and bodeful mood of Heine's "Ein Reiter durch das Bergthal zieht," which Mr. Whitney sang in English:

A rider through the valley rode,
So sadly calm, so brave:
"Ah! now do I ride to my true love's arms,
Or into the gloomy grave?"
"Twas Echo answer gave:
"The gloomy grave!"
And still he mournfully rides along,
His sighs they do not cease:
"And if I must go to the grave so soon, Ah well! in the grave is peace!"
And Echo murmurs: "Peace!
The grave is peace."
Then from the cheek of the rider man
A glistening teardrop fell:
"And is there no peace but the grave for me,
Then for me in the grave 'tis well."
And hollow rang the knell:
"The grave is well!"

Franz has given it the genuine ballad tone; it sounds like a Volkslied out of mediæval times, a strain that sang itself before there were composers, and yet it is a gem of Art. It suited Mr. Whitney's deep voice well. To lift the sombre spell, it was well followed, through an easy transition of moods, by Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," ending with that glorious setting of the triumphant "Marseillaise," which rang out with electrifying power and clearness.

The chief orchestral novelty, closing the first part, was Schumann's op. 52, which he has called by its three movements: Overture, Scherzo and Finale. He seems to have intended a Symphony, but feeling that he had fallen short of that, to have thrown the fragments into a Suite-like form of less pretension. The structure of the "Overture" is entirely symphonic; its themes interesting, though not perhaps so happily contrasted as might be; and you follow the development with interest, charmed by many a detail, retaining of the whole a somewhat faint and vague impression. But the Scherzo quickly won all to its fine frolic humor; crisp and delicate, possessed with infinite vivacity, but yielding, in the Trio, to a lovely pensive little theme, which makes a charming contrast. Both this and the overture were nicely rendered, with fine mastery of pianissimo at times. The Finale is exciting by its impetus, its vigorous swift rhythm, rather than by striking musical ideas.

Nothing could come more welcome after Schumann (hardly at his best), than Haydn in his happiest mood, in one of the finest and completest products of his genial brain. The Symphony in B flat (No. 8, of the Breitkopf and Härtel series) in each of its four movements more than confirmed the delightful impression which it made last year. The sublime Leonora Overture, No. 3, makes the noblest sort of conclusion to whatever concert. It suffers nothing from the most brilliant thing that can be put before it; and only great things can come after it without much risk. It was in the main, bating some wind passages, remarkably well played, especially the great crescendo of the violins. Mr. Zerrahn's careful rehearsals of the string quartet begin to tell in the performances.

Of this week's Beethoven concert we shall report next time.—The fifth will come Dec. 30th when the bright pianist, Miss ALIDE TOPP, will play, with orchestra, a Fantaisie by Liszt on the themes from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" (Dervish choruc, Turkish march, &c.), and Weber's Polonaise in E, arranged by Liszt. The Symphony will be a new one by Haydn, (in D, No. 5); and there will be three overtures: to Jessonda, by Spohr; Medea, by Cherubini; and Ruy Blas, by Mendelssohn.

LISTEMANN'S QUARTET. (Chickering Hall, Wednesday Afternoon, Dec. 8).—This second concert brought together full twice as many hearers as the first, though by no means so many as such music and such artists should at any time ensure in a community so musical. These were the selections:

Quartet in C major. Op. 76, No. 8.....Haydn.
a) Allegro. b) Poco Adagio cantabile. c) Menuetto.
d) Finale.
Songs a) "Er der Herrlichkeit." b) "Allnächtlich im Träume.".....Schumann.
Miss Ryan.

Trio, in B flat, Op. 97.....Beethoven.

It was indeed refreshing, after so long, to hear the good old Haydn Quartet, the whole of it, with the "God save Kaiser Franz" theme and its ever delightful variations, and with its most genial and elegant quick movements. Why is it that old music-lovers get round with such joy again to Father Haydn? The rendering of the Quartet was in the main quite happy, each individual of the tuneful party giving clear account of himself, yet all with mutual graceful deference.

The great B-flat Trio had PERABO for interpreter, in the pianoforte part. Firm, clear, energetical enough, though rather cold, in the first Allegro, he warmed to the task in the other well known, glorious movements; and, as he was excellently well seconded in the violin part by LISTEMANN, and the cello by HEINDL, the work was received with the same wonder and delight that it always is and always will be when it is played by artists.

Miss RYAN's selections from the songs of Schumann were among the best, and neither of them too familiar. "Er, der Herlichste von Allen," that warm and free outpouring of a girl's idolatry towards her hero and her heart's ideal, and the other: "All night in dreams," so mystical, and sad, and dreamy, were sung with fervor, and in tones of very rich and sweet contralto quality.

Next Wednesday's concert offers a Quartet by Mozart (No. 10, in D), another by Schumann (in F), and a violin solo (Ole Bull's "Grand Bravour Fantaisie," op. 3) by Mr. Listemann.

ERNST PERABO'S FOURTH MATINEE. (Chickering Hall, Friday afternoon, Dec. 10).—A crowd of course, and this the programme:

Overture to "Prometheus," op. 48 [C major]. Beethoven.
[Arranged by E. Pauer.]
Sonata for piano and violoncello, op. 5, No. 2, [G minor] Beethoven.

a) Adagio sostenuto ed espressivo.
Allegro molto più tosto presto.
b) Rondo Allegro.
Suite III. [D minor.] G. F. Haendel.
a) Prelude. b) Fuga. c) Allemanda. d) Courante.
e) Air with variations. f) Presto.
Sonata, op. III. [C minor.] [First time in Boston] Beethoven.

a) Marcato. Allegro con brio ed appassionato. b) Arietta, Adagio.

The "Prometheus" Overture, an early work, and simpler in its structure than the other overtures of Beethoven, was better fitted for a piano arrangement, and was made clear and effective. It is quite Mozartish much of the time, and almost in the vein of the overture to Figaro in the quick theme. In that still earlier work, the fresh and genial Sonata in G minor with violoncello, Mr. Perabo was assisted by Mr. ALEXANDER HEINDL, who grows in favor as a sure, intelligent and tasteful 'cellist. This Sonata was much relished.

The Suite by Handel—not the more familiar one with the "Harmonious Blacksmith" variations—was interesting throughout as a matter of curiosity, though some of its six movements, or pièces, appealed to most musical sympathies much more than others. The first three made the best impression, especially the Prelude and the piquant Fugue, which are full of life and strength. The Allemande is one of the best specimens of its kind.

Mr. Perabo's rendering of the last of the Beethoven Sonatas—so difficult, so strange, so full of power, of fire, of deep and delicate imaginings most logical in their development—was perhaps the crowning success of the whole series. After all that has been said about that Sonata,—to the effect that, because some of those later ones were somewhat unintelligible, this one must be more so—it was gratifying to see the entire audience absorbed and carried away by it. But it is full of the true Beethoven genius, one of the works in which he strikes fire at once, and does not let it go out. The startling, Jove-like, angry chords with which it begins, and the impassioned Allegro which gushes from the rock thus smitten, running so long in octaves, but soon leading through rich fields and curious hiding places of rare flowers of harmony, take instant and strong hold on the imagination.

The second part, the Adagio, well styled "molto semplice cantabile," for it is a singing Arietta, exceedingly simple, out of a sweet, deep, quiet soul, and yet raising mysterious presentiment of wondrous developments which are to come, and which do come with certainty and power in those remarkable variations, in which inexhaustible invention seems to flud play in the mere changing and refining upon rhythmical divisions. Rhythmical outline becomes here as subtly shifting as the play of opaline colors. The divisions are perplexing to the eye to read them in the notes, and many an adventurer who has tried to play them has given up in despair before getting far; yet they are variations in the strictest sense; the theme is never for a moment lost or obscured, though it seems as if new worlds continually opened. The Sonata made its mark. When shall we hear it again?

Mr. Perabo is obliged to postpone the proposed series of Historical concerts; but he will give four additional Matinees, on Fridays as before, beginning Jan. 7. This time, leaving Beethoven (not entirely, we trust), he will take us into other fields—Sonatas of Schubert and of Mozart, selections from Mendelssohn, Schumann, and more recent authors. In the first he will play a Prelude and Fugue by Mendelssohn; a transcription by Liszt of Beethoven's Lied-erkräus; a couple of Studies by Bennett; and Schubert's Sonata in D, op. 53.

New Songs.—"A Serenade," "A Spring Song," "A Nocturne": are the titles of three very simple, chaste and beautiful little songs, (with English and German words), by J. MOSENFELDER, of New York. We quite agree with the opinion of our friend who sends them:

"These are three tender and poetic songs, composed after the best manner of the German Lied writers, and yet full of original suggestion, not of imitated forms or melodies. They are not difficult; the thought in them is clear and wrought out as well through the accompaniment as in the vocal part, so that they possess completeness and unity. The composer is a very thorough musician, and his work throughout bears evidence of his wide technical knowledge and skill. The songs are for mezzo soprano voice and within the reach of musicians of average excellence."

ANNA S. WHITTEN—Did any dream, while listening to her pure song in that Symphony Concert of Thanksgiving week, that we should never hear her more? that the slight remnant of a cold, with which the self-renouncing singer seemed to labor, was the beginning of the end so near? The memory of that concert shall be sacred.

A year ago, on her return from European studies, Miss Whitten made her first public appearance in a Harvard Symphony Concert, singing the great scene from Fidelio, that inspired song of hope and love's holy triumph. She at once took her position as our first soprano, in church and oratorio and all higher kinds of song. There was a spiritual sweetness in her voice, which had been finely cultivated, and the spirit of the fine-strung, conscientious artist, ever earnest striving earnestly for the beautiful and true, was in her. Her song, while it pleased the taste, went to the heart, and gracious influence went with it. Such was the common feeling with those who heard her; for she sang as she was, a refined, a generous, warm-hearted, pure and noble woman. Again in the Harvard concert she did she sing her last; and this time too it was a lofty, spiritual strain: one of those heavenly sad-sweet melodies in which Mozart, in the fullness of his powers, seemed filled with presentiment of death, and yearning for eternal rest;—Pamina's Aria: "Ah! I feel that it hath vanished," and ending "So wird Ruh' im Tode sein!" She had been less true an artist had she sung with perfect ease and freedom then! That was the 17th of November; on the 4th of December she was called away.

Our musical world could hardly have sustained a greater loss. The union of such voice and culture with such character was something to be cherished. No singer here promised so much of the purest kind of service. To Mr. Parker's Vocal Club she was indispensable; the part of the Peri in Schumann's beautiful Cantata, the soprano airs in the Christmas Oratorios, and in the Passion music of Bach, that is to follow;—these and more such noble tasks awaited her. They must be done without her, but may her memory, her spirit inspire others! Personally she made a beautiful impression upon all who became in any way acquainted with her, by the sweetness, the disinterestedness, the goodness of her life and character. Those who knew her intimately, more than confirm all this. She had no jealous rivals, but was beloved by all her sister artists. And this was manifest in those last sad, beautiful services in Mr. Hale's church, where so many met to pay the last silent tribute, and where the hymns, selected by herself, were sung with tearful trembling voices by her friends, the choir her voice led.

CHRISTMAS ORATORIOS. The Handel and Haydn Society announces the Messiah for the evening of Christmas (Sat. the 25th.), and Costa's Naamans for Sunday evening. Miss HOUSTON takes the principal Soprano in both works; Miss PHILLIPS the Contralto; Miss GATES, Soprano in Naamans; Mr. WHITNEY, principal Bass in the Messiah, and Mr. RUDOLPH in Naamans. The Tenors are Mr. W. J. WINDHAM and Mr. PARKER. The chorus will number 600 voices. Mr. PARKER has taken the place of Organist. Mr. ZERNANN of course conducts. The Orchestra will be large and the rehearsals have been many and careful.

MISS ALIDA TOPP. The Farewell Concert of this gifted artist on Saturday evening, Jan. 1, at the Music Hall, is pretty much arranged and will be an occasion of great interest. Miss Topp will play a Scherzo by Chopin, a Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt, something by Schubert and by Raff; Mr. PERABO will play the piano part in the great Septuor of Hummel, Mr. ZERNANN conducting; Mr. LUTTMANN, Mr. WHITNEY, the Basses, and other artists also lend their aid.

FARMINGTON, CONN. Again our friend Klanser sends us programmes (Nos. 41 and 42) of classical chamber music performed before the pupils of Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School. The newly arrived German lady pianist, Miss ANNA MEHLIG, was the interpreter and these the selections:

December 2.

An intelligent auditor writes us:

"Miss Mehlig's technique is superb, her style large (I should like to hear her in a Schumann or Beethoven Concerto), but she plays also the delicate Bluettes of Chopin very tenderly and gracefully. She is a warm-hearted, enthusiastic player, and yet charmingly unaffected. Her powers, both physical and mental, were fully taxed by the execution of these programmes, unaided. Schumann's Carnaval especially is a touch-stone by which to recognize the finer mental faculties of a Pianist; for besides the capricious technical difficulties, their kaleidoscopic pictures require a constant strain of mind, to give distinct individuality to the ever-varying character of each single number (or scene) and yet to keep this side of caricature. Miss M. played well whatever she played, and deserves full recognition as an artist and as a modest young girl, zealous to serve the good cause in art."

TROY, N. Y. (Contributed). The Oratorio of Samson is to be performed here immediately after the Holidays, with a chorus of 150 voices and full orchestra. The Conductor, Mr. T. J. Gay, is our leading organist and musical instructor, who finds time in the midst of his labors to give tone and direction to the musical talent of the city in this way. Last season he produced Judas Maccabeus in a most successful manner.

LOUISVILLE, KY. The Mendelssohn Society, at its sixteenth Rehearsal, Nov. 30, gave the first part of Mendelssohn's St. Paul. This formed the second part of the entertainment; the first was miscellaneous, consisting of: Chorus: "Hail to thee, Liberty," by Rossini; Schubert's Serenade for violin, 'cello, piano and organ; a German song with violin obbligato, by Lachner; Violin solo by Viextemps; and Sextet from Lucia di Lammermoor.

PHILADELPHIA. The Junger Männerchor's concert, given last evening at the Musical Fund Hall, was one of the best musical treats of the season. The Germania Orchestra assisted, and, led by Mr. Hartmann, their playing was much better than it has lately been. The overtures to Oberon and William Tell, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream, the lovely "Andante con moto" from Beethoven's 5th Symphony, and an arrangement from Tannhäuser, constituted the orchestral part of the concert. All were well played, though Mr. Hartmann is disposed to take the tempo rather too slow. The vocal part of the concert was worthy of the old fame of the Junger Männerchor. Gade's song "Die Quelle in der Wüste," is novel in style and very beautiful. A popular song by Silcher, followed for an encore by the favorite "In einem kühlen Grunde," gave great satisfaction. A remarkable work, music by Schubert to Goethe's poem the "Song of the Water Spirit," showed careful and intelligent study, and delighted every hearer. Franz Liszt's "Reiterlied" is a good example of the new school, excessively difficult, with queer modulations, intervals and phrasing, and therefore a test-piece for a musical society. It was admirably sung. The programme of last evening, with its works by Weber, Wagner, Rossini, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Gade and Liszt, was an illustration of the excellent eclectic spirit in which the Society is managed. It is rather to the discredit of Philadelphia taste that but few of those who especially plume themselves on musical knowledge and culture were present at this capital and most enjoyable concert. Still the hall was quite well filled, and with people who thoroughly appreciated the treat presented to them.—Bulletin, Dec. 4.

On Tuesday night at the Academy of Music, the Handel and Haydn Society gave a concert. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," together with a selection from "The Forty-second Psalm," and a chorus and chorale from the oratorio of "Saint Paul." The solo parts by Miss Maria Brainerd, Miss Nellie Luckimbach, and Mr. Jacob Graf.

The second of Mr. Carl Wolfsohn's matinees (the Schubert matinee) on Friday had the following programme:

- Sonata, A minor, op. 145.....Schubert.
Carl Wolfsohn.
Introduction and Elegy.....Ernst.
Mr. Wenzel Kopta.
Song, "Der Wanderer".....Schubert.
Sig. Ettore Barilli.
Impromptu, No. 3, B flat major.....Schubert.
Carl Wolfsohn.
Concerto, D minor.....Bokart.
Mr. Rudolph Hennig.
Fantasia, C major, op. 159.....Schubert.
Messrs. Wolfsohn and Kopta.

LONDON.—The Athenaeum of Nov. 20, says:

Our oratorio societies are all beginning to bestir themselves. The oldest, the Sacred Harmonic Society, is first in the field. The opening performance of Friday next is advertised to be of 'Israel in Egypt' and it will be followed on the 10th of December by 'Deborah.' The National Choral Society is to begin rehearsals on Wednesday next, and the Oratorio Concerts are to be opened on the 8th of December with Handel's 'Dettingen Te Deum,' and 'Acis and Galatea,'—the latter to be given with Mendelssohn's additional accompaniments.

'The Messiah' is to be given this (Saturday) morning at Exeter Hall, with Mlle. Nilsson and the singer who lately appeared with her in the same oratorio.

The Rasmowski Quartet in E minor, the most important piece in last Monday's Popular Concert, showed Mme. Norman Néruda to still greater advantage than the Mendelssohn Quartet of the preceding week. The Adagio in particular, one of the sublime-tones in music, was led with true dignity. Mme. Néruda will, we fancy, do yet ampler justice to her powers when she has conquered a certain over-anxiety which, du reste, is perfectly natural.

Of Mr. Goldschmidt's "Ruth" the same paper reaffirms its first impression (of 1867):

Those of our readers who may be interested to know our opinion of Herr Goldschmidt's oratorio we may refer to the notice (ante, No. 2079) written after the first performance of 'Ruth' at the Hereford Festival in August, 1867. Inspection of the now-published pianoforte score (Lamborn Cook & Co.) confirms the impression made by a first hearing. There is much fairly good, musician-like writing, and from first to last not a careless bar is to be detected. But while the recitatives are needlessly tormented, the choruses, even the most elaborate, are uninteresting, one dull subject giving way to another still more commonplace, and the solos are built on graceless and unoriginal themes. It is a thinkless office to depreciate the hard work of an earnest musician, but we are bound to add that in 'Ruth' there is no indication of the "sacred fire" which, to our thinking, alone justifies the attempt to write an oratorio. Enough of the work, however, for the moment. Our immediate business is with Wednesday's performance in Exeter Hall, the first since that at Hereford. The cast in both was identical. Mme. Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt has, alas! lost the charm of voice that more than twenty years ago crazed the soberest Englishman. Not more than some three or four notes have survived the touch of time's effacing finger, but in the murmur of her most veiled tones we feel the strange thrill that nothing but genius can communicate. Never surely has so much been made of so little. With diminished breath Mme. Goldschmidt contrives to phrase with a broad dignity beyond the reach of singers of our degenerate age, while the gifted lady's devotional fervor lifts the hearer's mind far above the apprehension of any physical shortcomings. In the final song of thanksgiving, all full as it is of unvoiced phrases, she succeeds in shaking the listener's very soul.

A more flattering opinion of the work is given in Novello's Musical Times:

The impression made upon us by the work on a first hearing has been strengthened by a second performance; and although there can be no question that the superabundance of accompanied recitative throughout the composition has a somewhat wearying effect, the excellent and musician-like manner in which the subject is handled, and more especially the refined treatment of the character of Ruth, cannot but be felt and acknowledged by all unprejudiced hearers. The dramatic coloring which Herr Goldschmidt has given to the different scenes into which his work is divided is a point which cannot be too highly praised; and it is especially noticeable that where the action of the Oratorio ceases to take place amongst pastoral surroundings, the character of the music is carefully and thoughtfully in keeping with the altered nature of the narrative. Into the choruses the composer has thrown all his strength; the stirring fugue in "The eyes of the Lord" giving unmistakable proof that he is fully capable of handling his materials with a master-hand. The opening chorus "Sing unto the Lord," is also an excellent instance of good solid harmony; and the voices are, as a rule, treated with praiseworthy tenderness. Amongst the more placid choral pieces, we may select the choral quartet "Blessed are the pure," and the chorus, "Thou shalt eat the labors of thine hands," both of which are melodious and delicately harmonized. The solos scarcely stand out from the work with sufficient prominence to be used as detached pieces; but they are generally in character with the situations in which they occur. Ruth's solo "Whither thou goest," is an excellent example of impassioned declamation; but few of the airs give much scope for the vocalist to create any individual success.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The proprietors of this establishment have paid a compliment to those music lovers who patronize operas out of "the season" by producing some of the very best works during the short Autumn Season, which commenced on the 8th ult. Don Giovanni, Fidelio, Les Huguenots, Le Nozze di Figaro, Robert le Diable, &c., have been the chief attraction, in spite of the occasional light operas which have been sparingly given, as if to feel the musical pulse of the public with reference to future "popular nights." All these works have been excellently cast; but as there has been little novelty, we have only to chronicle, with extreme pleasure, the undoubted success of the undertaking. Mlle. Tietjens, Ilma di Murska, and Sinico, Signori Mongini, Gardoni, and Mr. Santley have been singing their very best; and Signor Antonucci has proved himself a good and reliable bass in some parts fully sufficient to test his powers. Mlle. Ilma di Murska in assuming the character of Ophelia, in M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, has by no means miscalculated her strength. Throughout the opera she sang with exquisite refinement and delicacy; and in the "mad scene" created a genuine effect, notwithstanding that the triumph of her predecessor in the part, Mlle. Nilsson, was fresh in the mind of the audience.

BRESLAU.—Mme. Joachim appeared at the second concert of the Orchestral Union, when the programme included Symphony in C major, Schumann; Air from Theodora, Handel; Overture to Fidelio, Beethoven; Overture to Athalie, Mendelssohn; Secular Cantata, Marcello; and Songs, Schumann and Brahms. On the 2nd inst, the members of the Singacademie gave a performance of Schumann's Paradies und die Peri.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE ODER.—The "Liederkrantz" have announced a performance of Sophocles' Antigone, with Mendelssohn's music, for the benefit of the Mozart Fund.

The Vienna Philharmoniker have put forward much novelty for the eight concerts of their winter season. A symphony in E flat, by Herr Bruch; a fifth suite, by Herr Lachner; "Orpheus," a "sinfonische Dichtung," by the Abbé Liszt; and "Ivan IV.," by Herr Rubinstein, are among the new things.

A statue of Handel by Neuhel has just been placed in the Church of St. Nicholas, Hamburg.

The monument to Cherubini was inaugurated in the Church of Santa Croce, in Florence, on the 3d of October.

BRUNSWICK.—The programme of the first concert given by the Association for Concert-Music, comprised Overture to Euryanthe, Weber; Recitative and Air from La Donna del Lago, Rossini; Suite in Canon Form, Grimm; Songs, Schumann; and the Sinfonia Eroica, Beethoven. The principal work at the Concert for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Ducal Chapel was Spohr's Weihe der Töne. Herr Franz Bendel, pianist, performed Weber's Concertstück as well as several smaller pieces.

DRESDEN.—Second Subscription Concert given by the "Board of General Direction": Overture to Olympia, Spontini; Concertstück for four French Horns, Hühler; Recitative and Air from Iphigenia in Tauris, Gluck (Mlle. Bürde Ney); Violin Concerto, E minor, Grünzmacher; Recitative and Air from Titus, Mozart; and Sinfonia Eroica, Beethoven. Third Subscription Concert: Overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn; Recitative and Air from Coët fan Tulle, Mozart; Pianoforte Concerto, A minor, Schumann (Mad. Heinze); Romance from Zemire and Azor, Spohr; and Fourth Symphony, B flat major, Beethoven. First "Musical Academy"—as a concert is still sometimes entitled in Germany—given by Herr Heitsch and Fitzenhagen: Trio, Op. 70, No. 1, D major, Beethoven; Violin Sonata, Op. 105, A minor, Schumann; and Trio, No. 3, C major, Haydn. It is said that the temporary theatre will be ready by the twelfth of December.

Bach's Passion Music.

[From the German of C. H. BITTER.]

THE ST. JOHN PASSION. (Continued).

... The musical recitation of the Gospel here, in its different persons, is very difficult. Almost more than in the Matthew-Passion the effect of the work as a whole rests on it; it stands more in the foreground. ... Without perfection of delivery, these Recitatives (of the Evangelist and of Christ), which often seem very much extended, lose their effect.

It is much to be regretted that we have no account of the way in which Bach's Passions were executed under the master's own direction, especially in the part of the Evangelist. Yet they required such singers as are not easily found at all times.

C. THE CHORUSES OF THE JEWS.

... We pass from the narrative portion to the choruses of Jews and priests belonging in connection with it. In these we find that dramatic, characteristic impetus, which with larger dimensions and with increased means distinguishes the Matthew choruses in so high a degree. But we also find the majority of these choruses, so far as they do not belong merely to the passing dramatic effect, the momentary situation, treated with a certain breadth, essentially different from the compressed energy of the corresponding choruses in the Matthew Passion.

The first part of the work contains only three choruses, two of which, short in themselves, are set to the same motive, which is repeated twice more in the second part. These are the sentences of the Jews, in which to Christ's repeated question: "Whom seek ye?" they reply: "Jesus of Nazareth!" This answer is set forth in rhythmical declamation and with great firmness, while the first violin, strengthened by the flute, moves in a lively figure over the voices and the orchestra. The catchpoles know and do not deny it, that they seek the Lord. But they are inwardly uneasy. For they are not filled with a sense of the justice of their commission. They bring the betrayer with them.

The other chorus of Jews in the first part: "Art thou not one of His disciples?", with its short, abrupt sentences, and the oft repeated motive traversing all the voice-parts, is a very peculiar creation. Bach felt obliged to perfectly exhaust his theme, which he has treated in the fugue style. The words: "Art thou not" are sung not less than 45 times; the curious, wavering and hasty character of the Jewish crowd is there distinctly represented. Perhaps Bach in the treatment of this sentence wished to lay the groundwork for the counter-effect which he was presently to bring out in the noble and profoundly serious treatment of the words of the Evangelist: "And wept bitterly."

In the second part we find, as we have said, the chorus of the first part: "Jesus of Nazareth" again in the two sentences: "Not this one, but

"Barabbas" and "We have no king but Cæsar." Moreover in the chorus: "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death," we find the upper parts of the orchestra (two flutes and violin in unison) treated in a manner that comes very near to those choruses. Nothing could be more unjust than to suppose that Bach sought in this way to save labor, or to eke out poverty of ideas. His inexhaustible wealth of thoughts and his own conscientiousness in all his works, great and small, insure him once for all against such a presumption, to which his Christmas Oratorio and his Latin Masses might seem still more open. Nor will it do to assume that he sought to bring the character of the popular masses palpably before the listening public through such outward means as we find now-a-days employed in the "Opera of the Future." Bach had no need of such. For the characterization that we find in his works is of a distinct internal sort, and not external. But he never wrought without a purpose, and it seems to us as if he meant, by just this repetition of the same motive in these short, abrupt dramatic sentences, to secure greater unity and firmness of impression to a work exciting such a multitude of alternating feelings.

We find a confirmation of this view in the frequent repetition of the same Chorale melodies in different portions of the work. We find it also in the repetition of the motive in the other people's choruses of the second part. The choruses: "If He were not a malefactor," and "It is not lawful for us," are in motive the same. The chorus: "Hail, King of the Jews" repeats itself later in "Write not the King of the Jews." The chorus: "Crucify Him," appears anew, with change of key, in the chorus: "Away with Him!" ... Everywhere the inner connection of sentences similarly treated is unmistakeable. At all events it is beyond doubt that the recurring motives, in the places where they meet us, are strikingly effective and take deep hold on us dramatically. The chorus: "If He were not a malefactor" is a masterpiece of characteristic treatment. The theme, first entering in the Bass, rising and falling chromatically, and carried freely on through all the parts, speaks to us in its hard, incisive tones like wild, bloodthirsty fanaticism. A diabolical passion speaks out of this web of tones. It increases in intensity at the words: "We would not have delivered Him up." While the howling rage of the people carries on the former theme, the other voices in a wild confusion lash each other to a tempest of excitement, to cry down the conscientious scruples of the governor Pilate, till finally they unite for a strongly marked close on the short and angry repetition, four times, of the word "not."

When the Governor answers them: "Take ye Him and judge Him according to your laws," the same sentence is repeated in abridged form, with a masterly change of thematic treatment. The second motive of the preceding chorus here and there is scarcely heard. The chromatic passages keep the upperhand, while the upper parts of the orchestra assume the character of the short people's sentences. But as if a mortifying sense of their own impotence lay in the words: "It is not lawful for us to put any one to death,"—a suppressed spite against the foreign power that rules in the land,—this sentence moves a fourth lower than the preceding. It expresses a timid yet defiant obstinacy, while the inward roar and fermentation are transferred to the wild movement of the orchestra.

Now the popular fury has clutched its victim. The Lord is clothed with the scarlet mantle and the crown of thorns, and the soldiers mock the patient one. While flutes and oboes storm away in rapid passages, the mocking strain: "Hail, King of the Jews" sounds in a flattering melody that winds through all the voices. Coldly and sneeringly it moves under the polished orchestral figures that wind like snakes about it. So soon as the people and the high priests see the Lord exposed to this derision, so soon as "the voice of pity from the tyrant's throne" has vainly uttered its "Behold the man," the rage of the fanatical mob bursts forth with wildest madness. While from some you hear "Crucify, crucify" in short, quick rhythmic phrases, others cry out the same words with long protracted clamor.

In constant alternation of the meeting voices, and with more and more marvellous thematic treatment, is this self-out bidding chorus carried on, until its involutions in the last bars over the fixed high D of the bass seem like the veritable cross. It is a satanic fury that has seized the people. We shudder as if we felt the breath of Hell upon us from this wild whirl of harmonies.

And Pilate says to the excited multitude: "Take ye Him and crucify Him, for I find no fault in Him."

But that was not what the high priests and scribes desired. Not through themselves would they have Christ put to death. It must be done by the highest power in the land, that they may say a malefactor has been executed in the regular course of law. And so they come, law book in hand, before the governor. Firm and sure, with suppressed passion, they point out his duty: "We have a law, and by our law He ought to die, because He made himself the Son of God." In a fugued setting theme and countertheme are first taken up by the bass and carried through in the strictest style. The arrogant defiance of the Jewish priesthood, the reproachful assurance with which they meet the governor, are expressed in a masterly manner. Only toward the close the passion breaks forth anew in long-drawn tones of the upper voices, while the strongly outlined bass takes up the fugue again; and so the chorus ends with more and more importunate demand.

The governor, in his better feeling, considers how he may set Jesus free. But the sanctimonious mob of priests have other means in readiness. Falling back upon the character of unflinching loyalty to law, they argue that, if Pilate should release the man who has set himself up for King, he would be no true friend of Cæsar.

in the severe tone of the preceding chorus, and in similar fugued style, the scribes lay it before the governor that he must put Jesus to death. These two choruses, inwardly and outwardly belonging together, are masterworks of characterization. Bach employs the strictest counterpoint as the true means to his end. But it is not through the forms that he produces the effect. It is the melody of the themes treated, which, springing forth at one cast with the form, transports us, from the first moment of its entrance, into the midst of the situation. We see those Pharisees and hypocrites, rapping upon their written law, the other hand upon their breast, hiding their falsehood and their malice deeply in themselves, advance with firm step before the seat of judgment, and, backed by the tumultuous and goaded multitude, bring forward proofs for form's sake, which is all they care about. And the Jews outside scream out again: "Away with Him!" and, after a short, powerfully marked introduction, the "Crucify" of the preceding chorus resounds anew.

The demand of the popular voice is now fulfilled. The Lord is nailed upon the cross. The governor has affixed to it a scroll: "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews." But the priests, who understand their business, and who do not mean to let the wavering and terrified Pilate go out of their hands, require him to write that "He has said" He is the King of the Jews. Here we find again employed the earlier chorus sung in mockery of Christ: "Hail, King," &c.

... The soldiers divide the garments of Jesus. But for the seamless coat they draw lots: "Let us not rend it." An animated theme, whose synopated passages convey the idea of rending asunder,—while the shaking of the lots in a helmet is depicted in an upward figure, and the words: "whose it shall be" are firmly marked,—is carried through in fugue style with brilliant treatment of all the parts. Here it is no longer fierce religious zeal, bloody bigotry, that speaks to us; we have to do with something quite objective. The roaring flood no longer thunders on unbridled. Wrath is satisfied; the victim falls. The simple course of the serious action with this chorus draws towards the end.

In all these choruses we find the firm, characteristic delineation, so peculiar to Bach, combined with lively dramatic effect. The form is a perfect one. The unity of conception is carried up to a rare pitch. We often hear it said that these choruses, especially the "Crucify," fall short of those in the Matthew Passion; this may be partly owing to one's individual conception, but partly also to the less effective treatment of the Gospel text as a libretto. Here are wanting just those effective antitheses, which there stand out in the ideal congregation. At all events, as we before have intimated, Bach from the standpoint of the St. John Passion has taken a step forward in the Passion according to St. Matthew.

Giulia Grisi.

(From the Orchestra.)

On Thursday died in Berlin Giulia Grisi, la Diva, the greatest artist of the operatic stage which modern times have brought forth. So much tenderness in the public breast clings to those who have done well in the cause of art, that the death of a great worker arouses a feeling of universal sorrow, howsoever removed from active life the artist may have been. Grisi in retirement was nothing to the nation but a memory: she had finished her work, her old power was departed, she had essayed to retain her sway and had failed: in short she had been, no longer was. Still, she lived. She was one of us; could sympathize in the doings of the world, and was a link that bound us to "the brave days of old." When therefore on Monday the news reached this country of the irrevocable end of the Queen of Song—the retirement beyond recall—public regret took general expression. "Poor Grisi!" And then old opera-goers waxed garrulous of the great times when the one unrivalled quartet held the world in admiration—Rubini, Tamburini, Grisi, Lablache. Rubini and Lablache are dead, and now Grisi: Tamburini survives, an old man. To mention Grisi was to call up a splendid succession of triumphs ranging from 1834 to 1846—a period which is "history" for the younger generation. No wonder then that the news of her death smote all who recollect her in her prime as the severance of a link of association with the past.

Giulia Grisi was born at Milan in 1810; at her death therefore she was in her sixtieth year. Her father was an officer of engineers in the army of Napoleon I., and her aunt, the once celebrated singer Josephine Grassini. Educated in a convent, she was induced to leave that and take to the stage upon learning of the success of her elder sister Giudetta in the lyric profession. At first her capacities seemed wanting. Her health was delicate, her voice unformed and prone to hoarseness; but she was stubborn and enthusiastic, and succeeded in overcoming her parents' scruples. In the arguments which she urged for permission to become a singer, she was backed by her sister. "Giulia," said Giudetta, "will outshine us all." She made her debut in a contralto part—that of Emma in Rossini's "Zelmira"—in the town of Bologna. An account says that at this time her voice, though resonant and singularly pure, was low in register, having indeed but lately got clear of a hoarseness which had affected the organ during the years of childhood. The sisters sang together at Florence in Bellini's opera "I Capuletti ed i Montecchi"—the elder as Romeo, the younger as Juliet. Afterwards, at Milan, her birthplace, Giulia Grisi met and took as her model the great Pasta, to whose Norma she was the Adalgisa, both parts having been written by Bellini for the pair. Pasta, it is said, prophesied the young singer's splendid career, and with pardonable egotism named her as worthy to be her successor. "Tu sarni Pasta!" she exclaimed approvingly. Grisi herself sighed to play Norma, and expressed her longing to Bellini. "Wait twenty years," returned the composer. "I shall not wait ten," answered the Adalgisa. Her rise, which was in a large measure due to Rossini, who may be said to have made her, was precipitated by a quarrel with her manager, and the evasion of Giulia to France. At that time Rossini was part-director of the Salle Favart, and to him Mme. Grassini, her aunt, gave Giulia an introduction. Her debut in Paris took place in 1832; the part was Semiramide. That year her sister Giudetta was singing in London at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket—her last year of her public life; though she lived eight years longer before premature death cut short a promising career. In 1832 Giulia came out as Anna Bolena to Tamburini's King Henry; two years later she was engaged for London. It was as Ninetta in "La Gazza Ladra," the cast including Rubini, Zucchi, Tamburini, and Miss Bartolozzi, afterwards Mme. Vestris, that Giulia Grisi first appeared before a London audience, this great musical event occurring on Tuesday, the 8th of April, 1834. She instantly took firm hold of the affections of her English hearers; and for seven and twenty years she retained it. Every part which she assumed after her first appearance steadily increased her reputation, which may be said to have been established by her impersonation of the Queen in "Semiramide," and of Donna Anna in "Don Giovanni." From her first appearance in this country till 1861, with one exception, namely in 1842, Mme. Grisi did not miss a single operatic season. Her first season in London already gave earnest of the triumphs to come. She was the Desdemona to Mmo. Pasta's Otello; and she played Donna Anna in "Don Giovanni," when Mme. Caradori was the Zerlina. All these achievements of unqualified success were in the first month of her engagement; and in May she increased the list by her performance of Elvira in "La Donna del Lago," and Rosina in "Il Barbiere." Two more Rossinian triumphs followed in June, when she appeared first as Semiramide, and then as Palmira in "L'Assedio di Corinto," an opera which was then quite new in England. She concluded her brilliant first season at the Haymarket Opera House with the performance, on her benefit night, July 10th, of Amina in "La Sonnambula." From Norma to Amina; from Donna Anna to Ninetta; what artist ever filled so ample a range?

1835. Her career now became a succession of new triumphs, the order of which is given in a contemporary record of her public life. In 1836 she added only one new part to her repertory, that, namely, of Amelia in Mercadante's opera, "I Briganti," played for the first time in England. The season of 1837 was rendered specially memorable by the death of William the Fourth, and the consequent closing of "the King's Theatre," on the evening of Tuesday, the 20th of June. The house re-opened under its new name, "Her Majesty's Theatre," and Queen Victoria made her first visit as the Sovereign, on the 18th of July, when the "Idogonda" of Marliana was produced, Mme. Grisi representing the heroine. Signor Costa's opera, "Mulek Adel," was first played in this season, Mme. Grisi being the Mathilde, and the cast including also the débütante Mme. Albertazzi, Ivanoff, Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache. In this same year of 1837, Mme. Grisi added likewise to her list of triumphs the performance of Carolina in Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto." Her new characters in 1838 were Parisina, in Donizetti's opera of that name; Susanna, in Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro;" and Mrs. Ford in Balfe's "Falstaff." In the course of that season Mme. Persiani first appeared in England. The following year gave Mme. Grisi only one new part, but it was one that has done more to enhance her reputation than almost any other. On the occasion of her benefit, on the 6th of June, 1839, Donizetti's opera of "Lucrezia Borgia" was played for the first time in England, Mme. Grisi, of course, being the Lucrezia, and Signor Mario making his first appearance before an English audience as Gennaro. Among the other events of the season may be noted the debut in this country of Mme. Viardot, as Desdemona; and the first appearance of Mlle. Ernesta Grisi, who played the contralto part of Smeaton to the Anna Bolena of her cousin. In the season of 1840 the great prima donna played for the first time Lisetta in "Il Matrimonio Segreto," and Eloisa, on the production of Mercadante's "Il Giuramento." In 1841 Mme. Grisi undertook two new characters in operas, both played for the first time in England, and both by Donizetti—Fausta and Roberto Devereux. During the whole of the next season Mme. Grisi did not appear. The year 1843 is noticeable in operatic annals for the production of "Don Pasquale," which aptly quartet was composed by Donizetti for Grisi, Mario, Fornasari, and Lablache, and which, with the substitution of Tamburini for Fornasari, continued to amuse and delight audiences for long after. Towards the close of the season Mme. Grisi appeared as the heroine of the "Cenerentola." In 1844 her new roles were Isabella in Signor Costa's "Don Carlos" and Delizia in Ricci's "Corada d'Altamura," both operas being new. Her only part in 1845 was Imogene in Bellini's "Il Pirata;" in 1846, Griselda in Verdi's "I Lombardi." Mme. Grisi's connection with Italian Opera at Her Majesty's Theatre was then finally closed; and in 1847 she became a principal support of the Royal Italian Opera at the New Covent-garden Theatre, Mlle. Albani making her debut at the new house, and thus strengthening the opposition to her Majesty's Theatre, which seemed to take a new lease of hope in the Jenny Lind furore. Mme. Grisi's only new part in 1847 was Lucrezia, in Verdi's "I Due Foscari." In 1848 she played, for the first time, Leonora, in Donizetti's "Favorita." Meyerbeer's splendid work, "Les Huguenots," was produced for the first time on the occasion of the Queen's State visit in 1848, Mme. Viardot being the Valentine. In the following year Mme. Grisi assumed the part, and in 1850 she appeared for the first time as Alice, in the same composer's "Robert le Diable." In 1851 her new character was Pamina, in "Il Flauto Magico."

Her assumption of Fides ("Le Prophète") in the place of Graziani, over the possession of whom the two managers were waging desperate law, may be said to have crowned the edifice of her fame. This was in the London season of 1852. Two years later she bade farewell to the stage.* Her reputation would have been unimpaired had she kept to that intention; but unluckily she returned to say farewell over and over again. Fifty-six saw her singing; fifty-eight, fifty-nine, sixty came; in sixty-one she was still saying farewell. The affection of the English public for an old favorite is generous and tolerant; but in 1861 it was apparent even to the most indulgent of her admirers that Grisi ought to have retired. At last, when she made yet another effort in 1866 to resume her sway, public patience gave way, and the great Grisi was absolutely hissed! The lesson must have been a humiliating one: at all events she took it to heart. She finally passed from public life.

essed on the hearts of her auditory is analyzed and solved by a contemporary with judicious accuracy. "It was a combination," says the Pull Mall Gazette, "of personal and physical gifts that no other artist ever possessed in an equal degree. Pasta was more sublime at moments, Persiani was more ineffectual(?) and refined in her vocalization, Malibran was more startling in her impulses. Viardot more intensely dramatic, Jenny Lind more sensational with her four high notes, Cornelle Falcon more touching, Sontag more brilliant; but for the presentation of a part in its entirety, for the embodiment of powerful emotion, combined with beauty of person, richness and roundness of voice, with the power of exercising a potent spell over a vast auditory, Grisi has never been surpassed. Her scales have been excelled, her intervals have been distanced, her shakes have been articulated more wondrously by other vocalists; but after citing isolated instances of superior attributes in this or that feature, or exactness of execution, still with a vivid recollection of singers of every country for nearly half a century, we can recall no instance of a prima donna like Grisi for the general purposes of a lyric theatre." Her capacity for hard work was supreme. She scarcely ever required an excuse for non-appearance. Her carelessness as to that magnificent organ of hers was equally exalted. While other prima donnas anxiously lay up their throats in quarantine for the night's performance, and with wraps and warmth and repose await the eight o'clock campaign, Grisi used to trot about her garden in sharp weather, her neck exposed, or move about her household affairs with a sublime contempt for draughts. Exposure did not affect her voice; and yet it was her singular fate to die of inflammation of the lungs. She had been ill throughout her stay in Berlin, being there arrested by the disease on her way to join her husband Mario in St. Petersburg. Mario was her second husband, the first being M. de Meley—an unhappy match which resulted in a legal separation and separate maintenance: the wife, curiously enough, being called upon to support the husband. Accordingly M. de Meley received a yearly income paid him by his wife. As the separation was effected by a French Court, and as it is not competent for a French Court to pronounce a complete divorce, Grisi's subsequent marriage with Mario was not by French law recognized as a legal proceeding. Five children are the issue of the latter union.

When, three weeks since, Mme. Grisi left the Villa Salviata, her residence in Florence, she had a small carbuncle on her face. During the journey it rapidly developed, producing considerable enlargement of the glands of the throat, and she was obliged to remain at Berlin. The tumor being freely opened, Mme. Grisi became better, and sat up. A few days before her death she was seized with symptoms of apoplexy, and Dr. Warren Isbell, of Plymouth, in whom for many years Mme. Grisi had placed great confidence as a medical man, was telegraphed for: but she died on Thursday before that gentleman's arrival. Mme. Grisi's daughters were with her at the time of her death. Signor Mario arrived at Berlin on Sunday.

The Peabody Institute of Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, November 25, 1869.

To the Editor of the Boston Journal:

Among the many objects of interest in this city most prominent is the Peabody Institute. Its character is in many respects unique, and its operations are worthy of attentive study. The original letter of Mr. Peabody, written in 1857, sets forth the plan with singular clearness; and whether it is considered as the fruit of a long life of observation, the expression of a large-minded and generous man, or as a scheme of intellectual and æsthetic culture, the letter is equally remarkable. In its wise and liberal views, its proper estimate of the value of the arts in refining character and in making life beautiful, as well as in the humanity that animates the whole composition, it will remain an enduring memorial of the founder. I must confess that even the princely benefactions of Mr. Peabody have not impressed me so deeply as has the perusal of this noble letter.

Believing that we have yet much to learn, and still more to do in Boston in similar fields, I will give a brief sketch of the Institute and of its operations.

The plan includes, first, a library; secondly, lectures upon science and literature; thirdly, an academy of music; fourthly, a gallery of the fine arts. Provision is also made for the distribution of medals and prizes to meritorious pupils of both sexes in the public schools; the only part of the scheme to which there can be any objection. The benefit of these incentives to study I strongly question, believing that in the wiser time to come pupils will be led into the pleasant fields of learning without the stimulus of prizes which gratify the fortunate winner at the cost of so many heartaches in the breasts of his fellows. The amount of the fund is one million dollars; the accrued interest is nearly $200,000 more. The trustees are twenty-five in number, of whom the venerable John P. Kennedy is President. A beautiful building of white marble (costing $170,000 besides the land) has been erected on the corner of Charles street and Mount Vernon square, facing the magnificent monument to Washington. The building, however, is not adequate for the purposes intended, and two adjoining estates have been purchased, over which, next year, the edifice will be extended. On the ground floor is the hall used for lectures and concerts, capable of seating from 1200 to 1500 persons. It is a pleasant room, brilliantly lighted, and with good acoustic qualities. Above is the library, with convenient rooms for reading and for the librarian's use. I believe it is intended hereafter to transfer the library into the new building; a desirable change, since the present hall is imperfectly lighted, and will not contain as many books as are necessary for a reasonably complete collection. The librarian, Mr. Uhler, appears to be an admirable officer, full of enthusiasm, and well versed not merely in bibliography but in many departments of science. The collection may be considered in a formative state, many departments being yet incomplete. It numbers about 37,000 volumes, but it is to be observed that on account of the large size of the works thus far purchased, it occupies as much space as is generally allotted to 50,000. It has the recently published English State papers, a large number of French histories and memoirs, a particularly full collection of works on the natural sciences, the great work of Lepsius on Egypt, full illustrations of Pompeian and other antiquities, and a pretty complete collection of the materials for American History.

In one view of the case it is to be regretted that no department has been established for loaning books. The only provision for this public want in this large city is made by the Mercantile Library, an institution of rather moderate aims and capabilities. There is no Loring nor Burnham in the whole city. What all these bright-eyed and daintily-stepping damsels do here without an institution like Loring's I cannot conceive. Imagine the despair of young Boston in such a plight! But Mr. Peabody expressly desired that no part of the fund should go to the support of a circulating library, because he expected that that obvious want would be provided for in due time by the city, or by the citizens themselves. He aimed to furnish the means of diffusing a higher culture, which the more popular libraries wholly lack. I was very happy to see a good number of readers in the rooms, and to learn that the interest of scholars in the library is on the increase.

The idea of establishing an Academy of Music was a very happy one. In Mr. Peabody's view this was not so much to provide a cheap amusement for the public, as "to diffuse and cultivate a taste for music, the most refining of all the arts." The Provost of the Institute, Mr. Morrison, in his last annual report, says: "No portion of the money spent attracts so large a share of the public attention and sympathy as this. Here the Institute is brought more widely into contact with the public, and the beneficence of its founder is more generally felt than in any other of its present operations."

The Academy provides musical instruction at very moderate rates, and gives orchestral concerts every fortnight. The Director is Mr. Southard, whose musical learning and great natural powers are well known in Boston. Here he has a field for his ambition. An orchestra numbering over fifty is employed by the government, and rehearses twice a week under the Director. I have sometimes fancied that the chief pleasure a prince enjoys is in having his band play for him after dinner. But if one could not be a prince, the next thing (musically) would be to be the conductor of the orchestra. The youth when he holds the reins of his mettlesome horse, the yachtman with his hand on the tiller, while aloft the white sails belly out and the taper spars bend like willow wands—each has his own delight; but the leader whose baton the wild forces of music obey, he is as truly an anax andron, king of men, as the leader on a battle field. In the culmination of some grand overture it might seem as if one were driving a team of lions. Fortunate for the conductor when he happens also to be a composer. How many an ambitious author would give the tip of his ear to have his thoughts breathed out by melodious brass and twanged by obedient catgut! In none of the arts is there such difficulty in getting "a hearing," and we shall never know what immortal strains have floated away into the infinite, unang. From Mr. Southard's creative ability and skill in instrumentation we may now expect substantial results. One of his works, a descriptive overture, entitled "Night in the Forest," has been several times played here and universally admired. He has had many obstacles to contend with, not the least of which being that he had the misfortune to come from Boston. But the success of the Academy is an established fact, and the steady improvement of the orchestra under his able leadership cannot be gainsaid.

It would gratify your musical readers much if they could hear the performances of a wonderfully precocious pianist, Miss Kate Cecilia Gaul, a pupil of Mr. Courlaender, one of the Professors of the Institute. At the last concert she played Beethoven's concerto in E flat, (op. 73), with orchestral accompaniment, and with a clearness and brilliancy that was astonishing. This little lady is thirteen years of age, but although her features are sweet, modest and childlike, her playing shows that she has a rare maturity of mind and feeling. That she is to be one of the most brilliant stars there can be no doubt. The instrument, a splendid Chickering grand, was presented by the makers to the Institute.

The programmes of the Peabody concerts (as they are commonly called) are much like those of our Harvard Association, but shorter and a trifle more popular, as is prudent and necessary. The audiences are not large, not over eight hundred usually, although the price is only fifty cents—a fact not very creditable to the musical taste of this city. I may observe here, in passing, that Mr. Peabody has not aimed to make any of his benefits wholly gratuitous, since people do not value that which costs absolutely nothing. For the lectures even a nominal fee is charged—$1.50 for the course of thirty-two.

As a specimen of the wide range of subjects upon which the lectures are given I give the plan for the present season:

Prof. Mayer, two lectures on the Solar Eclipse; Prof. Morton, four, on Light.

Dr. Van Bibber, two, on the Influence of Light, Heat and Ventilation on Health.

Prof. G. W. Greene, four on the American Revolution; Dr. Carpenter, two, on Oysters and other Edible Mollusks.

Dr. B. A. Gould, four, on the Constitution of the Sun.

Prof. Ware, four on Architecture.

Prof. Lowell, four, on Chaucer and Pope, and other literary topics.

Prof. Smith, four, on the Forces of Matter.

President Coppes, two, on Ethnology.

These subjects, it will be observed, are all of present interest, and are among those which are engaging the attention of scholars and savans.

Upon the fifth course I should be pleased to deliver (privately) a lecture to the editor on my return, without charge. It will be a heartfelt production.

As to the last branch of the Institute, the projected gallery of fine arts, nothing has yet been done. Indeed, I do not see how it will be practicable to create a gallery that will be a credit to the Institute without an increase of its funds, or without greatly impairing the efficiency of the other departments. Perhaps some opulent citizen, emulous of the philanthropist's fame will make the necessary gift. There are some private collections of pictures here of great value, and which would make an admirable nucleus for the future gallery.

When the founder's intention is fully carried out, how noble it will appear! As if our Athenæum, Lowell Institute, and Harvard Musical Association, were united under one comprehensive board of directors, and working with harmony for the instruction of our people in all useful learning and all refining arts! If Mr. Peabody had sought only to achieve the monumentum ære perennius, could he have done better? Therefore I most heartily agree with the Rev. Mr. Ware of this city, touching the erection of a memorial statue here, namely, that Mr. Peabody's monument is the Institute, and that if gentlemen wish to honor the founder, let them follow his example and give greater power to existing institutions or establish new ones.

The Intelligent Understanding of Music.

From the Choir (London).

The majority of the music performed, in our concert-rooms and not unfrequently in the home circle, might, we fear, be aptly described as "that which all hear but few understand." When we say this we are far from saying that it falls on an inattentive or unappreciative audience, but we simply assert what must be patent to all who exercise the most ordinary powers of observation, that an intelligent understanding of the great mass of the symphonies, sonatas, or even of the minor pieces we so constantly hear, is the exception and not the rule. That this should be the case is not surprising. Although musical education, so-called, forms a part of the normal scheme at our ladies' schools; although choral societies and church choirs are at work all over the kingdom; although concerts form the most popular entertainments, even in the village school,—still these all tend chiefly to familiarize those who assist at them with musical sounds, and fail to impart any substantial aid towards the mental effort which must be made before those same sounds can be connected in the hearer's mind with anything more than a mere pleasurable sensation, which it is one, but one only of their true ends to produce. In the case of other sciences some attempt is usually made by the professor to impart instruction as well as amusement in the exercise of his art. The Owens and the Tyndalls of our day do not content themselves with demonstrations and experiments calculated only to attract and astonish the eye or ear. The lecturer on Chemistry does not consider his work is done when he has produced brilliant combinations of color. The electrician is not satisfied with mystifying a crowd of eager listeners with effects, of which the causes are beyond their ken. Rather, in all these cases, the popular exposition of the science is made the medium of conveying an explanation of its deep principles, which would not only be unintelligible but unpalatable to the ordinary and too often uneducated mind if placed nakedly before it. But when music is the subject treated, a totally opposite course is adopted. As a rule it is left to speak for itself. Symphony follows overture and song follows sonata night after night, season after season, and it is not too much to say that a very large number of the audience rise from their seats without even realizing the meaning of the varied forms in which the compositions are cast, much less the intention of the writers or the extent to which they have carried them out. The analytical programmes provided by the director of the Monday Popular Concerts for the use of his friends, and which the old and new Philharmonic and other societies have been stimulated to supply are, it is true, steps in the right direction, but even these are couched in language which is unhappily still a dead letter to the great body of amateurs, and thus they scarcely meet the want to which we are alluding. That it is a want of the age, is we think undeniable, and therefore it is worthy of consideration, whether, with the means already at our command, we cannot do something towards supplying it.

To this question a practical answer has been afforded during the past few weeks by the Musical Professor at Edinburgh University, whose efforts to promote the education of the amateurs of the art in the northern capital are forming so worthy a fulfilment of the objects which the founder of the Chair of Music had in view. Professor Oakeley has, as our readers have learnt from the frequent records we have published of his performances, given during the University seasons a series of organ recitals to which he has invited the citizens as well as the students, thus making the class-room in Park Place just what it should be—a centre of musical life for the whole city, as the University itself is a centre in every branch of learning for the country. In the programmes he has never failed to give an educational bearing to the recitals, and in selection and arrangement his schemes have hitherto been highly satisfactory; but to these advantages he has now added another at the opening of the present season by prefacing each piece with a few remarks, either historical or descriptive, thus furnishing that very aid to an intelligent understanding of the music to the general absence of which we have alluded. Thus what in ordinary cases would be a mere organ concert has become a means of direct musical training, calculated not only to create a desire to search further into the deep things of the art, but to impart a totally fresh interest to the music played. Here then, in a rough form, is the remedy for the evil to which we have called attention, a means ready to hand of raising music from the unworthy place to which it has been too habitually lowered, and of imparting to our Concert rooms a higher element than is usually to be found in them. On many occasions perhaps a running commentary on a performance would be out of place, but at such recitals as those of Mme. Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé, which are ostensibly designed to elevate the taste and to afford an intellectual entertainment to those who are anxious to be taught, we believe the system would be found to work most admirably. Indeed we question whether it might not with equal fitness be applied to all classical performances; and whether with a capable speaker, the introductory remarks would not soon be regarded as an integral part of the evening's entertainment. The days have, we would fain hope, forever passed away when music was regarded merely as the pastime of an idle hour, and we believe that some such assistance to intelligent progress would be gladly welcomed. It is impossible to watch an audience at a Monday Popular Concert without feeling that the brain as well as the mere sentimental enthusiasm of a large body of the almost breathless listeners is being called into exercise; and we are therefore ascribing to them nothing more than they deserve when we assert that they would rejoice still higher in the world of art opened out before them by the touch of a Goddard, or the bow of a Joachim.

At any rate, whether the adoption of such a system in ordinary concerts would be wise or not, of one thing there can be little doubt, that the provision of a series of concerts in which the explanatory remarks would form a component part of the scheme is highly desirable. If the music room at Edinburgh is crowded, it cannot be doubted that an equally eager band of amateurs would be found in London and in other large towns in the kingdom; and it would indeed be casting a slur upon the profession to argue that its foremost members are unable thus to set forth in intelligible language the meaning of the tone-poems to which their artistic skill imparts life and reality. Nay more, if in every district some such course were adopted, and if instead of the chief interest of a concert being centred on the special excellencies of the "star," the beauties of the music and the design of its composer were set forth with clearness and brevity, we can but think that the interests of art would be promoted, and that a powerful means would be provided of making the English in reality as well as in name a musical people.

Professor Oakeley on Mediæval Music.

On the afternoon of Thursday the 2nd inst., Professor H. S. Oakeley delivered the first of a series of open lectures in the Park Place Music Hall, Edinburgh. In addition to many students, a number of other gentlemen were present.

Professor Oakeley, in his introductory remarks, adverted to the necessity of public lectures to mixed audiences on musical subjects being free from technicalities in order that they might be generally interesting, and stated that the legitimate work of a professor in such lectures was not so much to teach as to prepare for teaching, to remove discouragements, to awaken interest, and to form a sound and healthy taste on the subject which lay before him. In a former course of lectures on "Hebrew, Greek, and Roman Music, in connection with the national character," he endeavored to give some idea of music as it was among the greatest nations of the world before the Christian era. Resuming the subject where they left it, he again asked them to remark, as they could hardly, he thought, fail to do, how invariably music, like the other arts, but perhaps more than any other, proved itself the outward symbol of the inner spirit, the exponent of the hidden principle—in a word, the voice by which the heart of the people strove to express its wants, and poured forth its sweet sympathies.

Following the course of history in their glance at the progress of music, they started to-day from the Christian era—extending from that epoch to the Reformation, which he had chosen as his other boundary-line, because it seemed to correspond very closely with an era of remarkable significance in the progress of music. He would not have them imagine that they were entering now on a very dreary, unromantic, or barren district of inquiry, or that there was little or nothing to repay them for the labor of their researches. It was true that the "dark ages," as they were sometimes called, had a very bad name for ignorance and barbarism; but while in some respects the charge was not altogether unfounded, there was some truth in the remark that the mediæval ages had been called dark partly and chiefly because of our own ignorance about them. Here and there in every century were sacred and sequestered spots, a retreat from the violence of brute force for minds with a taste for cultivation; and music, as they knew, and as he had observed in previous lectures, was indeed a thing of so universal a capacity that no age, no country, seemed to be able to exist entirely without it. Music was, indeed, a plant which struck its roots so deep into the heart, that no storm, no wintry blast, could check its growth effectually, nor could ignorance or barbarism entirely prevent its small voice from being heard.

There were three points in regard to mediæval music generally, to which he wished to direct attention. In the first place, the music of mediæval Christendom was, after all, in a great measure, a reproduction and an outgrowth of Pagan Greece. As a modern writer truly said, "Music was, of course, employed from the earliest ages of the Christian Church in its religious services. What the music of the first Christians was can only be matter of conjecture, but it may be supposed to have been similar to that which had formerly been used in the different countries where they dwelt. In Judea, the religious chants formerly used in the Jewish worship would still be used; and in other parts of the Roman Empire the new Christians would have recourse to the Pagan hymns of the Greeks and Romans." As he had shown in a previous lecture, Rome, under the Emperors, content to borrow rather than to originate, did little more for the art than merely to copy Athens; and as Rome, with its irresistible eagles, tacitly succumbed to the superior influence of Grecian cultivation, so the rude Northmen could not but bow their heads, abashed and humbled, before the artistic supremacy of the nation which they had beaten on the battle-field. The Professor entered at some length into the grounds for attributing to the Church tones now designated "Gregorian chants" a Pagan origin, and then went on to state that the second point to which he begged to call attention, as a characteristic of music before the Reformation, was obviously connected with the preceding one—namely, that mediæval music, especially in its infancy, was strongly—he did not say exclusively—tinged with a clerical or ecclesiastical flavor. This, he said, could hardly be otherwise in a day when the clergy, or at least the monastic orders, were almost the sole pioneers of civilization and the sole representatives of art. They were, in fact, as a rule, the painters, the architects, the musicians of their period. While all ranks of society around them, from the baron in his feudal tower, and the burgher within the city ramparts, to the serf who tilled the soil, were occupied in almost unceasing strife, the clergy or monks alone had the time, the taste, or the facilities for uninterrupted study.

In referring to the monastic influence on music of mediæval times, which thus naturally gave to it a certain grave and ecclesiastical character, he did not forget that a less artistic kind of secular music existed from an early date, which was wholly independent of the more cultivated style to which he had been calling attention, and they must not ignore the existence of such melody as was made in early times, for instance by the "minstrels" or "scalds," the successors, perhaps, of the ancient bards, who were known and revered in all parts of Europe, and the precursors of "gleemen" or "harpers," and of the order of the English minstrels who flourished till the sixteenth century. Besides these were the troubadours, the jongleurs, and others, who seem to have sprung up in the tenth century in sunny Provence, and were now represented in Italy by "improvisatori;" although, as he need scarcely say, far less romance and more knavery were associated with the modern trovatore than the mediæval troubadour.

The third important feature in mediæval music, and it was that which stamped it as thoroughly and essentially distinct from the music which preceded it, was the introduction of harmony. He spoke of harmony in a technical and scientific sense, and not merely as an accompaniment in musical concord to melody. After showing how the facts were accounted for, that melody was of southern birth, and that harmony was the more stately offspring of the north. Professor Oakeley stated that, in this third feature in mediæval music they had at least the introduction of a novel element, and one the importance of which could not be over-estimated, into the music of the dark ages; and they must not forget that the important invention of harmony and counterpoint was, to a great extent, to be attributed to the invention of the organ—an instrument the use of which, rude as it was then in its construction, became pretty general in Germany, Italy, and England during the tenth century. In concluding, the Professor said that in future lectures he hoped to carry forward their investigations into the historical idiosyncrasies of some of the principal nations of mediæval Europe, and he asked his audience to bear in mind the general propositions he had striven to lay before them:—First, that mediæval music comes to us ultimately from the pre-Christian era; next, that it was mainly, in its earlier stages, of a religious kind; and lastly—but for us it was the most important point of all—that, by its deep and more recondite harmony, it challenged for itself an independence of its own, and claimed to be indeed no mere tradition of an alien and effete race, but the true and living patrimony of the great northern family to which we ourselves boast to belong. He then made an announcement to the students to the effect that he would play on the organ in the hall on Thursday next at half-past four.

The Professor, who was frequently applauded, performed on the grand organ in the course of his lecture, an old "dance tune," in illustration of his remarks on mediæval secular music.—Choir.

Mr. Ritter's Third Lecture.

Mr. F. L. Ritter, in his third lecture (on the opera, from 1600 to the death of Gluck in 1787), traces the rise of Monody (?), properly so-called, from the acquirement of greater freedom among the various European nations, and an increasing need of the study of the secular sciences and arts. Touching on the mystery, or miracle plays, he spoke of the literary and scientific circles, among whom, principally in Italy, a desire arose for the revival of the Greek drama, with its music, of the wonderful effects of which so much had been written; and also of the efforts of many scientific Italians to discover and re-suscitate the lost Greek musical poems. The attempts of Mei, Strose-i, Galilei (father of the astronomer, and others), were described, not forgetting the scenes, etc., by Galilei, "which seem to have been the first compositions for one voice, independent of counterpoint." The first, however, who wrote songs combined in a dramatic form was "Emilio del Cavaliere." He set to music two pastorals, "Il Satiro" and "La Disperazione di Fileno," by the renowned poetess, Laura Guidiccioni, and these were sung throughout. It seems, however, that Cavaliere's efforts were not entirely satisfactory. Peri was more successful. "He first made use of the stilo parlante; or recitative (before A. D. 1600), and every one among the modern Hellenes who heard his intermez-zos, interspersed with choruses by the celebrated Madrigal composer, Luca Marenzio, believed that the musical forms which the old Greeks had used in their dreams were now recovered." Mr. Ritter then gave an interesting account of the dramas of Cavaliere and Peri, the kind of orchestra which they used, and a sketch of these composers' careers; "all the material for formation and construction of the opera was thus discovered, and in the course of time an art form emerged from these efforts, destined to play a conspicuous part in the artistic and social life of whole nations." The newly discovered recitative style made a great sensation all over Italy, and was carried to fuller perfection by Monteverde (born 1568), whose works, Mr. Ritter assures us, "show a great progress beyond those of his predecessors. Everywhere I find a tendency to give to the words and characters of his poem the true expression, gained by an effective use of harmonic and rhythmical means."

The opera, further aided by costume and machinery, having become a favorite entertainment at the different Italian courts, many composers essayed their powers in this form, among them the celebrated Alessandro Scarlatti, "to whom belongs the merit of having founded the Neapolitan school of music, out of which came forth a large array of distinguished composers and singers, whose influence has been felt up to our own day, and who perfected the recitative." Mr. Ritter then describes the transportation of opera to various European courts, where Lambert, Tully and Rameau gained, in France, the greatest success by writing in the Italian style, during the latter part of the seventeenth century.

In alluding to the progress of the English musical drama, Mr. Ritter paid a tribute to the genius of Henry Purcell, and after describing the state of the London musical stage, gave an account of Handel's career as an operatic composer and manager. Of Handel's operas he said that, "with the exception of a few exquisite airs and choruses, they have sunk into oblivion; and in spite of the great musical beauties they contain, the rich source of pure enjoyment and instruction they present to the student, to revive them on the stage would prove a decided failure."

The second part of this lecture presented a thorough review of the life and labors of the writer Gluck, and his reform of musical-dramatic art, with interesting accounts of his relations with his literary and noble contemporaries, and of the famous Gluck and Piccini feud. In a summary of what had been so far accomplished on the various operatic stages of Europe, Mr. Ritter said: "The opera, as the highest meaning and expression of the musical drama, is not the work of one nation. Italian art, as such, has only exclusive importance and signification for the Italian; French art for the Frenchman; German for the German; the quintessence of that great spirit which governs and inspires them all in their art productions, is the goal towards which the genius of mankind strives. Every one is called to bring a certain part of the universal work to its perfection. And then the appearance of the German element on the theatre of European culture was an event in the intellectual life of nations. Only then was it possible to lay a foundation for the future growth of music, considered as an art in our wide modern sense; yet, in a balmy climate, under the beautiful Italian sky, its first fruits ripened. But the Italian element was not intense and profound enough to give universality to musical art; the German element produced two apostles of mighty genius, Handel and Gluck, who were destined to proclaim the highest truths of music. As if providentially, London and Paris, the capitals of two great nations, and both foreign to these German masters, were selected as the battle fields where the egotistical art principle of one nation came into deadly conflict with the breadth and profundity of another." Mr. Ritter then explained the causes that have led to the supremacy of German art in our present state of musical culture.

FOURTH LECTURE.

In his lecture on the Oratorio, given last Tuesday evening, Mr. Ritter traced the origin of that musical form from the old miracle plays, and gave a long, detailed account of them, relating many interesting incidents connected with their authors and performers, as also the reason why the term oratorio has been applied to the modern sacred dramatic form. Cavaliere's rules for the performance of one of the first oratorios are curious, as is also the fact that the sacred music was enlivened by dancing in his time. The efforts of this composer, as well as of Animuccia, the friend of St. Philip Neri; of Carissimi, Stradella, Scarlatti and others, were described, and the infancy and development of that form known as the "Passion Oratorio," the first specimen of which, by a Protestant composer, was written three hundred years ago, though such Passions were enacted in Catholic churches long before. We then had an account of the works of Schuetz, who wrote, Mr. Ritter says, "great and powerful choruses, in which the Handelian spirit already breathes, though Handel was not yet born when Schuetz died." Sebastiani and Keiser were also alluded to. In following the progress of oratorio to its present modern perfection, Mr. Ritter gave much interesting information in regard to Luther's labors as a musician in the service of the reformed church, and also of the composers who were associated with him. It is not so well known as it should be that Luther ranked the profession of music as next below that of divinity. He attached the greatest importance to music as a moral agent in education, "as it renders the mind intellectual," and declared that he could never respect a schoolmaster who did not know how to sing. After naming those of Luther's hymns which are really authentic, and passing in review the Protestant Church composers up to the end of the seventeenth century, Mr. Ritter devoted the second part of his lecture principally to a sketch, as full as his limits would allow, of the life and works of John Sebastian Bach and Handel, as composers of sacred Protestant music. In speaking of Bach, Mr. Ritter gave an especially fine analysis of the St. Matthew's Passion Oratorio, and drew an able parallel between Bach and Palestrina, and their relations to the church music of their several creeds. Of Handel's efforts in oratorio we had also a full account; those gigantic works, written after he had passed his fifty-third year. Reference was made to the oratorios of Italianized German composers, such as Hasse, Graun, Telemann, and those, now forgotten, of the English Arne, Arnold and others, as also to Pagolus' beautiful works in this form, and to Mendelssohn's charming "St. Paul" and "Elijah." Nor was Schumann's great secular oratorio forgotten. In summing up the merits, aim and influence of the oratorio form and its composer's claims, Mr. Ritter said, finely and truly, that "only through a return to a deep, earnest and faithful study of the immortal works of Handel can a new art foundation be gained. Were not Haydn and Mendelssohn inspired by Handel? Yet, though they created noble works, they did not reach, far less surpass, their glorious model. Then let us go back to that inexhaustible mine of inspiration—not in the spirit of mere imitators and superficial transcribers, but in that of the best minds of our own times—to strengthen, intensify and enlarge our views through the ennobling influence of perfect models. No age has yet produced fine works independent of those that preceded it; and no age will fulfil an artistic mission in its full significance by wilfully ignoring or depreciating the great and the beautiful which ages before it have already accomplished."—Weekly Review.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, Dec. 24.—Of musical occurrences here since my last letter, the following mention must suffice. Nov. 27, 29 and 30, came THEODORE THOMAS with his superbly trained orchestra. These concerts were given in Farwell Hall, and were entirely superior to anything in the orchestral line we have ever dreamed of here. Whatever they did was with such exquisite finish as to leave us but one adjective with which to describe the ensemble: it was certainly nearer perfect than most things are to which that significant adjective is applied. We had only to lament that the performances partook so largely of the nature of virtuoso doings as to forbid our being treated to an entire Symphony. The pecuniary result was not what it ought to have been, owing, principally, to the injudicious and inefficient management of the advance agent of the company. The first evening there was a mere handful of audience, scarcely five hundred; the second night some eight hundred or so; and the third, nearly two thousand.

The CARLOTTA PATTI troupe came Dec. 8, and gave five concerts. It is scarcely necessary that I should write anything to you about these concerts. As it regards money and fashion they were complete and immense successes. All Chicago turned out to hear, and I verily believe not a few thought the Patti before them was the Marquise de Caux herself. Hermanns, as usual, brought down the house in applause. Mr. Ritter played the piano in an elegant style, and with great modesty of deportment. He played several Gavottes by Bach, Mendelssohn's E-minor Rondo Capriccioso, and at the last concert, Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto. Of this latter, which was characterized by the musicians present as a most beautiful performance, the papers made no mention. This strange oversight arose from the fact that the programmes were not published in advance, and the newspaper men, having already heard the same programme several times repeated, on this evening went virtuously home to bed, and wrote their next morning's critiques on general principles.

The PAREPA-ROSA ENGLISH OPERA TROUPE came back to us Dec. 13 with "Norma," followed by "Faust," "Sonnambula," and "Der Freyschütz." "Norma" was done well in only two respects: Mme. Parepa Rosa, and Mrs. Zelda Seguin. These two alone saved the performance from being an utter fiasco. It appeared that, the orchestral parts not having arrived, the instruments were played partly from the dictates of the "inner consciousness" of the individual players. The result was not pleasing. Mme. Parepa sang grandly—as no one else has ever sung "Norma" here; and in Mrs. Seguin she had a worthy supporter. Mr. Nordblom was by no means a worthy Pollio. The papers had a great deal to say about the impropriety of giving "Norma" in English, but for my part I see no reason why a murder in English is more culpable than one in Italian. Of the performance of "Der Freyschütz" a like qualified admiration must be expressed. The first time, every thing went a little slowly, as the singers were not familiar with the stage business, nor even with the dialogue; but the second performance was much better. In the cast we had Mme. Parepa as Agatha, Miss Hersee as Ann, Castle as Max, and Campbell as Caspar. I think it is not too much to say that all of these parts were well sustained. Mme. Parepa was not at her best, owing to a bad cold; but her singing of the "Prayer" was something long to be remembered. The Wolf's Glen scene was elaborately gotten up, and throughout the scenic effects were better than our opera managers usually take pains to give us. The orchestra, too, although not so good as we would like, contains some excellent players, especially a first violin and double bass, and is very ably directed by Carl Rosa.

I ought also to mention the rendering of Faust. Miss Hersee's Margharita, Mr. Castle's Faust, and Mr. Lawrence's Valentine were all worthy of high praise. Mr. Lawrence sang the song, "Loving smile of sister kind," written for the part by Gounod, after Faust was brought out in English in London. This song adds much to the musical attractiveness of the opera, and was admirably done. The death of Valentine was also an excellent piece of acting.

I differ in toto from those critics who would confine this troupe to "Maritana," "Bohemian Girl," and the like, under the pretense that the music of "Faust," "Norma," and "Der Freyschütz," is of too high a character for them, and the operas themselves improper for English. This, in my opinion, is mere twaddle. That there are imperfections in their renderings I readily admit, but the steady improvement in the successive performances is marked and gratifying. The troupe contains six artists who are of remarkable merit, and all of them are deservedly popular here. They are: Mme. Parepa, Miss Hersee, Mrs. Seguin, Messrs. Castle, Campbell and Lawrence.

The most successful performances here were "Martha" and "The Marriage of Figaro."

By way of general gossip I have only space to note that Lyon & Healy were just moving into a new store that will be one of the most elegant in the country. Of this I will write fully in my next. Mr. Dudley Buck has been very ill, but is now well. The Quintette Club are busy throughout the West, and on the whole are doing well. The Parepa troupe have had great business in some of the smaller towns as well as here. Times are hard; but Christmas is merry.

DER FREYSCHÜTZ.

NEW YORK, Dec. 20. On Saturday evening the Brooklyn Society gave its second concert, at the Academy of Music. The solo artists were Miss Anna Mehlig (piano), Miss Nettie Sterling (contralto), and Mr. Levy (cornet à piston). The following selections were performed:

4th Symphony, D minor, op. 120.....Schumann.
2 movements from "Fantastic Symphony".....Berlioz.
Pavlova's, C minor.....Meyerbeer.

The Symphony was very excellently played, barring some few deficiencies in the final movement. Mr. Bergner did ample justice to himself and to his reputation in the violoncello solo with which the Romance opens, and the same may be said of Mr. Noll in the exquisite violin passage (in the same movement) which drops, in triplets, so daintily down to the low notes of the instruments. I think the best performance was that of the Scherzo, the tempo of which was taken—as it seemed to me—much more moderately than is usual with Mr. Bergmann.

Doubtless such composers as Hector Berlioz have and have had their uses, although it would perplex one greatly to say what those uses are. The portions of his "Fantastic Symphony" given on Saturday evening, are hardly calculated to fill the soul with delight, and I am always suspicious of the merit of any musical composition which needs a printed analysis to explain its meaning. Music of intrinsic worth and meaning should explain itself.

Miss Mehlig, a German pianiste who has recently arrived in this country, achieved an immense success in her very artistic rendering of a quaint, old-fashioned Concerto by Hummel. Her execution is very fine, her touch delicate yet firm, and she plays with a passion and abandon only too rare among artists here. She was enthusiastically encored—the orchestra taking a most active part in the general manifestation of delight,—and then played an extremely difficult and very effective arrangement of Paganini's "Clochette." Her technique is superb and she never, under any circumstances, forces the tone of the instrument. She made use of a powerful and full-toned Steinway grand, whose resonant tones filled every corner of the auditorium.

Miss Nettie Sterling—who has been studying for two years in Europe, and whose friends are so eulogistic of her powers—did not create a very marked sensation. Her voice is quite a full and rich one, but her manner and style are cold. Her execution of Rossini's "Di tanti palpiti" was devoid of anything like fire and vigor, and her singing, as a whole, impressed me as being amateurish. We fear that injudicious friends have flattered her (as other American singers have been flattered) into the belief that she is a great artist; that she certainly is not. Two years ago she sang at several concerts in Steinway Hall, when her efforts gave me the impression that she was a vocalist of much talent and promise. My expectations have not been realized, for she is not true to pitch, her execution is quite labored, and her manner cold and unsympathetic. I regret to say this plainly, but a critic must be just and conscientious. Besides the Rossini Cavatina she sang two of Schumann's lovely songs, which were singularly inappropriate to the occasion.

Mr. Levy's solos, also, were a little out of place at a Philharmonic concert, for although his first one—one of De Bériot's "Airs"—belongs to a very good class of music, yet his encore, his own "Maud Waltz," is too trivial for any musical entertainment of any dignity. Of course the managers of the Society must endeavor to please their subscribers, and it is natural that they should even strain a point to do so; but I respectfully suggest that this sort of thing is going a little too far. It is better to stop somewhere; and who would wish to arrive at the period when one of the chief attractions of a Philharmonic programme should be "Shoo fly, don't bodder me," arranged for solo, chorus and grand orchestra, with "bones" and burnt cork accompaniments? It behooves the directors of this Society to consider this matter carefully.

The 3d concert will be given on Saturday evening, Jan. 22nd, 1870, with the assistance of Mr. Bergner (violin) and of Mr. Jarvis (piano), of Philadelphia, who will play Chopin's F-minor Concerto. The orchestral programme will include Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, and the Tannhäuser Overture.

NOTE TO THE ABOVE. Our Correspondent's plainly candid impression of Miss Sterling's singing must pass for what it is worth. But we are bound to say that we have heard, from competent sources, much more favorable testimony. And we have so often heard the charge of "coldness" brought by really musical, appreciative people against artists who we know sing with feeling, that we have learned to accept that criticism always with a considerable grain of caution. We hear that we shall have ere long an opportunity to judge here for ourselves of the singer in question. Meanwhile, on the principle of audi alteram partem, we append a portion of an extract which a friend has sent to us.—ED.

"Miss Sterling went forth to be an earnest student, and it need hardly be said, of one who could be so severe a self-critic, that she brought high intelligence to her studies.

"We have been privileged to hear her since her return, and we can conscientiously say, that her labor has been well bestowed, for the results have exceeded our expectations. Her voice was always fine; its body full, its resources of power very great, and she used it with considerable skill. But it was not equal; it had an abundance of rough energy which needed refining, toning down, and, in some parts, building up. Her impulse and enthusiasm were great, but these, too, needed that control which could only be accomplished by that self-possession which perfect knowledge gives.

"Miss Sterling has achieved these ends. Her noble voice has attained its full power. It has been thoroughly equalized, and now presents that combination of ample power, cultivated refinement, and passion controlled by intelligence. She has now, in addition to one of the finest voices ever heard, an artistic style and finish which fits her as well for the operatic stage as the concert-room, and we predict for her a brilliant success in both departments. We believe the stage to be her true mission, and if she follows out the true instincts of her nature, America will have had the honor of giving to the world two of the finest contraltos, Miss Adelaide Phillips and Miss Nettie Sterling, of the present century."

The Christmas Oratorios.

The Music Hall was completely filled on Saturday evening with the devoutly attentive audience, as usual, to the Christmas Oratorio par excellence, Handel's "Messiah." The chorus seats were very full—perhaps 600 singers—and their new arrangement on the stage, each of the four masses rising tier on tier from orchestra to gallery, seemed to be an improvement; though we incline to think the arrangement never will be satisfactory until the stage is lowered several feet, so that the choral amphitheatre may spring from a point nearer the floor of the auditorium. Good balance of parts, rich, clear ringing quality of collective tone, and for the most part a fair degree of enthusiasm were noticeable in the chorus singing, which was on the whole better than we have had for a good while. More light and shade than usual showed careful rehearsal, creditable to Conductor ZERRAHN and to the Handel and Haydn Society. Still, sometimes there was more or less lack of promptness and decision in the coming in of parts, especially the basses. The tenors, however, rang out with uncommon purity and were instant to the mark. We were glad to have the expressive chorus: "And with His stripes" restored; though not one of the happiest renderings of the evening, it prepared the way more fitly for the boldly contrasted "All we like sheep have gone astray."

The soloists were certainly the best available. Anything more satisfactory, in sound or feeling, than the delivery of "O thou that tellest," "He shall feed his flock," and, above all, "He was despised," by Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, were more than reasonable to hope for or desire. She never sang better, or more to the hearts of all. It was natural enough that the great mass of the audience could not be content with one hearing of "He shall feed;" but when we consider that the same melody, only on a higher key, is immediately repeated by the Soprano in "Come unto Him," and when that also, sung so finely by Miss HOUSTON, had to be repeated in its turn, it seems a reasonable question whether in such cases a Conductor ought not in the interests of art to overrule the improvident momentary wishes of an audience, rather than allow the same piece to be sung four times over, and that too at the risk of dulling the appetite for the last part of a three hours' performance. The latter portion of a long Oratorio demands all the protection which abstinence from encores in the first part can afford. Miss HOUSTON's telling voice, always brilliant, has gained in fullness and in evenness, and her interpretation of the great soprano music was more artistically whole and rounded out, more evenly sustained, more impressive than ever. She has learned something in her short stay abroad. She was warmly welcomed back to a sphere which it was thought she had abandoned; and certainly she threw all her soul into her song, which was generally good, and now and then in certain moments almost great, for she is a singer who has inspirations.

The greatest new gain to the Oratorio was the grand Bass of Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, who rendered all those airs in a much more artistic and effective style than he was capable of before he went abroad. Mr. W. J. WINCH showed very considerable improvement in the management of his quite pleasing tenor voice, and in a more expressive rendering of the music, particularly in the opening, "Comfort ye," &c. But he has hardly strength to cope with "Thou shalt break them," or fineness and depth of pathos for "Thy rebuke." There is still a certain crudeness, hardness, and sense of effort in what he does; while on the other hand he is free from affectation, sentimentality, or coarseness, and seems to have right intentions, which with study and experience may achieve much.

The Orchestra was hardly as strong as we could wish, and in some of the wind instrument passages (as "He was despised") badly out of tune,—doubtless owing to the difficulty of adapting the old instruments to the Organ (French) pitch. We are glad to learn that a beginning has been made in the procuring of new instruments. Mr. J. C. D. PARKER presided ably at the Great Organ.

COSTA'S "NAAMAN." The rain on Sunday evening thinned the chorus ranks and thinned the audience, though both were out in good force. It was a better performance on the whole, more bright, more spirited and telling than the work received last year; yet of the composition as a whole we saw no cause to change our first impression. Much of it is pleasing, much musician-like in treatment; several of the choruses fine; the orchestration almost always interesting. But many of the Airs, the Quartets, &c., are of a common-place, sweetish operatic character; the air of the Child, particularly, which Miss PHILLIPPS sang so beautifully, and which was encored, sounding for all the world like one of the modern English ballads. Miss Phillipps, of course, made the most of her three parts: the wife of Naaman, the Widow, and the Child.

One of the merits of the work, as we said last Spring, lies in the marked characterization of the parts; and the most interesting of these, that of Adah, so beautifully sung the first time by Miss Whitten, did not suffer in the hands of Miss Houston. Miss GATES was not so happy with the part of the Shunamite Woman as she was before; her voice was much afflicted with the tremolo (perhaps due to a cold), and there was too much of wild, spasmodic outburst in the place of real energy and climax. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, who has in a great measure recovered the best power of his voice, gave a truly dramatic and impressive rendering of the part of Elisha. Mr. WINCH, though far from equal to the impassioned moods of Naaman, did himself credit on the whole, and the impression made by the other tenor, Mr. PRESCOTT, who appeared in solo for the first time, in the smaller part of Gehazi, was one that may encourage him to perseverance.

Tomorrow evening the Society are to begin the study of the St. Matthew Passion—music of Sebastian Bach.

Concerts.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. (Music Hall, Thursday afternoon, Dec. 16). The mightiest of all musical names to conjure by in Boston is BEETHOVEN. And so the Beethoven programme,—mere chance suggestion from the fact that the 99th anniversary of the great composer's birthday would come the next day after the concert—seems to have raised the highest expectation, and, on the whole, to have realized the greatest amount of pure enjoyment and enthusiasm of any of the Symphony Concerts from the first. The largest audience yet seen filled the Music Hall,—an audience remarkable for culture, taste, and weight of character,—but this time more remarkable for the deep, unflagging attention and enthusiasm with which it listened for two hours to music wholly from one master's works. What other composer could stand such a test! Yet it was easy to make up a programme out of his works exclusively, and be sure that it would hold and charm all hearers to the end. And that, too, setting aside, by reason of their familiarity, all of the three or four greatest of the nine Symphonies in the general estimation, though none perhaps could be more lovely than the one presented:

Overture to "The Men of Prometheus,"..... Beethoven.
Fourth Symphony, in B flat..... "
Overture, in C, Op. 116, composed for the "Name Day" of an Emperor..... Beethoven.
Piano Forte Concerto, No. 5, in E flat, op. 73.... "
Overture to "Egmont"..... "

Here was a good enough representative selection from the several periods and forms of his orchestral works. It worked to a charm, at all events; all seemed too happily, intensely occupied with what there was before them to covet anything outside. The Overture to the "Prometheus" Ballet, fresh, spontaneous, Mozartish, told of his young life and joy in vigorous, felicitous production. The warm fourth Symphony—though after the great Eroica—betrays the lover's secret,—spiritual, deep, yet passionate, taking all Nature into its confidence, hiding itself in such ideal utterance,—the "Adelaide" and the "Moonlight Sonata" side of his existence. The sketchy Overture in C, full of auroral premonitions of his sublimest thoughts, (read in one of our recent numbers how he first meant its themes for illustration of Schiller's Hymn to "Joy," and how, after that had grown into a so much vaster work, he threw these themes together into an Overture for his Emperor's name day), is a good instance wherein to see what genius, what greatness is still hinted, if not splendidly elaborated, in such a master's slightest efforts. Then, for one of the heroic, the triumphant, the imperial creations of a truer Emperor than any who reigned over Austria, Beethoven himself, the "Emperor Concerto," as it is often called in England. And, finally, an Overture which is one of his greatest, one of the most perfect, most impressive, and most characteristic in its intense, concise, complete expression, that to "Egmont." Of course, another selection might have been as good; but here was enough for a feast, and so good that none thought of better. The Ninth Symphony of course ought to be reserved for the Centennial next year.

Well, all these works were pretty well known here before—except the Op. 115, which certainly did gain in general interest on the second hearing. What more need be said then, farther than that they were all uncommonly well rendered by the Orchestra,—particularly the Concerto and the "Egmont"—and that the vast audience seemed inspired with the good genius of absorbed and, so to say, clairvoyant attention, in sympathetic, charmed rapport with each successive phase and movement of the music? There was a grand impressiveness, an irresistible, fine magnetism, in the very fact of such attention and deep interest in so many. We must not forget to say that Mr. PERABO played his part in the Concerto superbly, winning enthusiastic tributes, though by rare chance the Chickering piano was not of their very best,—at least for that use. The Orchestra, we thought, achieved their best success thus far in their part of that glorious Concerto; even the wind instruments were nearly faultless. All seem to look upon this as the great concert of the season, hardly to be surpassed; yet nothing was intended beyond a passing allusion to the great master's birth day, in the simple form of a selection from his works. There was no decoration, save the beautiful laurel wreath upon the head of the bronze Beethoven, placed there by the fittest hands, those of our generous townsman to whom we owe the presence and possession here of Crawford's noble statue, and who now, after twelve years' residence abroad, has returned to be among us once more the same earnest and efficient friend and furtherer of Music, and of all æsthetic culture, that he was in younger days.

The next concert will come after the longer interval of three weeks, namely, on the 20th of January. It will be marked by the new feature of the first performance in this country of the Magnificat by Durante, with full orchestral score by Franz, and sung by a select choir, mostly amateurs, under the direction of Mr. KREISSMANN. They will also sing Mozart's admirable Ave verum and Schumann's "Gypsy Life." Mr. J. C. D. PARKER will play Mendelssohn's D-minor Concerto; and the strictly orchestral numbers will be the Suite in D, by Bach (the same that Treco Thomas gave us); Schumann's first Symphony, in B flat; and the Overture to Euryanthe.

The LISTEMANN QUARTET Matinée are finished. We must reserve what we have to say of the last two till our next number.

NEXT. The Farewell Concert of Miss ALICE TOPP, this evening, at the Music Hall, must not be forgotten. It offers rare attractions. The Septet by Hummel, with PERABO at the piano, and with all the instruments, is alone enough for the making of a concert. The brilliant and enthusiastic young pianist herself will play Chopin's B-flat minor Scherzo; a Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt; a Cachoucha by Raff, and part of Schubert's "Soirées de Vienne," as arranged by Liszt. She will also play Miss ADOLLAIDE PHILLIPPS's accompaniment in her last song, an Arietta by Blumenthal; besides which, our noble Contralto will sing a Prayer by Donizetti. Mr. WHITNEY, the Basso, contributes a Concert Aria by Mozart and an English song by Randegger; Mr. B. LISTEMANN, a couple of Violin solos of the Paganini school.

Mr. PERABO gives the first Matinée of his second series on Friday, 7th inst., when he will play a Prelude and Fugue by Mendelssohn (in E minor, op. 35); Liszt's transcription of Beethoven's Cycle of Six Songs: "An die ferne Geliebte: a couple of charming and original Studies by Sterndale Bennett; and the Sonata in D, op. 53, by Schubert.

The PARKER ROSA English Opera will be here early in the month, when we may hope to hear "Figaro's Marriage," "Oberon" and other good things well done.

Oratorio.

New York, Dec. 4, 1869.

To the Editor of the World:

SIR:—Allow me to make a few remarks in reference to your kind and detailed report of the last performance of "Judas Maccabæus" by the Harmonic Society. While you give me credit for the scientific knowledge which a conductor must possess in order to carry out a correct performance of Handel's oratorios, you seem to think me wanting in the enthusiasm necessary to inspire a chorus and orchestra. This remark was in a certain sense novel to me: as, so far in my public career, friends have been rather inclined to tax me with an unnecessary excess of enthusiasm. But if you could be aware of half the obstacles that lie in the path of an oratorio conductor in this city, and of the especial obstacles that have been placed in my path, you would allow that only a very great amount of natural enthusiasm and veneration for this noble branch of art could sustain a conductor in this thankless vocation.

Though we have a very large number of church singers in New York, these are apparently lacking in that unselfish love of art which should prompt them to take part in great choral performances, in which only the masses, and not the individuals, are brought into prominence. The small proportion of singers who make oratorio singing a study is divided into half a dozen little societies, and among these, from various causes, continual discords are arising, and they do not co-operate on public occasions as they should. As far as my experience goes, the members of these societies are not so fully convinced of the necessity of a punctual attendance at rehearsal as to neglect social or business engagements in order to be present on regular practice evenings. The conductor may be overflowing with knowledge, enthusiasm and devotion, yet how is it possible for him, without the aid of magic, to infuse his own soul into the brains and voices of singers who are lacking in the thorough practice and knowledge absolutely indispensable to a correct performance of such profound works as those of Handel? A willing few always attend; but even they become discouraged at performance by the mistake of those, unfortunately in the majority, who only appear at the eleventh hour.

Another misfortune attends the getting up of oratorio performances. You are aware how expensive an undertaking it is; more than one rehearsal with the orchestra is seldom had, because our societies are poor, and not sustained by our rich amateurs as they should be. The Harmonic Society's general rehearsal, with chorus and orchestra, has to take place (from forced economical reasons) in the day-time, when those members who are business men cannot attend. Let my chorus be ever so well drilled, how is a perfect performance to take place under such conditions? Our Philharmonic Society—a society of professional and not amateur musicians, like our oratorio chorus singers—has, besides three public rehearsals, as many private ones by its entire force as its conductor thinks requisite: and this, too, of works which have been, most of them, played in the society for the last twenty years. Would the Philharmonic performances be as fine as they are did they take place with a single incomplete rehearsal.

I have often, in moments of heartfelt discouragement, agreed with you that, under such difficulties, oratorio performances should rather be given up; but trust in the final triumph of a good cause has again renewed my—shall I say enthusiasm and devotion to a noble branch of art?—in spite of the injustice with which, in too many cases, my efforts have been treated, and the hard trials to which my patience has been subjected.

Thanking you for your criticism, apparently dictated by a kind and appreciative spirit, I remain, yours truly,
F. L. RITTER.

London.

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.—Mr. Barnby opened his season on Wednesday night with a capital performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea, followed by the Lettingen Te Deum, both works being given with Mendelssohn's additional accompaniments. The band, comprising the leading members of the Italian Opera orchestra, brought out to perfection the many beauties with which the score of old Handel has been enriched; and, although the ultra conservative musician may still prefer to hear the Pastoral in its original form, such a performance as that of Wednesday night must go far to shake his allegiance to the almost primitive orchestra which existed in Handel's time. The choruses were uniformly well sung by Mr. Barnby's choir of three hundred voices, whose clear intonation and attention to the beat gave good promise for the more important concerts which are to follow; when, among other works, we are promised Bach's Passions-Musik, Beethoven's Mass in

D, and his Ninth Symphony. The solos in the Cantata were taken by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, whose bright voice so well suits Handel's songs, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Montem Smith, and Herr Stepan. The latter gentleman obtained an "ovation" for his singing of the famous "O ruddier than the cherry," in which he displayed unlimited power, finishing on the high G; but, at the same time, we can hardly regard him as a satisfactory exponent of Handel's music. In the Te Deum, the brief solo parts were allotted to Miss Marion Severn, a young lady whose excellent contralto voice is speedily bringing her to the front among our concert singers, Mr. Smith, and Herr Stepan. The Messiah, on the 21st, will form the Christmas performance.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The first Oratorio of the season was "Israel in Egypt," which was given Dec. 3, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa. The Times says:

Little need be stated about the performance, beyond the fact that in some respects it was one of the very finest ever heard at Exeter Hall. Into details it would be superfluous to enter. Enough that from "The children of Israel sighed by reason of their bondage" to "Israel saw that great work that the Lord did upon the Egyptians," in the first part, and from the magnificent "Song of Moses," which begins, to "The horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea," a repetition of the most striking part of the other, which ends the second part, the choruses were delivered with extraordinary vigor and—rare exceptions admitted—precision. "He gave them hailstones" (the absurdly attempted restriction against all audible expressions of satisfaction notwithstanding) was unanimously called for again, and repeated as a matter of course; and this with equal reason might have been the case with "He spake the word" and "Thy right hand, O Lord." More agreeable still to relate, however, is the fact that among the choruses efficiently executed were the two most elaborate and difficult of all—"With the blast of Thy nostrils," and "The people shall hear." The solo-singers were Misses Edith Wynne and Vinta, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Messrs. Lewis Thomas, Winn, and Vernon Rigby. Mr. Rigby gave the bravura air, "The enemy said, I will pursue," with remarkable power and vigor of declamation, and, being loudly encored, repeated it. Mr. Rigby is evidently a favorite, not only with the Sacred Harmonic audience, but with the Sacred Harmonic chorus; and such warm encouragement as he invariably receives should (and no doubt will) induce him to study assiduously. He has in his favor both voice and physical stamina. He must now aspire to artistic refinement, which, we believe, if he be not spoiled by applause, he will succeed in attaining. Nothing could have been more marked than his reception on Friday night. We need hardly say that the ever-popular duet for basses, "The Lord is a man of war," was also encored; nor that it was declaimed with fitting energy by those well-known artists, Messrs. Lewis Thomas and Winn. Among the most finished examples of Handelian singing in the course of the night were the lovely air, "Thou didst blow with Thy wind" (with its ingenious "ground bass" accompaniment), and "Thou shalt bring them in"—the first given by Miss Edith Wynne, the last by Madame Sainton-Dolby. The audience was as impressionable as it was large; and Israel in Egypt was, perhaps, never more thoroughly appreciated. On appearing in the orchestra, Sir Michael Costa was greeted with enthusiasm, and by his admirable conducting throughout showed, not for the first time, how worthy he is of the distinguished position he has so long occupied. It should be stated that the additional accompaniments used upon this, as upon previous occasions, were from Sir Michael's own facile and ingenious pen.

The next oratorio (on Friday) is to be Handel's Deborah—a revival which would alone cause the season 1869-70 to be remembered.

PRAGUE.—The concert season was opened by Herr Becker, with his celebrated Florentine Quartet, the programme comprising Mozart's fifth Quartet in A major; a new Quartet in F major, by Joh. Herbeck; and Beethoven's Op. 74. The Ladies' Band, in which all the performers are of the gentler sex, under the direction of Mdlle. Josephine Weinlich, attracted a large audience, anxious to see how the violin, violoncello, and that light, airy instrument, the double bass, would obey female fingers, as well as what sounds female lips could evoke from the trombone and the ophicleide. The result was in favor of the fair instrumentalists, though they may, perhaps, find that, when the novelty of their exhibition—for it really must be regarded rather as an exhibition than a performance—is worn off a bit, the attractions will not be so great.

Bach's Passion Music.

[From the German of C. H. RITTER.]

THE ST. JOHN PASSION. (Concluded.)

e. THE ARIAS.

We now turn to the Arias, which claim no small part of our attention in this work. To the ruling taste of our times they appeal but partially, although we meet in them all the excellencies of Bach's way of composition in rich measure: strictly characteristic melody; earnest declamation, closely following the sound and meaning of the words; harmonic and contrapuntal mastery in the conduct of the accompanying instruments. But the composer's earnestness and the serious destination of these pieces allowed of no concession to the sensuous apprehension of the general public. If in our altered circumstances the judgment of the public is influenced not so much by religious edification, as by the artistic and æsthetic side of such works, then our standpoint is a different one from that which Bach presupposed. A concert audience can follow the flight of the great master in his dramatic treatment of the choruses and recitative; but it is only exceptionally that it will be in a condition to sink into these depths of Christian contemplation, out of which he drew the fountain of his music in the Arias.

How much more must it be so where, as in this case, the purport of the words is purely dogmatical, containing little that is exciting in itself, while at the same time the breadth of the musical treatment tends to lessen the interest of the hearer, who is not able to give himself up to it entirely and follow it with all his faculty of feeling and of apprehension!

Accordingly the Alto Aria: "Von den Stricken meiner Sünden" (D minor, 3/4, with accompaniment of two oboes and Basso continuo), as well as the Soprano air: "Ich fulge dir," &c., (B-flat major, 3/8), in which the flute part, concertante with the voice, accompanied only by the Bass, depicts the joyful course of a serene soul purely at one with itself,—will on the whole find little recognition. The same may be presumed of the Alto Air with Quartet accompaniment: "Ach, mein Sinn" (F-sharp minor, 3/4), as well as of the Tenor Air, treated with most wonderful figuration in the accompanying instruments (2 Violins d'Amour and Bass): "Erwäge, wie sein blutgefärbter Rücken" ("See how his blood-stained back"), which in fact with its long-spun melismatic turns lies far remote from present ways of feeling and perception.

This will be less the case with the Bass Aria: "Eil, ihr angeführten Seelen" (G minor, 3/8), whose rapid movement hurrying to an appointed goal, four times interrupted by the anxious, eager question of the chorus: "Whither? whither?" rests in the brief reply: "toward Golgotha" and "to the mount of Crucifixion," only to renew its exhortation that we follow in the footsteps of the Lord.

The composition rises still more in the Alto Air: "Es ist vollbracht" ("It is finished"), which soars more freely even in the text. Accompanied by the Viola di gamba in expressive and melodious solo, it utters in a short strain, breathing deepest sorrow, the last word of the Lord before His departure; then, in the flaming up of the victorious announcement ("The hero of Juda conquers with might"), it represents the triumph of the divine word over death and hell, until the jubilation is again made dumb before the repetition of the mournful words: "It is finished," and relapses into the first lament.

This Aria is followed by the words of the Evangelist: "And He bowed His head, and gave up the ghost." Upon this immediately comes in the Bass (D major, 4/4) with the expressively melodious song, accompanied only by the organ and the basses: "Mein theurer Heiland, lass dich fragen" (Dearest Saviour, we would ask Thee), which is interrupted, with deeply searching effect, by the Chorale which has been repeatedly employed already: before the denial of Peter in the first part, as well as after the Lord's words: "Lo! this is thy mother." The simplicity of the orchestral treatment and the melodious rhythm of the song contrast in a wonderfully peculiar manner with the earnest harmony of the Chorale, out of which dark, deep background the Aria stands forth in radiant relief. It is the glorification of the Lord, that here shines forth upon the world out of the solemn moment of death, and finds its open recognition through the Chorale of the praying congregation, through the Christian Church.

With the introductory Chorus began the struggle and the suffering. Here we find the victory, not as in the preceding Aria, still under the suffocating burden of the cross, but in the freedom of its grandeur and its exaltation.

A short Arioso for the Tenor (in the St. Matthew Passion Bach marks these little sentences as Recitative) leads to the last Aria. This Arioso, in which you feel the agitation of Nature after the departure of the Lord still vibrating, is one of the most beautiful pieces of the work. Under the prolonged high tones of two flutes and two Oboi di caccia the string quartet moves tremulous in the after-murmur of the storm, while the Tenor in expressive recitation sings the beautiful words assigned to him.

And in tender, tearful melody, introduced and followed by flutes and Oboe di caccia, partly in concerted, partly in united song, the Soprano answers him (C minor, 3/8): "Zerfließe, mein Herze, in Fluhen der Zähren" (Melt, my heart, in floods of tears).

The earthly sorrow for the Son of God, whose majesty and greatness, whose world-redeeming significance his death and wondrous signs have first implanted deeply in the soul, flows forth in the tones of this Aria, which is one of the noblest and most deep-felt that Bach ever wrote. Formed as if out of a single thought, and yet presenting in this in every conceivable variation, it conducts the hearer to the Cross, upon which the body of the Redeemer hangs, no object of terror, but of the deepest grief, pouring itself forth at his feet in streams of tears.

And so we stand just before the end of a work, which, however much we may admire the astounding grandeur of the Matthew Passion, excites not less our deepest sympathy and veneration for its great creator.

f. THE CHORALES.

Before we pass to the very close, we have yet to turn our attention to that series of masterworks, which Bach has incorporated into the Passion Music under the name of Chorales.

The destination of these Chorales has already been pointed out. They were to keep the whole work true to the Christian ground-tone which the divine service of the day (Good Friday) above all required. They also were to serve to bring the listening congregation into active participation in the service, to make them part and parcel of the action and the pious meditations based upon it. For the Christian Church Song belongs to the religious cultus as an artistic element. Where this element is taken up by the whole congregation, it expresses itself in the Chorale, as the universal basis of the divine service. This appears more in the Passions, than in the Cantatas of Bach, as a pervading thought.

This is not the place to justify the way in which the great composer has set his Chorales just as we find them here. As they are, they are in their appropriate place. They are masterworks of a peculiar kind; and by their expressive treatment, entering so fully into the character of the situation, they produce the most striking effect.

The very first Chorale: "O boundless Love," which follows close upon the repetition of the Chorus: "Jesus of Nazareth," is set in such a way that every word calls out the noblest feeling. How incomparably beautiful is the conduct of the voices at the words: "dieser Marterstrasse" ("this street of martyrdom")! What a deep feeling finds expression in the concluding strophe: "And Thou must suffer!" We find again the same preëminence, we might say the same predilection, in the treatment of every single one of the Chorales which are incorporated into this beautiful work. When, after Christ says: "If I have spoken well, why smitest thou me?" the Chorale: "Who could so rudely smite Thee?" sets in in the full harmony of its tenderly melodious measure; or when, after the words: "My kingdom is not of this world," rises the firm and solid strain: "Ah mighty King, through all the ages great," with its wonderfully moving bass; when the Chorale, breathing steadfast faith in deepest grief, begins:

"Within my heart deep dwelleth Thy name and cross alone," and dies away so mournfully: "For thou hast bled to death,"—the impression universally will be a powerfully great, an elevating and consoling one. But everywhere, too, is the expression of the words and of the situation mirrored in these Chorales with a fidelity, a lofty, tranquil grandeur, which continually reminds us that it all belongs to a divine service in the church, in which we too are permitted to take part.

We might in this connection call attention to one Chorale, just before the closing chorus, which completes the picture of the sufferings of Christ: "O hilf, Christe, Gottes Sohn." What a depth of sorrowfulness, what steadfast trust and confidence speak from this harmonious masterpiece! The words: "durch dein bitteres Leiden," and again: "All Untugend meiden." finally the two concluding stanzas, lift this little composition to a grandeur and an elevation that place it by the side of the first masterpieces ever yet created.

In the Matthew Passion prominent significance is attached to the Chorale: "O Haupt, voll Blut und Wunden" ("O Head, all bruised and wounded"), which recurs several times in the course of the work. So here the Passion Song: "Jesu's sorrows, pain and death" is introduced by Bach in three particularly conspicuous places: first, after the denial of Peter; secondly, after the words which Christ upon the cross addresses to his mother; and for the third time, after the words: "It is finished."

Here too,—apart from the inner reasons which Bach had for such repetition of the same Choral melody,—we see how paramount an end it was with him, and how earnestly he strove for it, to secure the character of unity to the impression made by the whole work.

g. THE CONCLUDING CHORUS.

And so we enter the profound mood of the wonderful concluding chorus: "Rest, ye weary sacred limbs!" Tranquil sorrow, trust in the redemption, steadfast faith, speak out of this clear stamped melody and deep felt harmony. We stand at the grave of the Lord. The body, wound in linen clothes with spices, is lowered into it. The friends and disciples, who have followed him thither, cast one last look of love upon the dead outward form, in which the divine prophet had so long lived among them and taught them, in which he had even now endured the last fearful agony before them. Like prayers for blessings on him, the tones of the pious song descend. And when the grave is closed, then there resounds, before the crowd have parted, in firm and solid harmony, the Chorale:

"Ach Herr, lass dein lieb Engelein
Am letzten End die Seele mein
In Abrahams Schoos tragen," till the tones die away with the words:

"Herr Jesu Christ, erhöre mich,
Ich will dich preisen ewiglich."

The friends and disciples leave the grave. We too go with them. Consoled, uplifted, full of new strength of faith, we retire from a place where the Gospel and Christ's offering for Man have been taught us in the noblest manner, interwoven with the loveliest flowers of Art. We have taken part in his sorrows, and feel ourselves purified thereby, brought nearer to the Lord whom we revere.

Such is the form and outline of the work of the great master, which we have sought to expound, both as a whole and in its several parts.

Only a man of the great reach and power of Bach could have resolved to go beyond the lofty grandeur of this work, and create one even greater, even more complete and perfect. His gigantic mind shrank not from a task like that which he had set to himself in the St. Matthew Passion, to which we shall now turn our attention.

Additional Accompaniments.

(From the London Musical World, Dec. 11).

The production of Mendelssohn's versions of the Deltingen Te Deum and Acis and Galatea has once more brought up the vexed question of additional accompaniments. In other words, it has re-opened the dispute as to the liberty of musicians in dealing with the works of their predecessors. It may be well to hear the argument on both sides.

First, let the Purist speak. Stand forward, Mr. Purist, and recite the articles of your belief.

"My belief is founded on reason in the abstract; and, in the concrete, on the reasonable rights of genius to a property in its work for all time. Handel and Beethoven are dead, as to the body; as to the spirit, they are more alive now than ever they were. Sir, I look upon the man who takes away from the work of these, or any other masters, as little better than a thief; and upon him who tampers with their designs as an impertinent meddler. I have only one question for either or both:—By what right? What would happen if a modern painter ventured to adapt the drawing and coloring of Tintoretto or Domenichino to modern tastes; or, if a present-day litterateur accommodated Shakespeare to present-day forms of speech? You know, Sir, that the whole world artistic would give forth a howl of execration. But I disdain to rest my case on analogy. Even if practices like those instanced were common, I would stand up for the inviolateness of a musician's score. That it must not be touched I hold as a principle of general application; but there are special cases which turn the meddling hand into one of sacrilege. The genius of Handel is concerned with one of these. Sir, if 'who drives fat oxen should himself be fat,' who amends Handel should be a greater master than Handel, and who adapts him should be at least his equal. I am not sure that, with regard to the class of works upon which the old master's fame chiefly rests, either his superior or his equal has yet appeared. But I disdain to rest my case upon the absence of competent workers. My principle remains under every condition inflexible:—Hands off the works of genius."

Very good, Mr. Purist; now stand aside, if you please, and let your opponent, Mr. Expediency, have his say:—

"My friend, the enemy, is somewhat dogmatic, but I shall not press him hard on that point, nor shall I quarrel with what seems to him right from his point of view. Unfortunately, his point of view is so low down that he can see next to nothing. All that meets his eye is a 'score,' and, just as when the Israelites lost sight of Moses they worshipped a calf, he worships a 'score.' I also worship, but not with blind adoration, because within my field of vision are some things which set me a-reasoning."

"Let me indicate one of them;—one will suit my purpose, and settle my opponent. It is all very well to talk in grandiloquent terms about the inviolability of a composer's score, and to make comparisons between Tintoretto and Handel. Neither the one or the other are germane to the issue. Let us look at the matter as practical men and not as sentimentalists. Your sentimentalist, like Bully Bottom's lion, is a 'fearful wild fowl' and does an infinity of mischief. A few years ago, if your sentimentalist had had his way, there would not have been a cotton shirt within these narrow seas; while every old lady of our acquaintance would have found it difficult to sweeten her tea. Depend on it, sentimentalism does not make the world go round. Let us take the thing—a most disturbing mote—out of our eye, and then look at this matter of Handel's scores. What do we see! Music;—grand music, which every discerning man admires with all his heart and soul, but to which only the enthusiastic few would listen. The world cannot afford to lose these mighty utterances, yet lost they must be unless accommodated to the world's ear. Here, then, we have the choice of what in deference to Mr. Purist, I will call two evils: the retouching of Handel's scores, or their ultimate neglect. Which of these is the less I leave with confidence to public judgment. One word more:—I grant that only a master should meddle with a master's work, and that, to be ever so great, he should handle it reverently as a sacred thing."

Between these arguments pro and con the public must decide; and to this task we bid the public address itself with such zest as is possible.

(From the Athenæum).

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.—No two works of the maker of music who is the most esteemed in England are more familiar than the Deltingen Te Deum and Acis and Galatea. But they were both clothed with fresh beauty by the additional accompaniments with which they were performed on Wednesday last. Readers of Herr Devrient's "Recollections of Mendelssohn," will recollect that the composer while stationed at Düsseldorf wrote to his friend in Berlin begging him to recover the "scores of the added instruments" in the Library of the Singakademie. Mendelssohn had written them at the request of Zelter, and he was anxious to recover the scores, not only because he intended to bring out one at least of the works, but also because he wanted to make some alterations in his former arrangements. The passage in which he expresses his anxiety on this subject gives the reader an insight into Mendelssohn's extreme solicitude for his art. "It is most important for me," he writes, "to have either my original MS., or else the score from which the performance was then conducted. I will give my reason for requiring it, which you will approve. In the score of Acis I have found amongst many good things, several which I could not now indorse, and want to correct before it can pass into other hands, because I consider this matter of re-instrumenting as requiring the utmost conscientiousness. Now it happens that I recollect having done some still more arbitrary things in the Te Deum than in Acis, and I must expunge these faults (as I now regard them), as I cannot annul the score." Until the publication of this letter, nothing was known of Mendelssohn's additional accompaniments, so that the performance under notice was as interesting as though the work of completion had been undertaken for our express behoof. There is assuredly no need to insist that the accompaniments have been added with a delicately sympathetic hand, and that the master's original design has never been overlooked in the desire to commend his mode of treatment to modern ears. So much must have been safely predicated; more than this is not, in our opinion, to be asserted without deeper study than is possible at this moment. We are so accustomed to Handel's original orchestration that we are in danger of questioning at first hearing the very emendations, or rather adornments, which we should afterwards be most unwilling to relinquish. Nothing left by so consummately accomplished a master as Mendelssohn is to be criticized without the most careful examination. As he himself said, "They," meaning the Berlin Academy, "can instrument their oratorios themselves with a couple of horns and an old comb and kettle drum," and we have had frequent experience that great works may be botched in London after as rough-and-ready a fashion. But Mendelssohn wrought with other tools, and his workmanship is to be scrutinized in another spirit. Enough for the moment to record that all concerned in Wednesday's performance were obviously sensible of the interest attaching to the occasion. Although written in marvellous haste, to celebrate an almost forgotten victory, achieved by a still less remembered conqueror, and although more unequal than most of Handel's works, the Te Deum still keeps its hold on the public ear. As we listen we feel that we are in the grasp of a giant, from whose influence there is no escape. The pastoral opening scenes of Acis show the master in his most gracious mood, but he soon takes delight in the monster Polypheme, and seems to enjoy the picturing of the dismay his footsteps bring. The parts of Damon and Acis were sung by the same singers who lately appeared in the representation of the Cantata at the Princess's; the latter, Mr. Montem Smith, again proving his artistic taste, and the former, Mr. Vernon Rigby, being less coarse than usual. As for Herr Stepan, he must have modelled himself upon Herr Formes. Galatea's peerless songs were rendered by Mme. Lemmens with somewhat overdrawn expression. This clever, pains-taking lady often misses her mark by aiming too high. The choruses were for the most part well sung, but Mr. Barnby on several occasions was led to hurry the time unnecessarily. The true, even singing of Miss Marion Severn in the Te Deum should not be left unnoticed.

(From the Daily News.)

To the Te Deum Mendelssohn has added flutes, clarionets, and horns, and occasionally a contra-fagotto, to reinforce the bass passages; the two trumpets being increased to three whenever these instruments are used; the larger number only appearing occasionally in Handel's score. In fact, the instrumentation has been almost entirely reconstructed, especially in the writing for the instruments just named; which, as in other of Handel's works, is scarcely practicable by any other than an exceptionally skilled player. An especial instance of this occurs in 'Thou art the King of glory,' in which, instead of Handel's original trumpet solo, portions of the passages only are given to the three instruments, sometimes in unison, sometimes in chords, other portions being transferred to flutes, oboes, and clarionets.

Notwithstanding Mendelssohn's own statement, we find some of the changes made in Acis more innovative than any in the Te Deum, although the former has undergone less general alteration. Throughout the Serenata, Handel uses only violins, flutes, and oboes. To these Mendelssohn has added violas, flutes, clarionets, bassoons, horns, trumpets and drums, enhancing the effect not only by increased fulness of sound but also by various added details, full of beauty and variety. He has also introduced a corno Inglese di basso. In several instances, especially in 'The flocks shall leave,' and 'Wretched lovers,' the augmentation of power is especially appropriate. Throughout the work there are abundant fillings in; among which those of the added viola parts are frequently of great beauty. In some instances there are entire alterations of Handel's passages, vocal and instrumental. 'Happy we' has been changed from twelve-eight to six-eight time, which accords better with the rhythm and accent than the original tempo. Mendelssohn has also altered the close of the chorus, and added two bars of symphony, likewise making changes in the choral writing in the part commencing 'See what ample strides he takes.' Perhaps, however, the holdest alterations are in 'Hush, ye pretty warbling choir.' This Mendelssohn has put into three four time, and has changed the florid instrumental passages into triplets of quavers, assigning these chiefly to the violins, and using the ordinary flutes instead of the piccolo. The elaborations and changes made by Mendelssohn in this song are throughout of great value and interest. Exquisite incidental solo passages for flutes and clarionets occur at intervals, leaving the pervading triplet character to be chiefly maintained by the violins; and the general effect is far more refined and graceful than that of the original version, in which there has always been, to our ear, somewhat of pertness and flippancy. Among many felicitous additions may be particularly cited those to the instrumentation of the soprano solo, 'Must I my Acis still bemoan,' in which the original oboe solo of Handel's score is charmingly accompanied by two violoncellos (soli) with exquisite effect.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette, Dec. 9.)

The first of these concerts, given last night in St. James's Hall, brought the musical public face to face with difficulties which are likely to become common. For good or for evil, the lawfulness of 'additional accompaniments' to works written without modern or choral resources is admitted; and we should gain nothing by appeal, if disposed to make it. The question still open for discussion is as to the limits within which one musician may do what he likes with the work of another. That this is a serious question need not be pointed out. Its settlement will either preserve the integrity of genius, or throw genius into the hands of whoever fancies himself able to improve it. Mendelssohn's additional accompaniments to Acis and Galatea, first heard in England last night, contribute towards a decision of the question, by showing some things that ought not to be done. We may do well to look at them; but first let us point out that the date of Mendelssohn's MS. is 1829. When, therefore, the illustrious musician determined to retouch the work of his illustrious predecessor he was a youth of twenty; and, moreover, Acis and Galatea had already passed through the hands of Mozart. But he who in 1836 wrote St. Paul may be pardoned for a consciousness, in 1829, of ability to 'accompany' Handel; while the chances are very much against his knowledge that Mozart had forestalled him. So far, Mendelssohn can hardly be assailed, and had he contented himself with doing for Acis and Galatea what another great genius did for the Messiah, his work would deserve unqualified approval; but the youthful amender of Handel took liberties which ought rigidly to be forbidden without exception. In the introduction to 'Hush! ye pretty warbling choir,' and wherever a similar passage occurs in the song, there is an unbroken flow of triplets; a bar is added before the voice enters; and the characteristic long shake accompanying 'Your thrilling strains' is taken away. In the chorus, 'Happy we,' Handel's final cadence is interrupted by a 6-4-2 chord on the minor seventh of the scale, and a purely Mendelssohnian cadence of three bars follows. Lastly, in 'Wretched Lovers,' some of Handel's rests are shortened one half, and that preceding the exclamation, 'See what ample strides,' filled up. Whether these alterations are for the better or the worse is not the question. In any case they are inadmissible because, once admitted, the principle which guards the integrity of a composer's work is violated, and mischief may, if it pleases, wax rampant.

We come now to the more agreeable task of discussing Mendelssohn's legitimate work. In the first place, he has written a viola part throughout, thus supplying an important want in the score. He has also shown good judgment by the simplification of Handel's 'times'—reducing 9-16 to 3-4 for example—and by management of the 'repeats.' As regards the effect of the orchestration, if we bring forward only two or three instances it is simply because an exhaustive notice would have to speak of each movement, save those not touched at all, like 'As when the dove,' and one or two others which are touched but lightly. The charming air, 'Would you gain the tender creature,' is among Mendelssohn's greatest successes. Nothing could be more exquisite than the effect of the reed instruments and flutes accompanying the voice in contrary motion. Another use of the same instruments with the music of the lovers in 'The flocks shall leave the mountains,' is extremely happy and effective. Most admirable of all, perhaps, is the scoring of 'Must I my Acis still bemoan?' with its two violoncellos soli, as a set-off to the lengthy plaint of the oboe. It is beyond question that the additional beauty with which Mendelssohn has invested Acis and Galatea will go far to condone the liberties to which we have referred.

As well as Acis and Galatea, the Dettingen Te Deum was performed last night, also with additional accompaniments by Mendelssohn. There is, happily, not so much to say against the second as the first, because, one or two passages excepted, Mendelssohn's treatment of the Te Deum may be held up as an example for all who undertake a like difficult task. Two exceptions are important enough to be noticed. The well-known phrases for trumpets and oboes in 'To thee, cherubim,' are slightly altered, and scored for the entire 'wind' band; without, as it seems to us, any increase of effect. Next, the introduction to 'Lord, in Thee have I trusted' has eight bars cut bodily away, and thrown aside. Here, whatever may be gained, something is undoubtedly lost—the integrity of Handel's idea. Surely, the mutilation of so great a master cannot be allowed even to genius. Those errors of taste pointed out, we have nothing but praise for what remains. In fact, Mendelssohn's work is a masterpiece of its kind. His additions fit the original so well, and partake so largely of its spirit and character, that, in some respects, it would be hard to say where Handel ends and Mendelssohn begins. Higher praise could not be awarded.

The story of music so unexpectedly brought into notice, would, doubtless, be interesting; but it has yet to be told. All we know at present is that attention was directed to it by a chance allusion in one of the Mendelssohn letters published by Herr Devrient. This led to its production and to the printing of the Te Deum, by Kistner, of Leipzig. The Acis and Galatea is still in MS.; its speedy publication may, however, be safely anticipated. Meanwhile the conductors of the Oratorio Concerts deserve a hearty acknowledgement of the enterprise which lost no time in bringing Mendelssohn's work before his English admirers.

Handel's "Deborah."

The Oratorio, or rather the Opera, of "Deborah" possesses many of the attributes of a drama, and it was originally intended to be acted at the Theatre Royal in the Haymarket. This intention was resigned; but on its performance the house was fitted up in "a new and particular manner;" and the soloists were sung by the great tenor Senesino, the bass Montegrana, and the women, Strada, Negri, and Bertoli. The tickets were a guinea each, and the subscribers were compelled to pay extra for their boxes and stalls, because the drama was English, the chorus increased, the orchestra enlarged, and the house newly dressed and lighted "in a particular way." The nobility at all this stood at bay; and "Deborah" hastened the real tussle between Handel and the King his supporter, with the noble patrons and subscribers of the opera, his opponents. "Deborah," which was described as a "thing that was better than an opera," was with Handel a success, and he had it performed on many occasions; his enemies considered it a failure, insisting that the houses were empty, that the orchestra was as noisy as it was wretched, and that everybody was weary of a school of music which pleased no one but the composer himself. There can be no question that the double choruses in this oratorio were novelties—novelties not only in this country, but in every musical country in the world. No one had ever written, no one had ever heard—previous to the production of this sacred drama—of such choruses as the "Immortal Lord," "Lord of Eternity," "Plead Thy just cause," and "See the proud chief." Advance in oratorio composition like this can only be compared to the march of Mozart in his opera of "Don Giovanni," and the stride of Meyerbeer in his opera of "Roberto il Diavolo." These three compositions stand foremost in music, like three of the decisive battles of the world. If they had not been written, neither oratorio nor opera would be what they are. Handel was the pioneer, and met with the same fate as did Mozart and Meyerbeer. Mozart was abused for his long songs, for his extended ensembles, his smothering orchestra, his heavy and gloomy melodies. The same sort of abuse was poured out on the devoted head of Meyerbeer, and it was all liberally employed in depreciating Handel and chasing him from the Opera. Handel was compelled to give up the guinea ticket, reduce the boxes and pit to half a guinea, the gallery to five shillings, and suffer the subscribers to pass in with their silver admissions; but reduce his orchestra and chorus he would not, and these, Pope has recorded as "much too many for the fine gentlemen of the age." No doubt the number of voices and instruments employed in this first rendering of "Deborah" were at least double the number ever heard in the theatre before. The Oratorio of "Deborah" is a war song. Fights and battles suited Handel's disposition better than the stage plots of an ordinary love story. It may be difficult to recall exactly the precise state and condition of the old world inhabitants of that tract of country alongside and ahead of the Mediterranean, known as Canaan, Palestine, Syria, Mesopotamia, and so on; but this we know, that they were men of a giant race and particularly skilled in war; for there were five kingdoms reserved specifically to teach the Abrahamite race the art of war. The particular king, whom Deborah was instrumental in deposing, is chronicled as having nine hundred chariots, a countless host, and a general, known for his wisdom and prowess throughout all those parts. Handel's drama is the old story—the true God, against Baal, the false god; and there is the woman Deborah, the generalissimo of the forces, with Barak her lieutenant.

There are great preliminaries and much discussion in this drama, but the great fight and total defeat of Handel and his poet have altogether omitted. We read that the monarchs congregated their armies by the waters of Megiddo, and they were met by those who "fought from Heaven;" the very stars in their coursed warred against the Phœnician captain, his strength was trodden down, the prancings of the mighty ones were broken, and that ancient river, the river Kishon, engulfed the entire army, chariots, and horse-hoofs, and swept them all away. Such is the account that Deborah herself has left in her "Song of Victory," an ode of which, singular to say, Mr. Samuel Humphreys, the author of the libretto of "Deborah," it would seem made little or no use. The salient points of Mr. Humphreys are the prayer for a leader to the host, a brieting imprecation on the idolatrous persecutors of the Israelites, a grand chorus descriptive of the advance of Sisera and his battalions, a noisy and brilliant litany to Baal, the "monarch of the skies," a solemn appeal to the Almighty from the Israelites of just the opposite character, a parley between the priests of Baal and the Israelites, a chorus of hope from the Israelites; and here all action closes, if we except the introduction of the wife of Heber, and her tale to Barak, describing in lengthened recitative how she enticed Sisera into her tent, gave him "a copious bowl, which he quaffed with ecstasy," sank down oppressed with sleep, when she seized nail and hammer, drove the nail into his temple, and in this way "riveted the tyrant to the ground." A stand-up fight was more after Handel's heart, and as he has treated this recitative in a very so-so manner, we may imagine he did not much admire this proceeding of Jael. He adopts, indeed, his great school of picture, and consequent appropriate emotion to the first and second acts of the oratorio; and, with the exception of that wonderful choral combination heard in

"Doleful tidings, how ye wound, Despair and death are in that sound," the funeral wail of Baal's priests on hearing that their great general had thus been unceremoniously put out of the way by a woman, the choruses that are heard in the third act are merely adaptations from other and previous works of the great composer. Fine and grand as are these adaptations, they lose in interest by this transposition, and the Oratorio closes without Handel's usual climax. The double choruses in the two first acts overwhelm and astound. The high emotion passes away, and is not revived by extracts from the Coronation, Chandos, and other less important anthems.

"Deborah" is of the highest interest, because it is all Handel, in his own large and mighty manner. It is not made up like the "Israel in Egypt" and other subsequent works; but it is pure Handel from top to bottom, and it is furthermore the first squeeze of the grape—Handel rioting in all the freedom and magnificence of the new thing. He had written, it is true, his Psalms, Te Deums, Chandos and Coronation Anthems; his Pastorals of "Acis," and his oratorio of "Esther;" but the great choral work in the "Deborah" overpowers all his previous efforts. Its performance astonished Mendelssohn when in this country, and at its conclusion he was heard to exclaim: "Ah! well might Beethoven say Handel is the master of us all."

"Deborah" was given last week in Exeter Hall, by the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society; Sir Michael Costa conducting from a score of his own revised and additional accompaniments. Of the choral effects by so large a body of voice and so well trained a band nothing need be said. It is one of the institutions of the country; and Handel's eight-part chorus of a dramatic nature heard in this way is a ne plus ultra in oratorio performance. In the days of the concerts of Ancient Music it was possible to hear the three great choruses "Immortal Lord," "See the proud chief," and "Plead Thy just cause,"—but the Ancient Concerts are over and gone. Handel now lives chiefly in Exeter Hall, and we trust it will not be long ere there be a repetition of this noble and beautiful composition.—Orchestra, Dec. 17.

A Collegiate and Musical Institute for the Blind.

(From the Daily Advertiser, Dec. 23).

A number of gentlemen, of various professions, met last Wednesday at Dr. S. G. Howe's office, to hear an exposition of the plan for a National Collegiate Institute and Musical Conservatory for the Blind, which he has for a long time been maturing; and which was set forth in the last report of the institution at South Boston.

The doctor began by alluding to that general law of nature which causes a certain number of defective children to appear in every generation. A study of this law enables us to predict, with an approach to exactitude, that under given social conditions, there will be among the next million children born a certain number defective in their bodily organization; and, moreover, that about so many will be blind, so many deaf, so many club-footed, so many harlequin, &c.

The important point is, that the proportion of the whole and of each class is largely under human control, and dependent upon obedience to or violation of cognizable laws.

For instance, the usual proportion of those defective by deafness is about one to fifteen hundred of the whole population of Massachusetts; but in the town of Chilmark, by reason probably of intermarriage, it is more than one in fifty.

Of a million children born in the temperate zone, more than five hundred are born blind, or with organs of sight too feeble to resist ordinary destructive agencies, so that they almost surely become blind. Special researches in certain districts prove that the census underestimates the real number. There are probably at least eight hundred in Massachusetts; about two thousand in New England; and twenty thousand in the United States.

It is easy to teach the blind, hard to teach the deaf.

Blindness obstructs mental and moral development very slightly, deafness very gravely.

Blindness disables the outer man, deafness the inner man.

Blindness is the greater misfortune to the poor, deafness to the rich; nevertheless, no public provision was made for the instruction of the blind in the United States until within forty years, and some time after it had been made for the deaf mutes.

The example first set in Massachusetts was rapidly followed in seventeen other States, where institutions were organized; to which the legislatures of ten neighboring States made provision for sending blind children as public beneficiaries.

These eighteen establishments have about one thousand pupils, boys and girls, who remain under instruction from five to seven years. They are taught the common branches of school learning; a little music; and some handicraft. This suffices for the most of them. It makes them equal, perhaps a little superior, to children of their social position in respect to common school instruction. It increases their self-respect and self-confidence. It inspires the wish to keep themselves out of the dependent class; and it greatly increases their chance of doing so. Most of them find some household or industrial establishment in which they can fill a useful place. Their moderate culture fits them for social companionship; and their little knowledge of music is a source of enjoyment to themselves and to those about them.

Throughout New England and most of the Middle and Western States, any parent of a blind child can have him taught at public charge; and, if the special school is not near his door, the child is taken to it, kept and taught, without his being put to more cost than are his neighbors, who send their child to the common school.

One feature of this public provision is, that the claim of blind children for special instruction is put upon the same footing as that of ordinary children, to wit: that of justice, not of mere charity. This is very important.

Blindness and dependence—a blind man and a beggar,—have been so long and so closely associated in the public mind, that, in the old countries, whenever institutions for the blind are projected, aid is asked solely in the name of mercy.

The fact of being classed among dependents and considered as objects of special charity, is a source not only of mortification, but of positive disadvantage. It paved the way to the beggar's post at the roadside; for people usually hold themselves at the price set upon them by others.

The effect of these measures in the United States is becoming apparent in raising the blind, as a class, a little above the low social grade in which they are placed, even in the most civilized European countries.

To raise the blind in the social scale—to give them self-respect and the respect of the public—is a prodigious work, because we have to undo the effect of social debasement and of individual dependence. But it has been begun; and, as it must be pleasing in the sight of God, it will surely be successful.

Having provided for common school instruction, for a knowledge of music, and training in mechanical art, what more ought we to do? Just what we should like to have done if we were poor, and a blind child had added to the bitterness of our poverty.

Dr. Howe went on to show that among the numerous graduates of our public institutions, and among blind children who receive elementary education at home, there are a few who have talents and taste, and who sigh for means of higher culture than the State institutions afford. They long to read the classics, and to master the literature of their own languages, in order to gratify their tastes, to lift themselves to an intellectual level with the best society, and to add to their means of usefulness in life. History furnishes instances of blind children born to wealth, or placed in favoring circumstances, who have become respectable scholars in various departments of knowledge.

But, said he, we need not go beyond the history of our own institution for proof of the capacity of the blind to profit by culture. We have fitted for college two boys quite blind from birth. One entered Harvard University, the other Dartmouth College. Both held their own with their class, and graduated in respectable standing. One became a brilliant musician and a successful teacher of music, and gave great promise, but died young; the other has been for several years principal of the State institution for the blind in Tennessee, and has managed his establishment with entire success.

We need a National Collegiate Institute and Conservatory of Music, specially adapted to the condition and wants of persons whose sight is partially and temporarily impaired by disease, and of those who are permanently blind—an institute in which the course of study shall be the same as in our best colleges. All the teaching would, of course, be oral; and the apparatus and modes of illustration be addressed to the touch. It should be supplied with text-books, maps, diagrams and the like, in raised characters; also a press and apparatus for embossing and printing new books. It should have large collections of models of various kinds, such as weights, measures, tools and machinery; manikins and models showing the anatomy of animals and plants, as well as their outward form. It should have collections of shells, crystals, minerals, plants, seed vessels and the like; models and sections showing geological strata; philosophical apparatus adapted to the touch; in short, everything that can be represented by tangible forms.

It would amaze those who have not thought about it, to know how much can be done in this way. Saunderson, the blind professor of mathematics in Cambridge, England, not only knew ordinary money well, but he was an expert numismatist, and could detect counterfeits in a collection of antique coins better than ordinary persons could do by their sight.

Such an institute should have for professors and teachers able men, with special aptness for adapting their lessons to the condition of their scholars. It should furnish facilities for the study of languages, ancient and modern; of mathematics, of pedagogy, and especially of music.

It should be well provided with everything necessary in a good Conservatory of Music, such as organs, pianos, wind and stringed instruments; and have funds for payment of competent teachers.

Dr. Howe dwelt upon what is self-evident to thinking persons, the advantage which generous culture would give to a blind person, whatever may be his calling.

Such an institute would be useful, he said, to two classes; first, to young men or women retarded, embarrassed, or arrested in the course of their education by some disorder or weakness of sight, which can only be cured by months or years of entire rest to the eyes. Few think they can afford this. They are tempted to use their eyes, more or less. The disease is liable to become chronic; and the sight is often weakened for life, if not totally lost. It is hard to calculate the number of such persons, though it is very easy to see that it must be large.

More than five thousand persons were treated last year for affections of the eye in the public institutions in Boston, besides the large number treated in private practice. So frequent are diseases of the eye, that several eminent physicians practice only as oculists. At a moderate calculation there is (besides those entirely blind) a constant number of three thousand persons with diseased eyes in this State.

Dr. Dix, the oculist, remarked that the estimate was a low one. He thought that such an institute would be of great use. He had known many young persons arrested in their studies by disease of the eyes, to whom it would have been a great blessing. It would have enabled them to rest their eyes entirely for a year or two, without ceasing to study, and would have saved not only their time, but, in some cases their eyesight.

Dr. Howe said that most of the students would come from among the twenty thousand blind persons in the United States, but especially from among the cleverest graduates of the various State institutions for the blind, where only elementary instruction is given.

The only special buildings that such an institute would need absolutely would be two structures, one with rooms for lectures and recitations, and for collections of models; another for music halls, instruction rooms, practising rooms, &c. The buildings could be erected in wood for $20,000 each, above the cost of land. The first could be provided with a nucleus of collections of models for about $5,000; and with printing press and the means of embossing for $5,000 more. The collections would almost certainly be increased by donations.

The music hall could be provided with an organ, ten pianofortes, and a collection of musical instruments for about $15,000. Everything, however, would have to be done in the plainest and most economical manner.

It is reasonable to expect that an adequate yearly allowance would be made by the legislature of our State for scholarships; and that other States would send a number of select pupils from their several institutions, and pay a suitable price for their education. If there were a fund large enough to pay, by its interest, the salaries of professors, the other current expenses would be small.

No money should be invested in a huge pile of bricks and mortar, in which to lodge and board the scholars. It would be better to board them in neighboring families, because all the disadvantages of the method commonly adopted in colleges (which is a cross between convent and barracks) are intensified in the case of the blind. No external influences should favor the tendency which a common infirmity readily engenders, to social segregation of the sufferers, and to a spirit of caste among themselves.

The question of location should be settled mainly in view to two things: first, easy access to the musical centre of a large city, so that students could constantly hear the best performers and associate with artists. They must breathe a musical atmosphere. There can be no substitute for this. Second, the location must be in view to facilities for attending ordinary lectures upon such branches of science and learning as they would hear with advantage. Cambridge, perhaps, would be the most suitable place in the United States.

There are certain strong considerations, which intelligent blind persons will appreciate, in favor of having the college entirely separated from an ordinary institution for the blind; and being under a distinct board of trustees.

It will be seen that Dr. Howe contemplates an entirely new establishment, such as does not exist in the world. He says this is the next step to be taken for the elevation and the happiness of an unfortunate class of our fellow men, who have been in all ages, and to a considerable extent still are, classed among paupers and treated as dependents. The offer of an opportunity to the most gifted among them for broad and generous culture, would be only the logical result of the successful efforts which have been made in our country to give to all of them the opportunity of elementary instruction. Shall we not follow in the way which duty commends to our conscience, and clarity to our hearts?

After his remarks, Dr. Howe introduced three interesting little blind boys, who are now under training for a college course.

They read the Book of Viri Romæ in Latin; and showed considerable proficiency in the language.

No books have, as yet, been printed for the blind in Greek; nevertheless, these boys showed how easily the grammar of the language can be taught by oral instruction.

The gentlemen present were much interested, and seemed convinced that the enterprise is practicable.

No vote was passed; but the proposition met with general acceptance, and preliminary measures were taken to carry it into execution.

It is understood that the Treasurer of the Perkins Institute will receive funds for the general purposes of that establishment; or for the proposed collegiate Institute; or for printing books; or to be funded, as the donors may direct.

Our Amateurs.

(From the Nation, New York.)

Without a doubt, music is the art that is most fostered among us. No parlor is considered furnished that lacks a piano. No young lady's education is thought complete without some knowledge of the divine art. While abroad the opera only exists through subsidies from the state, here the popular taste for music supports at least one, sometimes two and three companies at the same time. But the greatest evidence of the vital hold that this art has upon us is in the number of amateur societies that exist in this city, of a few of the most prominent of which we purpose giving some account.

And first, it may be premised that with all this broadcast culture of music, and in despite of the hundred thousand pianos that are made in this country every year, and the tons of musical compositions that are published, and of the fact that music is taught in the public schools, so that the whole people may be said to be educated in it, yet we have no national music, and have produced scarcely a single musical composition that rises to the dignity of fourth-rate merit. Drawing and painting and sculpture are comparatively neglected here—certainly are not universally taught—and yet we have produced painters who have challenged the attention, if not the admiration of the world, and sculptors who fully rank with those of other nations. The pictures of Church and the statues of Powers, Crawford, and Story are as well known on the other side of the water as on this, but though we have an army of composers there is not one among us that has risen above the rank and file, or been able to create a single composition that is really an addition to the musical literature of the world—not even a song, much less a symphony. The works that have been produced are feeble imitations of foreign models. Mortifying as the fact may be to our vanity, it must be acknowledged that the little music we have that possesses really distinctive American characteristics takes its inspiration from the negroes. Those rude refrains that tell the story of the poor black "Way down upon the Swanne River," or in "Old Virginny," or of the "Old Kentucky Home" have really found their way round the world. They are but the echoes of a miserable plantation life, but they are heard in the great salons of Europe. The rest of our music has no vitality of its own. It is constructed on either the German or the Italian models. Between these two schools our teachers also are divided, and they carry with them their pupils to the one side or the other—for the schools are, to a great extent, in antagonism.

Those of our amateurs brought up in the Italian school affect to despise German vocal music as being harsh and unmelodious, and recognize no merit in anything that is not extracted from the opera, while, on the other hand, the Germans find these Italian arias and cavatinas tiresome, meaningless, and frivolous. This division of sentiment is as noticeable among the amateur musical organizations of this city as it is among individuals: some of them sing nothing but the compositions of the Italian school, others nothing but those of the German. Of course, in the matter of musical organization our Teutonic friends altogether take the lead. They have brought with them the traditions of their fatherland, and directly they get here they crystallize naturally and as a matter of course into musical clubs, devoted to the music of their own nationality.

The best known among these clubs are doubtless the Liederkrantz and the Arion. In some sort they are rivals—in a pleasant and friendly way to be sure, but still sufficiently so to make each a little jealous of the success of the other, and anxious to take the first place in the public estimation. Both organizations have brought themselves more prominently into public notice than the other kindred societies, by the masked balls that they are in the habit of giving at the Academy of Music every winter, in which each strives to outdo the other in the magnificence of the appointments and the brilliancy of the entertainment. But there are many other musical societies among our resident German population of nearly equal merit, if of less celebrity, than the two we have named. In all there are in this city and its immediate suburbs nearly a hundred, of which there are sixty-four in New York. Among the most prominent of them are the Schillerbund, the Saengerbunde, the Teutonia, the Beethoven-Maennerchor, and the Mozart-Verein.

These societies are stimulated to practice by the prize festivals that are given every alternate year. The latest of these was held in Baltimore, last July; the next will take place in this city, in 1871. At the Baltimore Saengerfest twenty-nine societies attended from this city. The Liederkrantz appeared with 74 members, the Saengerbunde with 64, the Schillerbund with 59, the Arion with 52. There was intense interest felt between the Liederkrantz and the Arions as to which should take the first prize. The former gained it, to the great mortification of the members of the latter society, who failed even in taking the second prize—a humiliation from which they have not yet recovered. The usual insinuations that the judges had been bought were freely made, and the Arions even, by challenge, attempted to draw their successful rivals into a supplementary contest before another set of judges; but the sagacious men of the Liederkrantz felt the laurels secure upon their brows for two years at least, and failed to see the advisability of risking them to no purpose. At the contest the Arions had sung an easy and insignificant song, which had, perhaps, its weight with the judges in contributing to their defeat. Since then they have given a concert here, and, to show what they could do, sang on that occasion the most difficult of all the songs that were given at the prize contest, but sang it so badly as to reflect no credit upon themselves whatever.

The system upon which most of these societies are conducted is the same. Many of them are incorporated, and some own valuable property and have handsome club-houses and concert-halls. They are supported by the initiation fee and the annual dues of the singing and non-singing members. The Liederkrantz has a double chorus, singing sometimes as a male voice chorus, but having also ladies in the society, which enables them to give compositions written for mixed voices. They own three adjoining houses in Fourth Street, where they have ample club accommodations for their members and a fine and spacious concert-hall. They support a school also, where young ladies are taught to sing and play gratuitously. The society consists of about eleven hundred members, of whom some nine hundred and fifty are subscribing or non-performing members, and among these are almost all the wealthiest and most distinguished of our German population and very many music-loving Americans. The concerts of the society are for the most part private, but the finest choral and orchestral compositions are given at them, for the club has an amateur orchestra of about fifty members. Mr. William Steinway is the president, and Mr. Pauer the conductor. This society has been in existence about twenty-two years. It took the first prize not only at the contest at Baltimore, last summer, but also at that at Philadelphia in 1867, and so feels double-crowned. Their charter enables them to hold property to the value of $500,000. They have performed all the great choral works of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and of many of the minor composers.

The Arion Society is somewhat similar in organization, except that it is simply a male chorus, there being no ladies among the singing members. It is under the very able direction of Mr. Carl Bergmann. It was organized in 1854, is an off-shoot of the Liederkrantz, and has its headquarters at the Germania Assembly Rooms. The society has about four hundred and thirty members, of whom some sixty are in the chorus, the rest subscribers entitled to admission to all the entertainments given.

Last winter the Liederkrantz and Arion came together at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, and sang the choral parts of Wagner's Lohegrin. Both of these organizations are thoroughly democratic. A common love for music is the strong bond that makes of them a brotherhood. Art is the great leveller, and the wealthy merchant and broker, the barber, the baker, the tailor, the physician, and the lawyer stand shoulder to shoulder, animated by a common sentiment of artistic devotion, and clink their glasses in the genial fellowship of song.

The other German societies are so similar in their character that no separate mention of them is needed. All of them have their weekly rehearsals and their frequent social meetings, at which every kind of recreation is indulged in—sometimes a fancy-dress ball, sometimes pageants and processions and carnivals, sometimes dramatic representations, and at all times music. A pleasant example of their ways of enjoyment is found in the festival held by the Arion Club at their rooms on Christmas night. There was music and, of course, the inevitable lager-bier, and dancing—for ladies were invited—and an immense Christmas-tree brilliantly lighted and loaded with gifts, of which there was one for every member of the club, and which were presented with humorous remarks by the orator of the evening. It is impossible to over-estimate the good effects of these organizations in fostering content and kindly feeling, in relieving the wear and tear of long days of hard work, in making life pleasant, and in creating a love of innocent pleasures in place of vicious ones. It is but forty years since these organizations were first started in Germany by old Zelter, Mendelssohn's teacher, and his friend Fleming, and now they exist everywhere in Germany. A single Band there has over eighty thousand members, while our Northeastern Saengerbund has but two thousand singing members. The drill of these clubs would be vastly better if the members did not hold the beer-glass in one hand as well as the music-book in the other—but then the good-fellowship would be less.

Just at present the Arions are hard at work at Von Weber's "Freyshütz," which the society proposes to give at the Academy of Music, in January: Mr. Canditis taking the tenor part, and Mr. Rammertz, a glorious basso, who will certainly make a strong impression, assuming the role of Caspar. The representation will probably be a better one than the opera has ever received here. It certainly will so far as the choral parts are concerned.

It remains for us in a future article to speak of our numerous American amateur societies, some of which are known through their public performances, for instance, the Harmonic, the Mendelssohn Union, and the Berge Choral Union, while others, though of a more private character, are accustomed to sing to very numerous invited audiences, as, for instance, the several clubs under the direction of Mr. Abella, Mr. Rivaldo, and Mr. Mosenthal. In those are to be found the best of our native amateurs, and the performances of some of them attain a high standard of excellence, and give bright promise of the cultivation of a sound taste for good music among us.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Jan. 11.—Our 2d Philharmonic Concert occurred on Saturday evening at the Academy of Music. Messrs. S. B. Mills (piano) and Ole Bull (violin) were the solo artists.

Symphony in C.....Raff.
Concerto in D, 1st movement.....Mozart.
2d Concerto, F minor, op. 21.....Chopin.
Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz.
Fantasia from "Romeo".....Bellini.
Jubel Overture.....Von Weber.

The Symphony is a work of very great ability and talent, and totally devoid of those strainings atter effect which are generally characteristic of the school to which the author belongs. The first movement—an Allegro moderato—has a sort of pastoral character, and the second theme is of great beauty and sweetness; the melodic continuity of purpose is admirable in this as in the subsequent movements.

The 2d movement—Andante con moto—is of quasi religious character and reminds one a little of the Larghetto in Schumann's B-flat Symphony. The 2d theme of this movement is particularly excellent, and this and the original theme are "pointed against" each other in a masterly and most effective style. The movement closes with an exquisitely beautiful suspended chord in a remote key, and, after a few measured drum taps, dies quietly away.

The 3d movement—Allegro Vivace—is in G minor and apparently in 3-8 time. It is quite Mendelssohnian in character, both as regards theme and instrumentation. The trio is in C major, and possesses numberless little runs for the wood wind instruments. This is really very neat, although the rhythm is greatly involved and it is difficult to catch the time. After the trio comes a delicious melodic phrase in A flat, which is thoroughly Schumann-like in character and style, and which vanishes after a few bars, (far too quickly for one's enjoyment) to be succeeded by the first theme in G minor.

The 4th movement—an Allegro con brio—is preceded by a short Adagio in A flat, which prepares the way for a vigorous theme in C, taken first by the violas and soon afterwards by the other instruments. This movement is less original than the others, but is nevertheless strong and good; as a whole, the Symphony is a thoroughly interesting and eminently musical composition, in which the various themes are sufficiently original, while the orchestration is admirable. It was of course capably played by the unrivalled orchestra under Bergmann's careful and intelligent direction.

Ole Bull, whose reception was much less enthusiastic than it was last season, played the movement from Mozart's Concerto in a very good style, and with measurably good intonation for him. His manner, too, was less exaggerated than it ordinarily is, and so the performance was quite enjoyable. Being encored, he played an arrangement of the Adagio from Mozart's Clarinet Quintet; this he played in four parts—a remarkable feat, which is his only real excellence—and terminated with some very incomplete and unartistic "harmonies."

Chopin's superb Concerto was admirably played by Mr. Mills; the orchestral performance was a little less excellent, but it would indeed be wonderful if everything were always done to perfection. Mr. Mills's rendering of the exquisite Adagio was careful, artistic, and thoroughly imbued with the poetic sentiment so essential to a proper appreciation and interpretation of Chopin. For an encore Mr. M. played very neatly Chopin's beautiful little Valse in D flat, op. 64.

The 3d Concert will occur on Feb. 5th, 1870, and the orchestral selections will be Spohr's Symphony "Consecration of Sounds," Beethoven's Overture to "Leonora" (No. 2), and a new Overture by Goldmark called "Sacuntala." The solo artists will be Miss Kellogg (soprano) and Mlle. Mchug (piano).

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 15, 1870.

Music at Home.

Music making never went on at a brisker rate among us, nor in more various forms,—all more or less earnest, with a growing tendency that way. English opera at the Boston Theatre (chiefly of the Balfe and Wallace description, promising better by and by) does not prevent a really earnest, promising beginning upon the rehearsal of Bach's Passion Music by the Handel and Haydn Society. Of Symphony Concerts there is one very bright one to record, and another in preparation. And there has been Miss Topp's "Farewell;" and the beginning of a new series of Pianoforte Matinees by Perabo; Chamber Concerts by teachers and pupils of the two Conservatories, at Chickering Hall; then, "Midsummer Night" is every night at Selwyn's; the Parker Club are ready to treat their friends with music from Gluck's Orfeo and Mendelssohn's Athalie; and much more that escapes the mind this moment. Great too is the activity in Concerts (miscellaneous and of the Chamber form), still more in Oratorio singing, in the larger towns about us. Salem, for instance, with a vigorous young Oratorio Society of the greatest promise, is about producing the "Messiah." Indeed so much of this sort goes on in "the provinces," that it is hard to keep our Boston orchestra musicians, even our Conductors, at home enough for our own work; they have all taken to missionary enterprise, travelling through wide dioceses. Why do not more first-class musicians come and settle down in Boston? In and from this centre they must always find enough to do.—But we must pass to our fortnightly review, glancing, more briefly than usual, at the more interesting occasions which we were so fortunate as not to lose.

If the fourth SYMPHONY CONCERT was one of the grandest—all Beethoven—the fifth (Dec. 30) was one of the most brilliant, entertaining and exciting; the audience still larger than before, and evidently well pleased. These were the elements and this the way they were bound up into a programme:

Overture to "Jessonda".....Spohr.
Fantasia, for Pianoforte, with Orchestra, on Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" (first time in Boston).....Liszt.
Miss Alide Topp.
Symphony, in D, No. 5, (first time).....Haydn.
Overture to "Medea".....Cherubini.
Weber's Polonaise in E, arr. for Pianoforte and Orchestra, by.....Liszt.
Overture to "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn.

The "Medea" Overture deserves first mention in the order of importance; for it is one of the best overtures ever written, whether in point of deep, earnest feeling and significance, or of complete artistic unity of expression and great style; in its simplicity great, and all alive with genius. When shall we hear that noble opera of Cherubini in our theatre? That would be an event in our lyric annals, almost as notable as the tardy reception of Bach's Passion Music into our list of Oratorios. Spohr's Overture to "Jessonda," too, with its sombre opening, its bright gypsy tambourine theme, and its impassioned climax, is admirable—in no whole work is Spohr more happy,—and made a fine impression. And Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture, so highly dramatic, strong, and outside of his own subjectivity for once, never fails to keep the listening faculties awake and gratified. All three Overtures were in the main well played, although pure intonation in all the reeds and brass is not yet a thing that we can count upon with comfortable assurance.

The Haydn Symphony, though played here for the first time (at least for many years), must have sounded quite familiar to many in most of its movements through various pianoforte arrangements, &c. It is one of the loveliest of the tribe, and they are all modelled on the same form. The Largo especially is full of beauty, rising to moments of grandeur now and then. But what could Father Haydn mean by that sudden fortissimo on the deep C of the bassoon, startling the ear in the midst of the soft dying away of the strain? Probably some joke with the musicians of his Kapelle, who may have grown sleepy just there in rehearsal. To many, perhaps the majority, this Symphony was the most delightful feature of the concert. Others, doubtless, who are just passing through that phase of their musical experience in which everything of Haydn's sounds old-fashioned, wearisomely perfect, tame in its very elegance, "altväterisch," as the Germans say,—but who will certainly come back to him some day, rejoicing to find anything so fresh and young, when all the young seem prematurely old,—had only their sense of virtue to fall back upon in patiently resigning themselves to what we older ones, who have sown our musical wild oats, did heartily enjoy. Why, coming to it after the dazzling gaslight virtuosity and extravagance of Liszt, was it not like a refreshing walk into the cool green meadows, sweet with flowery fragrance and the happy song of birds!

And so we come to Liszt, and to his enthusiastic, charming, brilliant young interpreter, the Fräulein ALIDE TOPP. She is plainly partial to her master; and the selections—being both of them transcriptions of other men's original works—were somewhat strange for a concert of this kind. Yet both were interesting. No themes could suffer less, perhaps, from being shaken up in Liszt's fantastical kaleidoscope, than just this wild, whirling Dervish chorus of Beethoven,—the very genius of extravagance in itself,—and the familiar Turkish quickstep. So the former works itself up into frenzy under the pianist's hands, until you seem to feel the ruined city ringing full of howling Dervishes; and the latter steals in, in snatches most ingeniously, as from a distance, then plays itself prettily through in tinkling upper octaves, like a musical box, then swells to a grand tutti fortissimo as it comes near; and both themes are worked together awhile; so that indeed the whole impression is vividly picturesque and helps to bring out what was in Beethoven's fancy. It is immensely difficult, and was played with unflagging strength, precision, brilliancy, and fine light and shade. There is a certain verve and magnetism in Miss Topp's playing, making all for the time being share her own enthusiasm. It was at least a piece exceedingly well suited to her. The Weber Polonaise is something more symmetrical and beautiful in itself; and what Liszt has done for it, especially by way of orchestral accompaniment, only enriches it and adds to its lustre. This too was finely played, yet in a somewhat slower tempo than we have heard before. The young pianist made a very marked sensation, showing that she still holds her own with a public that was almost wild about her when she first came, and which has ever since been partial to her. On being recalled, she played a familiar Nocturne of Chopin with exquisite taste.

From Topp to Topp. Two evenings later, New Year's, came the lady's Farewell Concert, which was a success and in the main highly interesting. The Septet by Hummel, with all the instruments, and Mr. PERABO's infallibly fine rendering of the piano part, formed the opening and, musically, the most important feature of the programme. Miss TOPP's own selections were the B-flat minor Scherzo of Chopin; a Cachoucha by Ruff, followed by that remarkable Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt, which she always played so wonderfully, and never more triumphantly than this time; and a set of those Lisztian arrangements of the genial Schubert dances, called "Soirées de Vienne." All most enjoyable.

She also, for a graceful close of the concert, played the accompaniment to Miss ADELIAE PHILLIPS's fine singing of an Arietta by Blumenthal; "La Capriciosa" Miss Phillips also sang, as only she can sing, a "Prayer" by Donizetti. Mr. WHITNER's noble bass was heard to good advantage in the Mozart Concert Aria: "Per questa bella mano," and in Randegger's Sea Song. Mr. LUTHEMANN's violin solos were remarkable as feats of virtuosity; but his selections [from Paganini and Ole Bull] were merely of that artificial pyrotechnic order which long ago became a drag in concert rooms.—Miss Topp goes followed by the good wishes of a host of friends here, who hope that she will return before a great while.

We thought that Mr. PERABO was happier than usual in the making up of his last programme [Friday, Jan. 7]; it had unity and pleasing contrast as a whole, and each thing in it helped to make the others better. Beginning with that nobly impassioned Prelude and Fugue by Mendelssohn in E minor, he then played a really faithful, simply interpretative transcription by Liszt of Beethoven's Liederkreis, or cycle of six songs: "To the distant Beloved," in which the subtly shifting moods and phases of the tender passion,—deep and spiritual, as are all the musical confessions of that solitary lover—are so delicately breathed forth. Liszt was wisely content here to let Beethoven's own soul sing; and our interpreter plainly had no higher, or rather a no less worthy aspiration, of which he did not fall short, but enabled us to feel and realize the poetry and beauty of the song.

The first and last [in C minor and G minor] of Bennett's Six Studies, op. 11, were a revelation to most of us of the fresh, original fancy of a composer always elegant, but too near to Mendelssohn to often shine with what appears unborrowed light. These were graceful, charming contributions. The D-major Sonata of Schubert [op. 58], was a welcome renewal of some of the choice impressions of past winters in which Mr. Perabo introduced us to so many of these products of rare genius. We enjoyed it more than ever, and the feeling inspired by the wonderful Andante con moto, with its variations, was profound.

For next week the young pianist has in readiness for us a new Sonata by Richter, of Leipzig, Beethoven's Sonata, op. 27, No. 1, and one of the newly published piano pieces of Schubert.

Certainly we never had so good a specimen of Opera in English, as that which is heard and seen now nightly at the Boston Theatre. Madame PARFA-ROSA, equal herself to any task, knew all the requirements, knew her public, and has organized about her a really complete and admirable company. The opening performance of Wallace's "Maritana," proved it to the satisfaction and delight of a very great audience. Orchestra and chorus, both, for these times, were uncommonly good, and our friend CARL ROSA has grown well at home in his Conductor's seat. Minor particulars were well cared for, nothing slighted, the mise en scène as good as the Theatre affords—and so one could enjoy, so far as the performance went, a reasonably complete, consistent whole. For the principal characters were excellently filled. Mme. ROSA, who had nearly the whole first act to herself, in the pretty Gitana rôle, seemed to us to sing more perfectly than ever; the sweeter qualities of her voice were singularly manifest, and her easy, finished, exquisitely shaded rendering of the light and florid music left nothing to be desired in that way. The more pathetic pieces, too, in the later acts were given in a large, true style. Her acting was at least lively, and always in good taste and keeping. Mrs. SQUIN makes a pretty figure as the boy Lazarillo, and her contralto voice and song are winning. The strength and beauty of Mr. CASST's tenor voice, whom we had known only in Oratorio, surprised us; he has made great progress as a singer; as an actor, too, he filled the difficult part of Don Cesar de Bazan not badly. Mr. CAMPBELL's bass told powerfully in the part of the intriguing Minister, which he sustained with dignity, and his singing of the ballad-like airs was better than they deserved. We suppose it is in the very nature of such sentimental ballad singing before encoring audiences, to lead one into some overdoing of pathos, tricks of tremolo, &c., which to a healthy taste soon stales. The opera itself, which we heard for the first time, has much pleasing and effective music in it, and to us was much more enjoyable in the passing moments, transitions, orchestral suggestions, and several felicitous ensembles, than in the set airs. Wallace was a virtuoso of the violin, which accounts for his introducing the violin solo, which might have been composed by any of the tribe, but which was so well played by Rosa that he was compelled to repeat it. There was good harp playing in the orchestra, which helped to make Mme. Rosa's song of "The harp in the air" twice beautiful.

On Tuesday, Balfe's thin and hackneyed opera, picturesque as a mere play, "The Bohemian Girl," was well presented, the second Conductor, Mr. RUFF, presiding. It gave us a first taste of Miss ROSE HENRY, as Adine,—petite, blonde, charming, full of life and nature, and singing with a light, sweet, even voice with birdlike facility and no lack of feeling. Also Herr NORDBOM, the young Swedish tenor, whose tones, the middle ones at least, have the ring of true gold, though yet rather in the rough ore, while his upper notes were painfully forced; but it was clear he had a cold. For the rest, there is a manly, earnest, direct way about him, from which something may be expected. Mr. SQUIN made a capital Devils-hoof.

For the third night, Trovatore. So far this might be called the Gypsy Opera: Marianna is a gypsy; "Bohemian Girl" is gypsy; and then comes Lucerna; the first two are well enough, but we do not like our gypsies roared.—Next week, Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro!"

Parisian Notes.

[Which we are permitted to cull from the diary of a young man of the Future.]

.... We got to Paris in time for me to hear Wagner's Rienzi at the Lyrique, the only one of his Operas with which I was not acquainted. The performance was capital. Nobody did anything that was strikingly great, but all sang and acted well. As for the opera itself, I never should have believed that such a volume of sound could have been produced and sustained with such unflagging energy by any orchestra under the moon. It strikes me as the little work of a great genius. I believe it was his first grand opera, written before the "Flying Dutchman." There are grand and beautiful things in it though, and nobody but a great genius could have written it. The scene where the alarm trumpet sounds and the bell of the Capitol chimes in, is wonderfully powerful. The famous air of the peace-messenger (soprano and female chorus, with accompaniment of wind instruments) is one of the most beautiful things I have ever heard. The Opera as a whole is fatiguing rather than tiresome. The young composer had not yet cut loose from the traditional Italian and French tantamara. Whenever he wanted a fortissimo, he got it by blowing and clashing with his loudest instruments, instead of playing loud with his quartet, reeds and horns. This perpetual use of all the strongest orchestral means, besides tiring the ear, robs those passages where the trombones and cymbals are used, as Hector Berlioz says, "characteristically," of more than half their effect. In Tannhäuser Wagner has changed his tactics entirely. Why the French government allow Rienzi to be put upon the stage at all, is more than I can make out. Rienzi rushes about in the "casaque rouge," talking about "égalité du peuple, liberté," etc., and the last scene is an émeute of the worst kind....

.... Last Wednesday I went to hear Faust at the Grand Opera. Ah! Faure as Mephisto! There never was or will be anything like his singing and acting. I agree with L. in not thinking Carvalho equal to what Kellogg was in Marguerite; but she is by no means to be despised. They gave the Walpurgisnacht scene, which contains, in my opinion, some of the grandest music in the opera. The mise-en-scène is simply marvellous. The scene opens on the top of the Brocken by moonlight; witches making soup over blue fire, and skimming kettles full of green steam, etc. When Faust and Mephisto appear there come two grand unison crashes on C and G; then the clouds float away, the full orchestra with harps playing pianissimo in C and F; and Faust and Mephisto find themselves in the arena of an amphitheatre, surrounded by nymphs and sylphs and goddesses in Nabian costumes, etc., etc. The effect is beautiful. Then follows a beautiful chorus in F, (rather like the beginning of our "Down in the cornfields,") and a marcato solo by Mephisto. All very beautiful. Then comes the ballet which Gounod has lately introduced. The music is better than Ambroise Thomas's and not so good as Meyerbeer's in Robert. The dancing of the corps de ballet is very pretty, but the solo dancing—well, it is pretty evident what the object of the modern ballet is. The audience, however, rose as one man, woman and child, and cried bravo and clapped their hands.... When the enraptured Faust has been induced to "liquor up" by some of the fair performers, the whole hall, dancers and all vanish, and he and Mephisto find themselves on the Brocken again, with the moon shining and the vision of Margherite standing on a rock with the red line round her neck. If Gounod had not inserted the unnecessary ballet music, and had not cut out the very characteristic and beautiful chorus of sorcerers and drinking song, the Walpurgis-night scene would be equal to if not beyond any in the Opera. The Church-scene was wonderfully given, though the "Choral" in unison was taken much too fast for my taste; the same with the "Si sei tu, io l'amo" in the prison scene, which was sung allegro vivacissimo. I noticed the same thing that Mendelssohn wrote to Bärmann about, viz.: the poorness of the clarinet playing in the orchestra. How I longed to hear some of our Weber's (not Carl Maria's) grand tones! The oboe was also very thin and feeble; but I had the unspeakable delight of hearing the bass drum and cymbals played by separate performers. Just try to induce the H. M. Ass. to try it once in their orchestras. I am sure that they will never go back again to what Berlioz calls the "ignoble noise" of those instruments played by one man, after having once heard them played in the proper way. The difference is immense. They use the trombones with cylinders and pistons at the Opera here, and they have a very thin and mesquin effect.

.... I am wilder and wilder over H. Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, though I have never heard a note of it. The first four movements are as clear and beautiful as any one but a sworn anti-Schumannite can desire. The "Marche au Supplice" must be wonderfully impressive. There are two places in it where the kettle-drums, bass-drum and cymbals come in alone pianissimo on the last beat of the bar. The effect must be extremely grand. It is an "effect" I know, but none the worse for that; and while we are on the subject we might say a few words about this much vilified word "effect." It has lately been much used in opposition to "sincere" or "sincerity" in music, and as almost synonymous with "clap-trap." Now, all music intended for public performance must be intended to produce some effect on the audience. If it is intended to merely surprise the audience and gain applause from mere novelty and oddness, it is certainly clap-trap. If it is intended to amuse the audience and make their time pass pleasantly, it is innocent enough if it passes for what it really is. If it is intended to imitate certain sounds in nature, it is no longer art but artifice. If it is intended to enlist the sympathies of the audience for the beautiful, the sublime, even for the horrible and tragic, it is high art. Now in music there are four means of appealing to the sympathies of the audience, viz.: by melodic progressions, harmonic progressions, accent, and instrumental or vocal coloring or contrast. These means, of course, are almost always employed in combination. Now I cannot see why an artist may not be as sincere in the pursuit of his art, if he employ all these means, as means, as he is when he ignores either totally or partially any one of them. If he makes strange chords and abrupt transitions, to show how much he knows of harmony, or to show that he is not copying from anybody else; or if he makes gorgeous combinations of instruments to call attention to his skill in orchestration, he is insincere in his pursuit of art and his production is mere clap-trap. But if he uses one or all of these means (I don't care if he even brings a horse-fiddle into the orchestra) to make the audience feel what he feels, and to carry them along with him, if he uses them as means to fix his artistic conception and give it life, he is just as sincere an artist when he uses gongs and tam-tams as when he only writes for the old string-quartet. Some of these means may be more essential to good music than others, but that does not make the others ignoble. Does any one charge Correggio or Rembrandt with painting for effect and with artistic insincerity because they employed the most striking effects of light and shade? Does any one taunt Titian and Giorgione with depending upon effects of color for the success of their pictures? Will any one even undertake to say that Raphael and Michael Angelo might not have done much more for art than they did, if they had known how to employ Titian's rich coloring and Rembrandt's effects of chiar d'os curo? Then why will people keep taunting the modern composers with their rich orchestration and instrumental effects? If a composer is unsuccessful in the melodic and contrapuntal part of a piece, and is successful in his instrumental combinations, criticize his composition as you will, but don't charge him with trying to hide poverty of ideas by brilliant orchestration, unless very great carelessness is evident in his work. And, to wind up this exceedingly long winded effusion: the prevailing idea that fine and characteristic orchestration is an easy matter is all bosh. FIL.

Mr. Ritter's Fifth Lecture.

In his fifth lecture on the history of music (instrumental music), Mr. Ritter sketched the progress of instrumental forms up to the time of Bach and Handel. He said that it would condense his lecture, as originally written, too much if he gave the whole development of instrumental music up to our own day. Mr. Ritter's second course of lectures will include and continue this subject; also the modern opera; Church music from the death of Palestrina to our own time; and an account of the progress of music in America, as based upon his own experience. This will fairly cover the ground. After mentioning the ancient forms of song, so early cultivated, Mr. Ritter spoke of the primitive construction of the few instruments used by the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, which were adapted only for dynamic effects, to enliven and mark the rhythm of sacred dances or triumphal marches, or to regulate the motion of the chorus. The Christians accepted these instruments, though at first averse to their introduction in churches. Mr. Ritter then described the ancient Irish harp, and Rotta or bruth (a primitive violin), as well as the rude instruments carried to the south of Europe. "But it was not until the general introduction of harmony, that men gifted with musical talent began, by means of new inventions, to perfect the mechanism of various instruments, and then made use of these inventions for artistic purposes." It is curious to hear that professional musicians at first disclaimed to compose for instruments, but left this to half educated amateurs.

It seems that these professional musicians formed regular corporations in some parts of Germany and France, and their laws were sanctioned by the king or count on whose domains they resided. The head of these men was called "the king of the pipers" or "king of the fiddlers." At a little village in the south of France, near which Mr. Ritter's boyhood was passed, lived and died the last representative of these piper kings. The gradual adaptation of folk songs, as dance tunes, to the instruments, as well as the invention of the score or tablature, was then described. The way in which long sustained, singable tones were first divided into short ones, on account of the inability of most instruments to sustain long ones, was explained; this was called "note splitting" or "coloring" a melody; hence our modern term "coloration" for passages of short tones. An account was then given of the gradual perfection of the organ; of the invention of those instruments that preceded the modern pianoforte; with many curious anecdotes of artists and composers. Very amusing was the account of the late, such a favorite with poets, who, unmusically ignorant of its comic peculiarities and defects, have shed a halo of traditional glory about that instrument. Mr. Ritter, among a few examples of old fashioned dance forms, then played the striking instrumental accompaniment to the duel of Tancred and Clorinda, by Claudio Monteverde, "a remarkable effort of descriptive, dramatic music, and one of the most striking documents of early musical art." Then came an account of the perfection of string instruments by the great Italian makers, and sketches of the lives of such violinists and composers as Correlli, Geminiani, Tartini, etc., and the great harpsichord players, Scarlatti, Porpora, Couperin, Rameau, and others. It seems that after the beginning of the seventeenth century, the organ and the harpsichord obtained the supremacy among instruments. In speaking of the old organists, Mr. Ritter said:—"How simple and modest were the pretensions of these men, yet how deep and truthful are the works which they destined for the adornment of religious service! It must have been only through an exceptional perseverance and application, coupled with great love and veneration for religion and their noble art, that they were able to create such fine and numerous works, for the method of instruction was then very complicated, and encumbered with unnecessary difficulties." Mr. Ritter then spoke of the Gregorian chant as the foundation of all past great Catholic Church music, and the chorale as the groundwork of the Protestant school, and alluded to the style of music that is played and sung in our churches by amateur musicians, in a manner as unflattering as it is unfortunately just, not only of them, but also of some artists by profession, who ought to feel that "noblesse oblige." An amusing account was then given of the forms of composition fashionable in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which seem as comical to us as the polka, mazourka, light ballad, and other of our own superficial fashionable forms will appear to posterity; and a description was added of the way in which the really great composers created forms which bear the impress of the perennial youth of genius. A sketch was presented of the progress of orchestral music as a whole, up to the dawn of the modern German instrumental school.

In closing the present course of lectures, Mr. Ritter spoke of the noble example of the great masters, whose lives of untiring labor, iron perseverance, and devoted industry, strike the student like a reproof of those young aspirants who, not seeing the honor and enjoyment which lie in work for its own sake, would fain dispense altogether with what they call "drudgery;" and reap their reward before they merit it. He quoted Goethe's well-known saying that genius is only another word for industry. He regretted that so few were to be found to imitate these great models; scarcely one who will satisfy his sense of duty (if he has such a sense) as an artist before he yields to pecuniary temptations. The great men are patient; they do not, they did not, attempt to become innovators before they had mastered the alphabet of their art; they did not set up for artists while yet scholars; nor did they besiege publishers before they were able to write with grammatical correctness. After giving one or two anecdotes of those self-suggested geniuses who create and dictate their own laws, and awaken too late from the delusive dream, Mr. Ritter concluded by asking how many of those who profess to be admirers—amateurs—of art,—how many students, how many artists, pause on the way that leads to the temple of music, to reflect on the great minds that prepared that path for them? Minds that not seldom, amid the greatest trials and sufferings, poured out to all men the cup of delight which is so often emptied in ungrateful ignorance. Yet, without a sound knowledge of the historical development of art, no future progress, no broad culture, no solid foundation, and no great success, can possibly be attained by any artist.—N. Y. Weekly Review.

NEW YORK.—The Philharmonic Society gave its second concert of the season on Saturday evening, at the Academy of Music. There was the usual large attendance. A new symphony by Raff, a composer better known to pianists than in the concert-room, was performed. The composition gave proof that Raff is a musician of much learning, and not disposed to yield too far to the vagaries of the extreme men of the German school. His symphony is founded upon the old and well considered formulas, and is worked out in a careful and scholarly manner. The andante movement is full of devotional spirit and idealism, the scherzo is bright, jocose, and very eccentric in rhythm and accent, and the finale buoyant, spirited and interesting.

Mr. Mills played the best, [?] though not the most popular of Chopin's Concertos—that in F minor—a work replete with poetic sensibility and idealism, too subtle for ordinary concert-goers, and of deeper meaning than can possibly be caught in the transient listening of a single hearing. Mr. Mills interpreted the delicate and spiritual thought of the composer in a most finished and artistic manner.

The veteran musician Ole Bull, more elastic, vigorous, and graceful in his years than most men in their youth, played a movement from a violin concerto of Mozart, and also a fantasia of his own on themes from Bellini's "Montecchi e Capuletti." While recognizing this artist's many great merits as a violinist, especially the wonderfully beautiful tone that he draws from his fine instrument, we certainly do not find his style in keeping with the music that one expects to hear at a Philharmonic concert. These were not, as we have always understood the matter, intended to be popular concerts in the ordinary sense of that term, of which there is a sufficiency already, but classical ones, and, at such, the embellishment of Italian operatic melodies with all the tricks of the Paganini school of violinists seems entirely out of place. Not that Mr. Ole Bull did not play these embellishments well (barring his descending scales, the intervals of which are found in no mode, major or minor, Phrygian, Dorian or Lydian that we know of), but that they were best not played at all.

Berlioz's "King Lear" overture was the only remaining work on the programme that calls for special notice. Schumann said that he was always at a loss whether to consider Berlioz a genius or a charlatan, and certainly his "Lear" is a work that eminently conduces to that doubtful state of mind. Lear was a mad old king, and this is a mad old overture—so far so good; the music aptly illustrates the monarch, but Lear was at times something other than mad, and into these moods Berlioz fails to follow him. The overture is fragmentary; an idea is no sooner taken fairly in hand than it is dropped for another; the brass instruments are in a constant fever of climax and trouble. The work is boldly instrumented, however, and serves to bring out the wealth of resource of the noble orchestra. The unison recitative passages for strings, however feeble in themselves, are made rich and sonorous by the combination upon them of such an array of instruments.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Winds across the sea. 3. Eb to g. Mollenhauer. 30
A sweet, flowing poetical ballad, easy of execution.
"Wind that comes across the sea, Whisper something sweet to me."
What that something is will be found revealed in the course of the ballad.
- I know a little widow. 3. Bb to f. 30
A sly and attractive little song about a dainty little widow, who is "cunning, witty, free and easy, yet not bold; like an apple ripe and mellow, not too young and not too old."
- Welcome my bonny lad. 3. C to e. Warnecke. 30
A very pleasing ballad, lively and easy yet not trivial.
- Hoop la! where are we now. 2. F to e. Wellman. 30
What our Girls are coming to. 3. G to e. Pratt. 30
- There's something seems wanting when mother is gone. 2. Bb to C. Turner. 30
A pathetic ballad with chorus, in which the loss of a mother, the greatest of all losses, is touchingly depicted.
- Veni Domine. Trio. Female voices. 5. G minor to g. Mendelssohn. 40
An excellent piece for class or choir.
- Do I love thee. 5. Ab to g. Wiegand. 40
A gem of the first water.
- A star in the dark night. (Una stella in notte bruna.) 3. Bb to e. Muratori. 40
A choice song full of feeling.
- Xenia. Oh heart unfaithful. 6. Bb to g. Lutz. 60
A showy song in operatic style.

Instrumental.

- Oriental March. 3. C. Mollenhauer. 30
A pretty quick march for juvenile pianists.
- La Reine des Fees. Galop de Concert. 5. Ab. Smith. 60
Page's Song. Masked Ball. 4. F. Grobe. 40
An agreeable lesson piece for young pianists.
- Whippoorwill Schottische. 3. C. Hoey. 30
Another whippoorwill novelty of an amusing character.
- Cuban Grand Marche Militaire. 4. G. Ripley. 30
Bon nuit (Good night) Polka. 3. C. Everman. 30
A brilliant sparkling Polka, good for a lesson piece or dance.
- Peabody's Funeral March. 3. D minor. Winner. 40
An excellent March, introducing the favorite melody "Fly as a bird," embellished with an elegant lithographic vignette.
- Fantasia Brillante from Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet. 6. Bb. Ketterer. 75
A brilliant, masterly affair, requiring considerable power of execution.
- Ein Herz, ein sinn. (One heart one soul). Polka Mazurka. 4. C. Strauss. 40
A choice Polka Mazurka, in Strauss's captivating style.

Bach's Grosse Passions-Musik.

(ST. MATTHEW.)

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

[From the London Musical Times]

There is, perhaps, no musical composition extant wherein is embodied so thoroughly as in the present the implicit faith—at once childlike and mature in its simplicity and its depth—of a devout member of the Christian church. This is said with a full knowledge of Handel's Messiah, of the sublime conception it presents, and of the pre-eminent artistry it evinces. The two works, however, are as different in character as they are unlike in form, and they are as distinct in the nature and means of their expression as the two masters who wrote them were in the constitution of their minds and the habit of their lives. It is not here to compare these masterpieces; and allusion is only made to the English Oratorio, in deference to the just position it holds as an illustration of religious feeling in this country. The music set to St. Matthew's history of the Passion is essentially an unveiling of the personal feelings of the composer, his vivid sense of the truth of the incidents it depicts, and his loving devotion to the divine sufferer, whose relation to himself is shown to be regarded as of the closest intimacy. It relates the facts with the vivacity of an eyewitness, or one, at least, who witnesses them by the second sight of firm belief; and it comments upon them with the affection of a participator in the benefits which have resulted from them, and who feels that his special welfare is due to their enactment. This great work is, notwithstanding the three public performances which have been given of it within the last fifteen years under Professor Sterndale Bennett's direction, but little known in England. In the hope of drawing attention to its infinite beauties, a sketch will here be offered of the precedents upon which it was modelled, of the circumstances that induced its composition, and of its peculiar structure; and an attempt will follow to describe, or, at least, acknowledge, some of its chief points of interest.

From primitive times it was the custom of the church to keep green the memory of the sacred history by a public recitation, on Palm Sunday and Good Friday, of those chapters in one or other of the Gospels which relate the circumstances of the Passion. To give dramatic force to the narration, the several personages who speak in the course of it were represented by different individuals, whereas, he who recites the story was, throughout, the same. Thus, a letter of Mendelssohn recounts how, at Rome, among the solemnities of Passion Week, in the Sistine chapel, in 1831, the portion of St. John's Gospel was sung on Good Friday, when the part of the Evangelist was sustained by a tenor, the words belonging to Jesus were assigned to a bass, those of Peter, Pilate, and the Maid Servant were given by an alto, and those of the multitude—whether the disciples, the populace, or the priests—were sung by the chorus. These choral fragments are defined as Turbæ. The whole was chanted upon so-called Gregorian tones; and its Roman use, in the same form and to the same music, has been from time immemorial.

It was a special design of Luther, to retain, in the Reformed Church, this primitive usage of the periodical recitation of the Passion. According to his desire, the simple manner of its intonation, by two priests only in his own time, was early amplified, and a German version of the text was printed at Wittenburg, in 1573, with music for the recitation, and introductory and final choruses, which, like the Turbæ, are harmonized in four parts. A more elaborated composition appeared in 1588, the work of Bartholomæus Gese, in which the part of Jesus is always set for four voices, those of Peter and Pilate for three, those of the maid and servants for two, and the Turbæ are written for five voices—a peculiar distribution, that would distinguish the several individualities, but little tend to the dramatic effect of the performance. Heinrich Schütz, one of the most distinguished musicians of his time—who, having passed some years in Italy and witnessed the dawning there of the modern lyrical drama, wrote the first German opera upon the Italian model—composed, shortly before the close of his very long life, music for the Passion as related in each of the four Gospels. The advanced resources of the art are applied in each of these four works, especially in the elaboration of the chorals or hymn tunes that constitute the final choruses. In 1672, the year of the death of Schütz, Johann Sebastiani produced a Passion, in which, for the first time, the part of the Evangelist, or Narrator, was set to original recitative, instead of to the old ecclesiastical Plain Song, and in which, also for the first time, string instruments were employed, instead of the accompaniment being restricted to the organ.

The great advance that had been made in dramatic music at the beginning of the eighteenth century, which was especially manifest in Hamburg, induced there the extended development of art forms in the setting of the Passion. So, in 1704, the voluminous Reinhold Keiser, who was then director of the opera in that city, brought out Der Blütige und Sterbende Jesus, a work to the same purpose of relating the Gospel story, but peculiar in being set to an original poem instead of to the biblical text. In this first occurs the term Soliloquia, to define a species of Cantata or intermixture of recitative and rhythmical movements, of which there are three specimens in the work, that consist of reflections, for a single voice, upon the principal incidents. Another composition, by Keiser, appeared in 1712, which also was set to an original poem, wherein, however, the scriptural order of the story was more strictly followed than in the preceding.

Handel set the same text in 1717, and the first hearing of this work in England was at the Norwich Festival, in 1866. Telemann and Mattheson also wrote music to the poem; and, subsequently, some passages from it were interspersed in St. John's version of the Passion, when this was set by Bach.

When, in 1723, Bach went to Leipzig, as cantor of St. Thomas's school and musical director of the churches of St. Thomas and St. Nicholas, he found the learned and zealous Solomon Deyling filling an important church office in that city. This eminent divine, who had struggled into his position through the utmost difficulties of poverty, perceived the extraordinary powers of the musician, and had the happy thought of turning them to best account in the Church's service. The musical works above named, which were only the most notable among many, had excited wide interest in the Hamburg celebrations of Easter. Still more was public attention drawn to the Dresden performances of the Roman Service, in which the singers of the renowned Italian opera, under the direction of Hasse, took part. Deyling deemed that it would be for the welfare of the Reformed Church to present in its Service some counter attraction to these popular celebrations of the Mass, and he deemed our Lord's Passion a worthy subject, and the season of its commemoration a fitting period for the fulfilment of his design. He proposed to Bach, therefore, the composition of a Passion in which the text of scripture should be rigidly preserved, but interspersed with reflective passages upon the principle of the Hamburg Soliloquia, and further interpolated with pertinent chorals, of which the words with the tunes formed, as they do now, the first step in North German schooling, and of which, therefore, the congregation at large could participate in the performance. Here were to be combined the ecclesiastical, the artistic, and the popular elements, and their concentration in a single work was to be confided to the man of all others, in all time, best qualified for the task, whose competency was proved by the devout habit which fitted him to penetrate and expound the purport of the Gospel text, by the consummate musicianship which enabled him to bring all the appliances of art to bear upon the subject, and by the vast experience in teaching, accompanying, and elaborating the popular hymns, which familiarized him with the sympathies of the people and the capabilities of the tunes. It is alleged by Julius Rietz that the Passions of Bach were the first works of the kind in which the standard Lutheran hymns were introduced, and in the rendering of which, therefore, the congregation was implicated; but Handel's Passion, before named, offers apparent evidence to the contrary, and the constant employment of the same resource, in the Oratorios of Graun and others that immediately followed, shows that its use must have been general.

There are three Passions ascribed to Bach; the first, according to St. Luke, is unprinted, and its authenticity is questioned on internal indications; the second, according to St. John is printed in several editions; and the third, according to St. Matthew, is the work under present consideration, and by far the most important of them all. This was performed for the first time at St. Thomas's Church in Leipzig, at the Evening Service on Good Friday, 1729. The extraordinary distribution of the score, which will presently be described, shows that extraordinary means must have been employed in this performance. If these means were adequate to the requirements of the work, and if—that chief of all means for its true effect—it was heard with religious and musical susceptibility to its beauties, the great design of Deyling must have been fully accomplished in its performance. After this the Matthew Passion lay in forgetfulness for a hundred years, and seems not to have been performed in public again until its revival in Berlin, under the youthful Mendelssohn's direction, on the 12th of March, 1829. This important event in the young musician's career—and, indeed, in the musical history of the present century—is fully described by Eduard Devrient, in his Recollections of Mendelssohn, with all its inducing circumstances; and the writer's enthusiasm for the work, his participation in that performance, and his observation of the influence this has wrought upon modern musical culture, renders his account most interesting. The success of the Passion, when it was awakened from its hundred years' sleep, led to its frequent repetition in different German towns, where it is said to hold the same popular esteem that Handel's Messiah does in this country; it led to the investigation of other works of the master, which till then had been unknown; it led to a general study of Bach, which has spread from the land of his birth to England and America; and it led to the establishment of the Bach-Gesellschaft, for bringing to light and rendering universally accessible a multitude of the composer's labors, of the existence of which the world had hitherto been ignorant. More than all this, in value to the musical art, is the fact that this second birth of the most important work of the master helped to mould the minds of the three greatest German musicians, whose activity dates from since the occasion of that Berlin performance; for the traces are manifest and unmistakable of the deep-rooted influence of Bach throughout the writings of the departed Felix Mendelssohn and Robert Schumann, and the now working Johannes Brahms.

The Matthew Passion comprises the 26th and 27th chapters of that Evangelist's gospel. The first Part proceeds to the 56th verse of the 26th chapter, and the second Part includes from the 57th verse of this to the last verse of the following chapter. The two Parts were originally separated by the preaching of a sermon—a point for particular notice, since proving how especially the work was integrated in the Church Service, and showing how strongly the Lutheran divines felt upon a subject upon which there is an unfortunate difference of opinion among English authorities of the present day, namely, the superior fitness of the church to any other edifice for the performance of oratorios. The Soliloquies with which the gospel text is interspersed, were written under the pseudonym of Picander, by Christian Friedrich Henrici. Their poetical beauty is not remarkable; they are notable rather for a kind of sentimental personalism, expatiating painfully on the physical sufferings of Jesus, that belongs more to the religious feeling of the time when they were written than of our own. These the composer has, seemingly at his own discretion, and for purposes of musical more than of dramatic effect, set either as soliloquies or concerted pieces; and in these, in a performance out of church, at least, the most attractive features of the work will be found. In some of them, where a solo part is intermixed with chorus, the former is defined by the author as the Daughter of Zion, or as Zion, and the latter as the Faithful; but the composer makes no note of these allegorical personifications, which, indeed, appear to be arbitrary, if not accidental, since applied to some and not to other of the interspersed verses.* It is obviously intended, however, that whether or not the name of such person be indicated, the solo parts throughout should represent the voice of the Christian Church, and that the chorus should stand for the true believers who are gathered under her wing; in this light Bach has felt and interpreted the passages. The chorals with which the gospel text is further interpolated, are selected from those in ordinary use in the Lutheran Church, and consist of such as specially illustrate the several points of the story at which they are introduced. These hymns—the verses nor the tunes—can, unfortunately, never produce elsewhere the same effect which they must always have in Germany, where they are intertwined with the fondest and most intimate affections of singers and hearers from childhood. In England, for instance, we can but admire them, as we do those in St. Paul, for their abstract musical beauty, since they are to us divested of all those strong and endearing associations which spring from life-long familiarity, and of that inseparability of words from notes which connects every hymn with its peculiar occasion, and thus makes each awaken the household sympathy of a Tenton, with the incident to whose enforcement it is thus applied.

The work is written for two complete choirs, each consisting of solo voices, chorus, full orchestra, and organ. I depend upon the authority of Rochlitz and Rietz for stating that the chorals were originally sung by the congregation, that is, the tunes, of course, while the harmony was sustained by the two choruses, accompanied by the two organs, and sometimes other instruments of both orchestras. The part of the Evangelist, or narrator, is assigned throughout to a tenor, and it was Deyling's particular injunction that this should be the singer with the best voice, with the most articulate enunciation, and with the best declamatory powers that could be found—the Sims Reeves, in fact, of Dr. Sterndale Bennett's latest performance of the work, when the rendering of this most difficult part was, perhaps, the greatest manifestation that the public has yet witnessed of the rare ability of that distinguished artist. It belongs always to the singer of the first choir, as do those of Peter, Pilate, Judas, and the priests (written for basses), of the suborned witnesses (written for alto and tenor), of the maids who interrogate Peter, and of Pilate's wife (set for sopranos). The Turbæ, to use the ancient definition, or phrases for the multitude, are assigned sometimes to the chorus of the first choir only, sometimes to the double chorus, disposed responsively after the manner with which Israel in Egypt makes us happily familiar, sometimes with the two choirs singing and playing the same. The reflective pieces, or Soliloquies, are appointed to the solo singers of the two choirs in alternation, so that all shall have equal share in the responsibility of the performance. Let us imagine the scene that this distribution must have necessitated: a spacious church, invested with all the solemn associations peculiar to the sacred building, wherein the edification of hearts and souls must have been involved in the artist's design for the erection of columns and windows; at either end, the capacious orchestra filled with singers and instrumentalists, whose labor is rendered holy by the occasion, by the great human thought that has been brought to bear on the explication of this, and by the sanctuary wherein it is celebrated; towering above each orchestra the lofty organ, whose time honored employment in church service has rendered its acceptance general as a symbol of worship; and in the great area between these galleries of solemn song, a vast public surrounding the pulpit, wherein the presence of the preacher gives sanction and significance to the whole, every one imbued with the religious truths that are commemorated; and all—the little children who are learning to love the right, the women who are lovingly teaching them, and the men who are defending mother and child in the fond task of mutual duty—all taking part in the choral hymns, lifting their common voice in the heartfelt testimony. Let us imagine this scene—which is no fabrication of fancy, but a feeble, a very feeble picture of a once living fact—and we may, perhaps, be able to conceive with what impressions the congregation withdrew from St. Thomas's Church in Leipzig, at the close of even-song, on Good Friday, 1729.

"Weber's Last Waltz."

MR. EDITOR:—A few years ago there appeared an article in a New York magazine upon the origin of "Von Weber's Last Waltz." Weber was represented in his dying moments, sitting in an arm chair supported by pillows and cushions, surrounded by his friends and attendants, writing with trembling fingers the Waltz which bears his name.

The absurdity of the story is sufficiently apparent to lead one to look for a more plausible history, which I wish to present for the benefit of your readers. I received it from a friend and pupil of Reissiger, who is its real author.

There was a popular German song originated generations before Weber, which he and his comrades used to sing together while returning from their pleasant rambles in the outskirts of Dresden.

One evening, after the death of Weber, a company of his friends were returning as usual from their favorite resort, when one of them thoughtlessly began their familiar song, but suddenly ceased, while another sadly remarked: "Hush, boys! poor Weber is no longer here to sing with us; let us go home in silence;" and they passed on with voices hushed, their eyes filled with tears and their hearts with sadness;—in silence broken only by the sweet though plaintive song of the cuckoo and the nightingale.

Reissiger composed a beautiful harmony to their old, familiar melody, and called it "The last thought about Weber." It was thus published in Germany, but in France it bore the title, "Le dernier pensée de Weber;" so the last thought about, became the last thought of Weber, and finally it received the name of "Von Weber's last Waltz," thus enshrouding the beautiful tribute rendered by his friends to his memory in Reissiger's "Last Thought About Weber."

Boccherini.*

Misfortune seems to have obstinately pursued the great artist, of whose life we here propose giving a rapid sketch, founded upon the excellent work of an erudite musician, M. L. Picquot.†

Luigi Boccherini was born at Lucca, on the 14th January, 1740. He received his first lessons in music from his father, a clever performer on the double-bass. He was next placed under the Abbate Vannucci, chapelmaster at the cathedral, and then went to finish his studies at Rome. His favorite instrument was the violoncello; he practised it most zealously, and attained a high degree of skill upon it.

On his return to his native city, the pieces he played there were enthusiastically applauded, having previously achieved no less success in the Papal capital. People did not know which to admire most: the entrancing execution of the virtuoso, or the style of writing, new and attractive at the same time, and so skilfully adapted to a class of compositions up to that period without well-defined form and character.

Boccherini contracted a friendship with Manfredi, a distinguished violinist of the Tartini school. Both eager for glory, they resolved to visit the great cities and capitals of the Continent. Confiding their fortune to the same future, they bade farewell to their birthplace, and visited successively Turin, and some other cities of Lombardy, Piedmont, and the south of France. Their talent excited admiration and enthusiasm everywhere. After this trip, which appears to have been prolonged several years, the two friends reached Paris about 1768.

Lachevardière, the publisher, introduced them to the famous Baron de Bagge, as celebrated for the patronage he extended to artists as for his incredible pretensions as a violinist. His house was the rendezvous of all the distinguished musicians in Paris, among them being Gossec, Gaviniés, Capron, and Duport, senior. It was before this assemblage that the Lucca virtuoso first appeared. Having come out honorably from the test, it was not long before they were subjected to a more perilous one, namely: their début at the Concert Spirituel, where all the most popular artists performed. They had to combat against powerful rivals, whose reputation, long established, had no need to fear the efforts of any one. They never thought, therefore, of surpassing them by the charms of their playing. Looking for other means of success, they strove less to surpass, than to touch, their audience, by presenting them with the fresh and graceful productions of Boccherini's genius, rendered with the fascination which is inherent to them. This clever notion proved favorable to the strangers; no one thought of comparing them to the other artists; on se laissa fuir, and their triumph was secured.

Welcomed and run after by the musical world, Boccherini gave the preference to Mme. Brillon de Jony, a lady then as celebrated for her great talent upon the harpsichord, as for her varied acquirements and her amiability. He wrote her six Sonatas for Pianoforte and Violoncello; they are, in every respect, worthy of him who composed and of her who inspired them.

Meanwhile the reputation of the composer and that of the violinist had gone on increasing. In consequence of the praises he heard bestowed on the two friends, the Spanish Ambassador urged them to visit Madrid, assuring them that they would be most graciously received by the Prince of Asturias, who was † "Notice sur la vie et les ouvrages de Boccherini, suivie d'un catalogue raisonné de toutes ses œuvres, tant publiées qu'inédites." Paris, 1861, octavo, 126 pages, two portraits.

The author, M. Picquot, was twenty years collecting his materials, and neglecting nothing to render them as complete as possible. A great number of manuscripts in Boccherini's own handwriting, most of them being from the musical library of Armand Séguin, formerly a superior officer of the commissariat; the collection shrouded by that amateur of all the editions of whatever works of the celebrated composer were ever published; the thematic and chronological catalogue drawn up by Boccherini himself of all his works, and for the which M. Picquot was indebted to the great violinist, Baillot—all these highly important documents, and lastly the correspondence he maintained with Boccherini's grandson in Madrid, have enabled the intelligent biographer to invest his book, despite the great difficulties such a task presented, with the merit of the most scrupulous exactitude, a quality about which our critics, at so much a page, do not trouble themselves greatly now-a-days.

M. Picquot has not aimed merely at drawing up a catalogue as correct as possible; he considered it his duty to accompany every work with bibliographical, historical, or critical observations, in order to show the reader the plan which it would be desirable to pursue in compiling the catalogues of the works of all great writers.

very fond of music, and reigned subsequently under the name of Charles IV. Charmed with the proposal, which seemed to promise him a magnificent future, Boccherini set out with his friend about the end of 1768, or at the commencement of 1769, for the capital of Spain, the first accompanied by dreams of glory, the second, of a more material cast of mind, more especially sensible to the favor of fortune.

Boccherini arrived at Madrid, with his third book of Trios, which he lost no time in dedicating to the Prince of Asturias. Immediately afterwards, he composed a concerto a pia stromenti obbligati. What effect was produced by these two works on the mind of the King and that of his eldest son in Boccherini's favor, we do not exactly know; but it is certain that the great composer did not obtain the distinction due to his merit, since neither the King, nor the heir presumptive thought of taking him into their service. It was the Infant, Don Louis, brother of Charles III., who atoned for this act of injustice. We observe, consequently, that from this same year, 1769, Boccherini wrote for his patron six quartets (engraved as Op. 6) which he dedicated to him, assuming the title of compositore e virtuoso di camera, di S. A. R., Don Luigi, Infante d'Isparnia. This unique qualification was invariably repeated on the title page of all Boccherini's manuscripts, without any other titles whatever, till the Infant's death, which occurred on 7th August 1785. From that date, however, we find Boccherini enumerating with a certain amount of complacency the other titles conferred on him. Thus, for instance, we read pretty frequently, "Compositi di Luigi Boccherini, professore di musica all' actual servizio di S. M. C., compositore di camera di S. M. Prussiana e direttore del concerto dell' eccellentissima senora, Contessa di Benavente, Duchessa di Ossuna, di Grandia," etc., etc. But he frequently omits most of his titles, retaining only that of chamber composer to King Frederick William II., from whom he received a pension, and for whom he wrote, from 1787 to 1797, all the works his genius produced during that period.

These circumstances, ignored by all his biographers, evidently prove that, for the first sixteen years, Boccherini had no patron but the Infant, Don Louis; that the interest which Charles III. and the Prince of Asturias did him the honor of taking in him was extremely problematical, and that, far from undertaking to compose every year for their private musical establishment nine pieces, he did not even think of dedicating to them a single work. From 1787, he worked exclusively for the King of Prussia, Frederick William II., and subsequently for Lucien Bonaparte.

Boccherini was too conscious of his own worth, and too eager for glory to permit the finest inspirations of his muse to be buried in the dust of a library, even though the latter were a royal library. He wanted his works to be published and circulated, and the proof of this is that, when composing for the private use either of the Infant Don Louis, or for that of Frederick William II., or for that of Lucien Bonaparte, he sent, indiscriminately, copies of all his productions to those foreign publishers who enjoyed his confidence.

When Boccherini went to settle in Madrid, the Prince of Asturias had at the head of his musical establishment Gaetano Brunetti, a good violinist and distinguished composer. The arrival of the Lucca composer excited Brunetti's jealousy, for he feared he should have to share with another that favor which he desired to preserve for himself alone. Possessed of a subtle and intriguing mind, Brunetti neglected no means of alienating his master from Boccherini. The Prince of Asturias, however, never showed his real feeling for Boccherini, till a fortuitous circumstance placed it in a strong light. Don Louis, who was the uncle of Charles IV., then Prince of Asturias, took Boccherini one day to his nephew's in order that the Prince might hear some new quintetti of the composer's. The music was opened upon the desks. Charles took up his bow, for he always played the first violin part. Now, in this part, there figured a run which was very long, and extremely monotonous. The two notes, C, B, C, B, were constantly repeated in rapid succession. The Prince began bravely, and continued playing; he was so absorbed by what he was doing himself, that he did not hear the ingenious chords which imparted interest to the composition as a whole. He grew impatient, and his bad humor burst forth. Laying down his violin, he rose, and said: "It is pitiable! a schoolboy would do as well."—"Be kind enough your Highness, to listen to what the second violin and tenor are executing, and to the pizzicato executed at the same time by the violoncello; the run loses its monotonous character directly the other instruments take part in the conversation."—"C, B, C, B, for half an hour! A lively conversation! Schoolboy's music; bad schoolboy's music, too!"—"Before pronouncing such an opinion, your Highness, a person ought to be capable of judging!"—"Insolent scoundrel," exclaimed Charles, and springing forward with rage, he seized Boccherini by his clothes. Bearing him in his extended arms, he thrust him out of the window, and held him hanging in the air. "Ah! think of your religion Prince!" exclaimed the Princess of Asturias. At these words, the Prince turned half round upon his heel, and Boccherini, thus borne back again inside, was flung violently into the next room.

The new King of Spain, the successor of Charles III., could never forget the insult offered to the Prince of Asturias. Nevertheless, he thought he made the rights of his offended majesty square with the patronage which it was his glory to bestow on artists, by confirming the allowance which the King, his father, had granted Boccherini, immediately after the death of the Infant, Don Louis. But he contented himself with this, and would neither see the composer again nor even play his music. All the solicitations, all the prayers of those who sought to induce him to entertain once again better and more just sentiments were so badly received that the name of the great man ceased to be pronounced at Court. "Who still speaks to me of Boccherini," he replied abruptly to those unlucky individuals who pleaded for the musician. "Boccherini is dead; let that he well known; and let me hear no more about him!"

Bearing with him everywhere his implacable hatred, if he happened to meet in his walks the poor fellow in disgrace, though he saluted courteously every one else, he pretended not to observe him, precisely as though he had never known him. This hatred, kept up and heightened by the jealousy of Brunetti, never ceased to torment, like a canker-worm, the inconsolable and too sensitive Boccherini, distinguished, as his only set off, by the empty title of organist in partibus of the Royal chapel. It was in allusion to the duty which he did not perform, but which was the reason assigned for granting him the modest salary that he enjoyed subsequently to his patron's decease, that he sometimes added to the titles of his scores the words: All' actual servizio di S. M. C., to imply, no doubt, that he held himself at the King's disposal.

Thus slighted and despised, Boccherini made up his mind to find, beyond the limits of Spain, some one, of a more just and more enlightened mind, who would appreciate him as he deserved. Among those sovereigns who were very fond of music, Frederick William II. was then distinguished as much by his munificence to artists, as by his passionate taste for the violoncello, which he played admirably. Boccherini thought of dedicating to him one of his works, and carried out his purpose through the medium of the Prussian ambassador at the Court of Madrid. It was not long before he received from the royal virtuoso a most gracious letter, accompanied by a superb snuff box, filled with ducats, and a diploma as Chamber Musician to his Majesty. From that day, Boccherini wrote exclusively for Frederick William II., as is proved by all his manuscripts subsequent to 1787. Ten years passed by in this manner, without making any change in Boccherini's position. The loss of his first patron, the Infant Don Louis, rendered still more sensible by the ingratitude of the Court, had caused him to lead a retired life, divided between his attention to a numerous family, his labors, and the exercise of gentle piety. Endowed with a fancy and fertility, both equally marvellous, and drawing his inspirations seemingly from an inexhaustible source, he took up, laid aside, and resumed his pen with the same facility, and without the current of his ideas suffering the least in consequence.

When the bell of the parish church was heard, he left the pen for the prayer book. A stranger to the world which ignored him, and living a religious life in the bosom of his family, surrounded by a few friends, and obliged, moreover, to give up the violoncello, in consequence of spitting blood, he forwarded his compositions to the Prussian monarch without having heard them performed. What a pleasure it must have been to him, therefore, when, having made the acquaintance of the Marquis de Benavente, he was enabled, twice a week, to hear the delicious inspirations of his muse. Twice married, Boccherini had the misfortune to lose, immediately after each other, two grown up daughters, and to see his second wife expire in a fit of apoplexy. But this and cruel separation, which embittered the remainder of his days, did not exhaust the rigor of destiny. He sustained a fresh blow by the death of Frederick William II., which deprived him of the greater part of his modest income. Thus pursued and overwhelmed by his misfortunes, the great man supported his woes like a Christian. When the French Republic selected to represent it at Madrid an enlightened lover of art, Lucien Bonaparte, who knew how to welcome and to honor talent, Boccherini placed under his patronage six quintets for the piano, dedicated to France. From that moment the ambassador's house, table and purse were at the disposal of the celebrated artist. Boccherini's old age appeared to be beyond the reach of fresh vicissitudes. This was a mistake! The recall of Lucien and the grave state of events combined to plunge him into renewed distress.

It was after the death of Frederick William II. that Boccherini began to achieve some little celebrity among his adopted compatriots, in the midst of whom he had lived thirty years without their being aware of the existence of such a person. The following was the way in which his reputation was extended among the higher classes, and was attended with some slight pecuniary advantage to himself.

The Marquis Benavente excelled upon the guitar, an instrument dear to every true Spaniard. He begged Boccherini to write a guitar-part for him in any quartets he might choose, at 100 francs each quartet. Some other rich amateurs did the same. Despite the resources which he derived for the moment from this work, such was the poverty of the delightful composer, that, when Mme. Gail saw him at Madrid, in 1803, he had only one room for himself and his family. When he wanted to work quietly, he retired, by the aid of a ladder, into a sort of wooden penthouse, constructed against the wall, and garnished with a chair, a table, and an old tenor, minus three strings. It was while his affairs were in this precarious state that his strict probity caused him to refuse 1000 francs for a three-part Stabat, because he had previously promised to let Stieber, the publisher, have it for less than a third of the sum. At length, overwhelmed by sorrows, the great artist expired, after a short illness, on the 28th May, 1805, aged sixty-five. His funeral, as modest as his life, had no pomp about it, and his sole escort consisted of a few friends.

At the present day there is only one descendant living of the celebrated composer. All his children are dead. The last, Don José, keeper of the records to the Marquis of Seralbo, died in December, 1847, leaving a son, Don Fernando Boccherini, a professor in the Academy of Arts, at Madrid, and the only one who bears this great name.

Boccherini's original works, not including those for the voice, consist of 366 pieces, published and unpublished.—Lond. Mus. World.

Our Amateur Musical Societies. (NEW YORK).

AMERICAN.

In a former article we spoke of our German musical clubs, their system of organization, the work they accomplished, and the pleasures they enjoyed. In the present one we will refer to the best known of those musical societies of the city composed of Americans.

And first let us say that the great want that we have in this direction is a chorus worthy of the greatness of the metropolis. So many jealousies are and always have been at work that it has seemed impossible to gather in one body a really strong choral force. We have a sufficiency of good singers, but they have subdivided themselves into little bands, and dissipated their strength without any compensating gain.

We look forward to the time when some man with energy and brains, and money for the work will collect together a society capable of performing the great works of the oratorio writers in a fitting manner, and will provide it with a suitable singing-hall. Perhaps the forthcoming Beethoven festival may stimulate the right spirit and help on this desirable end. Meantime Boston, with its noble Handel and Haydn Society, looks almost with derision on our feeble attempts at chorus singing. And we can find our only consolation in referring with pride to the glorious orchestra of the Philharmonic Society, to which no other city in the Union has one at all to compare in numbers or in excellence, and which indeed may even challenge comparison with the Gewandhaus, the Paris Conservatoire, and the other famous orchestras of Europe.

The oldest of our choral societies and the most numerous is the Harmonic. The old Mendelssohn Union was an offshoot from the Harmonic, and the Borge Choral Union was an offshoot from the present Mendelssohn Union—a very fair example of the way in which our clubs dilute their strength. The Harmonic Society was organized in 1852, and has been, during most of its existence, under the leadership of Bristow, Morgan, and Ritter—the last-named being at present the conductor and mainstay of the society. The best gift that this organization brings to the public is the annual performance on Christmas night of the Messiah, a noble task persisted in steadfastly for eighteen years. This is about the only public appearance that the society at present makes. They work diligently at the great compositions of the masters at their practice hall, which is the lecture room of Dr. Crosby's church on Fourth Avenue.

Much discouragement exists in the society: firstly, because they cannot get their members to attend rehearsals; and secondly, because the public won't interest itself in oratorio music. This discouragement has extended itself to the conductor, Mr. Ritter, who appeared the other day in the World in a very gloomy letter, in which he refers to the many obstacles that he and the society have to contend with. Out of some three hundred members, not more than seventy or eighty can be gathered at the rehearsals, and this is a chill upon the enthusiasm of those who do come. Heavy fines fail to meet the difficulty, for then the delinquents resign. The Mendelssohn Union languishes under the same trouble. Last year it received a stimulus from the leadership of Theodore Thomas and the co-operation of his orchestra, and brought out under these auspices some compositions of the highest excellence; but Mr. Thomas and his orchestra having "gone a-roaming," the Union has disappeared from public notice.

The Berge Choral Union is, as we have said, composed of secessionists from the Mendelssohn Union. It is under the direction of Mr. William Berge, the well-known organist of St. Stephen's church, and though not very efficient in point of numbers is full of zeal and of faith in its leader. This society has given but one concert this season, and that took place on the 28th of December, at the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. An oratorio by Gounod, entitled Tobias, was then brought out for the first time, so far as we are aware, in this country. The president of the association is Mr. John A. Godfrey; its affairs are administered with discretion; and the compositions that are performed are of a high standard, and are mostly of a religious character.

The youngest organization devoted to the practice of ecclesiastical music is the Church Music Association. It came into existence the present winter, and gave its first concert on the 12th of January. The other societies of which we have spoken, and indeed the most of those to which we shall refer in this article, are made up of members of the different church choirs of the city; but the Church Music Association has recruited from another class—those of our amateurs of the highest social position. The enterprise was set on foot by some of our most distinguished citizens, and upon the executive committee are the names of ladies equally well known. The chorus is composed of nearly all the most famous of the amateurs of the city, such as Miss Parker, Miss Reed, the Rev. Wm. H. Cooke, Mr. Horace Barry, Mrs. Woolsey Johnson, Mrs. Geo. T. Strong, Mrs. Arthur, Mrs. David Watts, and others of like character. This organization has a wide field entirely to itself, for there are hundreds of amateurs of musical cultivation in this city, who have never felt willing to join any chorus that sang for money, or in other words, to become public singers, but who are not only too glad to identify themselves with a society like this, supported by the voluntary subscriptions of the members, giving private concerts, and having only invited audiences. The concerts take place at Steinway Hall. The first one, given on the 12th instant, was undoubtedly, in point at least of the character of the audience, the most brilliant ever known in this city. As the invitations intimated to the guests that they were expected to come in evening dress, the large hall was filled with an audience of unusually brilliant not to say gorgeous appearance. The chorus was even more elaborately dressed than the audience, and the honest German orchestra looked thoroughly astonished to find itself hemmed in between such unaccustomed splendors. The Duke of Wellington need not say that the dandies made, in a fight, his bravest officers; and certainly this chorus in its powdered hair and diamonds sang as valiantly as though they were dressed in homespun, and had come to the concert in an omnibus.

The expenses are defrayed by subscription. Fifty per one formed the nucleus, subscribing one hundred dollars each, and having some twenty-five tickets for each concert and rehearsal, wherewith to invite their friends. The music was Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and the first part of Oberon. The conductor is Dr. James Pech, who received his musical doctorate from Oxford. There are various opinions as to his competency as a conductor, though there is but one as to his energy and good will. At the rehearsals his frantic shouts at his chorus can be heard over the din of chorus and instruments, and his natural energy even at the concert found expression in beating time with his feet, greatly to the annoyance of his audience and the discomfort of his orchestra. Mr. Pech has been accustomed to drill refractory choir boys, and treats the "silken wonders" who compose his chorus much after the fashion that he has applied to the unruly urchins. A German orchestra is always restless under any but a German leader, and so there is some trouble already, and quite probably more brewing, in the would-be harmonious Church Association. Two more concerts are to be given by the society this winter, one on the 1st of March and the other on the 18th of May. At the first, Haydn's Sixteenth Mass and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise are to be performed; at the latter, Beethoven's difficult Mass in C, which will sift the pretensions and capacities of this chorus of the elect to the uttermost, and the second part of Oberon.

Several of our leading teachers of music have clubs under their direction. The most conspicuous of these are those under the charge severally of Mr. Rivarile, Mr. Abella, and Mr. Mosenthal. This last gentleman, who is the accomplished organist of Calvary church, has the direction of two clubs, one for mixed voices, the moving spirits in which are ladies, and which is to make its first public appearance at a concert to be given at the Christian Association Rooms on the 29th of this month, for some charity, and will then sing some of Mendelssohn's four-part songs and a cantata by Spohr.

The other association is composed of male voices alone, and is known as the Mendelssohn Glee Club. This society consists of about thirty singing members and seventy-five subscribers. They give four concerts during the winter to invited guests. Mr. Mosenthal has brought the club to a high point of finish, and has made them formidable rivals of the Liederkreis and the Arion, which societies they equal in the delicacy of their singing, though the superior numbers of the Germans give them otherwise a great advantage. The music performed by the Mendelssohn Glee Club consists entirely of German four-part songs, though English versions of the words are used instead of the original. The next concert of this society takes place on the 26th of this month at Lyric Hall. The club is usually assisted by some distinguished amateur vocalist and a pianist.

The Eight o'Clock Club—so called from its hour of assembling—is under the direction of Signor Abella. Its rehearsals are held at the private houses of the members. Miss Chapman is the President of the Club, Mr. Pierrenont Edwards (English Vice-Consul) is the Vice President, Dr. Mason the Secretary, and Signor Martinez (an artist of some distinction) the Treasurer. This society confines itself mostly to the Italian school of music. They give three concerts this winter, the first of which is to take place on the 26th of this month, the other two later in the season. Some admirable soloists belong to the Eight o'Clock Club, and their concerts, to which only invited guests are admitted, are of a very select and social character, and, like those of the Mendelssohn Glee Club, have all the characteristics of private drawing-room concerts on a large scale.

The Rivarile Club is under the leadership of the well known teacher of vocal music whose name it bears. It consists mostly of those who are, or who at one time have been, his pupils. The club has shown great enterprise, and last year organized an orchestra, partly amateur and partly professional, which accompanied the soloists and played overtures by Mozart, Auber, and other composers. The concerts are on a very extensive scale, and are given at Apollo Hall. About two thousand invitations are issued to each concert. As in the case of the Church Music Association, the Mendelssohn Club, and the Eight o'Clock Club, cards of admission are obtainable only for love, not money. Many of Mr. Rivarile's pupils have shown great proficiency and talent, and have made the concerts of the club of a greater excellence than most of the public concerts given in the city. It is always a pleasure for a vocalist to sing with an orchestra: it sustains the voice so admirably and supports the singer in every way, and this advantage the members of this club have over all the others.

It remains only to say a word about our madrigal clubs. Of these, unfortunately, there are two where there should be but one. The same lack of unity and the same feelings of jealousy that have disintegrated our oratorio societies have broken the madrigal society into two parts. One half is singing under the direction of Dr. Brown, an eminent homoeopathic physician, and besides the madrigals is rehearsing the fine "Antigone" music written by Mendelssohn to the Sophocles tragedy; while the other half, under the leadership of Mr. James A. Johnson, gave on Tuesday evening a concert at Steinway Hall, consisting of an admirably selected programme of these enjoyable, fresh, vigorous old works.

It will readily be seen from the brief account we have given of our amateur clubs that there is a great deal of musical talent in this city, and that it is crystallizing into forms that will lead to great pleasure for those who participate as well as for those who listen. It is worthy of remark that none of these clubs are led by Americans, which is another evidence of what we said in a former article, that people here were simply in a state of pupillage as to music. Most of the clubs we have named have sprung up within a few years, and it is reasonable to suppose that as musical taste is fostered, encouraged and developed, more will follow. The tendency of them all is excellent. They cultivate a taste for a high class of music, they substitute a refined and rational mode of enjoyment for endless dancing parties, they bring people of similar tastes into closer social contact, strengthen the bonds of friendship, and in every way are a help to culture of every kind.—Nation.

The Pope and Church Music.

(From the London Orchestra.)

Rome is now crammed with all that is learned and distinguished in the Roman Church, assembled for the purpose, as it would seem, of declaring its chief the greatest despot upon earth, and decreeing orders and interdicts which can only tend to the disestablishment of the Papacy as a power in Europe and certain disruption of the ecclesiastical body. The Committees have been appointed; and we had hoped that the subject of church music would have formed an early and a foremost consideration; but this assembly of bishops appear to have lost sight of its real use and value in their zeal to define doctrines and powers which, if not over-ruled, will cause a breach of the peace throughout Christendom. Italy has been the source of all art-music in the sanctuary from the times of St. Gregory and Guido d'Arezzo, if there be excepted the period of the dire wars in mediæval times when the Flemish musicians so vigorously and skillfully carried on the advance, and were not a little assisted by the composers of France. There was a time when Rome was glad to seek musical aid from Flanders and Picardy, when the chapels and churches of the Pope and the Princes of Italy were filled with choirs of Flemish and French growth, and when the popular new Mass was the production not of a Roman or Venetian composer, but of a foreigner from the north. Goudimel, the master of Palestrina, learnt his art in France; Adrian Willaert studied in Holland; and the great school of Venice owed its birth to the Dutchman, J. Monton, whose favorite pupil Constanza Porta did so much for the advance of great counterpoint throughout Italy. In return Italy educated Lulli, the man who recreated music in France; made Rameau, its great teacher; and indirectly made our Henry Purcell, the only genius in this country scholastically educated in all the mysteries of musical art. His education, unfortunately for England and English church music, was not followed up, although we can plainly trace its high value in the works of Humphries, and its pale reflection in the sweet anthems of Weldon. All that Henry Purcell did in the creation of phrase, the forms of melody, the disposition of the new tonal chromatic harmony came from Italian teaching; and great as was this composer in counterpoint and musical design, the whole intention, power, and beauty was the reflection of a warmer and a higher luminary. The School of Rome has been a great school; and although Venice, Naples, and Bologna have severally supplied the finest of models in ecclesiastical composition, it can never be forgotten that Palestrina and his pupils first shot ahead, gave the examples, and perfected the style. Rome instructed all Europe in every branch of the arts. In music for the violin, the organ, the orchestra; in the song and recitative, the sonata and the concerto, the motet and the Mass, Rome and Italy preceded all other countries and furnished the world with its chefs d'œuvre. In refinement of execution in instrumental music she stood foremost, and long maintained her superiority in all methods of vocalization. It has been said that much of this pre-eminence was the result of climate and the natural organization of the Italian, but we should rather incline to attribute it to the high value put upon music by the priesthood, and the great pains taken in the ecclesiastical seminaries to lay down the true principles of education in the art and science. The conservatoires possessed the finest models, and art and science was taught orally, the master spoke the word and did the thing—the true way by which the most accomplished artists have ever been taught.

Rome has now ceased to be an authority, and has lost her supreme sway over the destinies of music in Christendom. There is, of course, a general knowledge of music both practical and theoretical, but the great body of musicians is not a learned body, and there has been a sensible decay, if not degradation, in the production of music for this city of churches. There is no rare talent, and not much that surpasses mediocrity. The Pope forbids the opera, eschews the brilliant Mass of the last century, and places his ban upon the extravagances of the French church school of the present day. There is no progress, for there is no patronage; no modification, for there is no education; no impulse to genius, for there is no care, no zeal, and no nurture. The Council, we hear, intend to discuss some outside and unimportant matters; such as whether or not the antique Gregorian shall for the future be written on five lines instead of four; whether or not the old cantilenas shall be measured off in language rhythms, and the ancient music of the church be twisted into certain fixed metrical shapes; whether or not women's voices shall be permitted, or all soprano singing be abandoned, and the Mass be made a composition for equal voices. All this is very silly and laughable enough when proceeding from old gentlemen who claim to be ever in the right, and by no possibility in the wrong. The hierarchy of the Roman Church may determine to know nothing of music outside their church, they may ignore what is going on in France, Belgium, Germany, and England; but there will be no miracle vouchsafed in Rome, no special variation of the laws of cause and effect. If Rome eschews the training of a composer, if she declines to foster public and special academies for the creation and continuance of her church music, if she will not give her children the education necessary for the result, she must be content to go on with what she has, thank her stars for Palestrina and his disciples, and shut her eyes and ears to what Providence affords to those who put the shoulder to the wheel, and find the benefit of so doing. There is no reaping without sowing; and if Rome persists in refusing all tillage she must feed on the sheaves of past harvests and look forward to the times of want and starvation. Never was the time in the history of the Church so pressing and so important as now. The traditional features of ecclesiastical music are all changing; counterpoint has lost its language schemata; the new motets and anthems are a string of chords, or a bad organ voluntary; all life and power is departing from the vocal fugue; unity in movement and logical accuracy in expression are rarities; and every man permits his taste, however fatiguing and disgusting, to have full play, and to render the service of the church a thing scandalous if not indeed horrible. The revolution which has taken place in high contrapuntal music for worship can only lead to the destruction of the true and grand school. The constant contemplation of corruption has no connection with growth in life; it is only the dead that lie amongst the dead.

The Pope is fond of the old times, and is going back to the period of Gregory II., proclaiming himself a second Deity. But the Popes in the old days gave music their first thought; were sedulous in promoting its progress and careful in correcting all abuses. The Popes in former days made their composers, their choirs, their grand singers. The ancient Chapel Master was the pet child of the Court and the Sanctuary; they were the foremost men in their art and profession. Where now are such scholars to be found in the Roman Church? Let us take England. What is there to be heard in the new pro-cathedral in the High Street, Kensington? What in the cathedrals in Moorfields and in Southwark? What in Dr. Manning's pet church of St. Mary and All Angels, Bayswater; or even with the bare-footed white friars at the Vicarage Gardens, Kensington? If what is to be heard in their churches be reflections from Rome, she must have sunk into the abysses of abomination and desolation. Raucous male voices, screaming and tuneless boys' voices, uneducated accompanists, the ancient ritual music without rule or order, absurd modern chants, and service music marked by much ignorance and bad taste. The real mischief lies in the total ignorance of the clergy, and their sublime indifference to the wants of the congregations. Instead of giving the people the Kyrie Eleison, the Creed, and the Gloria to sing in concert with them, and making the service of some interest and some work with the congregation, the priests walk off, sit down aside, put on their caps, and leave the praise and glory of God to the scanty choir earning their few halfpence in a far-off gallery. Surely a grand choir Introit, a choir gradual, sequence, a tract; a choice Benedictus and a noble post-communion motet would give ample opportunities for the choir. Why take the bread out of the children's mouths and offer them a stone? Let Rome say what it will, the congregations have a right to the Gloria and Credo; and the present system of keeping people on their knees or on their seats when they should be standing up and praising God is most mischievous and most deplorable. No casuistry, no diplomacy, no pretence of argument can uphold it.

The Pope and the Council have nothing to lose in their consideration of the state of the Roman church music, but on the contrary much to gain. Let them walk in the old paths, set up the schools again, create a new school of both congregational and choir music—both necessities in the present day—and their meeting in council may hereafter be recorded as of great value in this respect. Music can do them no harm, although their mode of treating it may not be infallible.

M. Auber's 'Dream of Love.'

The last musical production of wonderful M. Auber, who is advancing well on in his ninth decade, is a rosewater work. That the result of labor so late in life would add much to M. Auber's reputation, nobody could suppose: it is much to add that it has not hurt his fame. "La Réve d'Amour" is a pretty idyllic work, full of grace and humor, and consorting well with the Arcadian and utterly unreal character of the libretto. MM. D'Ennery and Cormon are not calculated to throw Scribe into the shade. The "Dream of Love" illustrates a very primitive and innocent method of securing happiness: the peasant hero brings down the doves of Venus with a pinch of salt on their tails. Marcel, the rustic youth in question, is a young dreamer of the silk tight and satin ribbon order of peasantry, almost as infrequent, and a good deal less objectionable, than Mr. Robertson's Halfpenny in "Dreams." He roams through a wood and finds a sleeping beauty, with whom he falls in love. He imprints a kiss—sur le front, of course: your stage Frenchman is always respectful to an unmarried woman—and then runs away. Who she is Marcel cannot discover. Time passes; and, lured by the love of his cousin, Denise, he agrees to marry her. The feast is prepared, when a crowd of high-born lords and ladies make an irruption from the neighboring chateau, and come upon the wedding party. Among these Marcel recognizes his sleeping beauty of the wood, now Mlle. Henriette de la Roche-Villers. Again poor Marcel runs away, leaving bride, breakfast, marriage and mediocrity.

Now Mlle. Henriette de la Roche-Villers is the proud wearer of an old name, who scorns the pretensions of a Chevalier de Bois-Flauri, on the ground that he is too recent. She draws the line at a couple of hundred years of ancestry, and is as particular as the recruiting officer of the Pope's Noble Guard. The mad love of a common Marcel is therefore of a nature to cause the noble nose of Mademoiselle to erect itself. But as pride goeth before destruction, MM. d'Ennery and Cormon prepare a dreadful retribution for Mademoiselle, and that scornful young lady—who is a mixture of Lady Clara Vere de Vere and the other Tennysonian Lady Clare—is informed by the Chevalier that she is not a Roche-Villers at all, but merely peasant-born, her reputed father having purchased her, while a baby, from one of his tenants. To make matters worse, she is sister to Denise, the girl who loves Marcel; a relationship which brings into conflict inclination and duty. For whereas she is at first disposed—upon discovering her real station—to reward the devotion of one who is at all events now her equal in rank, she finds that Denise has loved him for long, and thus she determines to forward the happiness of her now found sister in preference to her own.

By the exercise of some interest she secures the promotion of Marcel, who has entered the army. He comes back an officer, and then Henriette takes him in hand, and by a white lie—persuading him in fact that he is actually her brother—induces him to marry Denise, while Henriette gives her hand to the faithful Chevalier.

Of this idyllic nature is the plot of the piece. As to the music, it is pretty and agreeable, though less happy than that of "Le Premier Jour de Bonheur." The overture is crossed with a six-eight pastoral, in which the hautbois and clarinet answer each other with rather good effect. A peasant-like introduction exhibits the seal of the master, and the first act has a melody for Marcel, "A l'ombre de nos bois," with an excellent bit of recitative: this romance usually draws down an encore. A rondo may also be mentioned, coquettishly sung by Mlle. Girard, commencing—

Oe qu'on voit faire
On veut le faire.

Still better is a pretty duet, for Henriette and the Chevalier.

Qu'ils sont charmants,
Les courts instants,

the principal phrase of which is exceedingly graceful, and forms a happy contrast with the payan music preceding it. The finale to this Act exhibits a singular chromatic effect, and a short page of sombre color well imagined.

In the second Act a song for the Chevalier is also mostly biassé. In this Act there is a game of blind-man's buff, which affords M. Auber the opportunity for some capital writing; a syncopated waltz is introduced, and the scene throughout is admirably scored. Passing over a grand duet for Marcel and Henriette as more ambitious than successful, we have to mention in the finale a soldier's song of attractive character, with a very original clarinet accompaniment. Between the second and third divisions of the opera, M. Auber, faithful to the manner of the Opera Comique, gives us a little entr'acte gavotte, something in the style of a slow polka. Then, after a romance for Denise, comes the gem of the work in the shape of a buffo trio, conceived in a pure vein of rollicking comedy.

"Dans un bon ménage

asks the Chevalier. To which Denise and Marcel reply, and the result is a fresh and sparkling number in Auber's best style.

The composer is lucky in his executants. Mlle. Girard, who acts Denise is an artist on whom the peasant role always sits naturally and gracefully. The Henriette is a debutante, Mlle. Priola: a young lady whose fresh, velvety and bien timbrée voice and artistic taste leave many hopeful things to be expected of her. M. Capoul, the tenor, maintains popularity—chiefly among the ladies; though his voice has shown of late the effects of wear and tear. M. Gailhard, the Chevalier de Sainte Foy, has a magnificent organ which he knows how to put to the best use. The costumes are pretty, the decorations excellent. In the second act a well-known picture by Lancret called "Le Balançoire" is realized in so admirable a manner as to elicit many rounds of applause nightly. On the whole "La Réve d'Amour" seems likely to obtain, as it deserves, the compliment of a respectable run.—Orchestra, Jan. 7.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 20.—An invitation concert at Chickering's Rooms, last night, deserves mention, not only as an enjoyable evening, but also as an event of no little interest and significance in the musical world. For this "Soirée Musicale" we are indebted to M. and Mme. Frederic Guzman, the Chilean pianists, whose playing, for two winter's past, created so much enthusiasm among the musicians and critics of Paris. This soirée at Chickering's only added one to many opportunities of hearing these artists, together and separate, which I have enjoyed since their arrival in America. The invitations numbered about 200, and were extended mainly to critics and musicians, and, though the evening was badly timed, our best reporters being in attendance at Miss Mehlig's concert in Steinway Hall; the fine rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Co., were nevertheless well filled by an audience capable of listening and judging.

Mr Guzman is a native of Santiago, Chili, and was associated with Gottschalk while the lamented artist was giving concerts in Valparaiso and Santiago. M. Guzman has since passed several years in Europe, devoting his time to a careful study of classical music, which, need it be said, is almost unknown in his own country. He is now, probably, the best living representation of the style in which Gottschalk was pre-eminent—while, at the same time he has another style, entirely different, which we ascribe to the influence of Chopin's music later in life. M. Guzman on this occasion played Weber's Polonaise in E, to which he gave full and free interpretation, displaying at the same time a wonderful technique; a Nocturno of his own composition (Souvenir in D); and, for an encore, a waltz in A minor, also his own. Both of these are works of great merit, and were played with exquisite delicacy and grace.

But the unique feature of the concert was the playing of several Duos for the piano, by M. Guzman, assisted by his wife, herself an artist of uncommon ability. These pieces comprised the famous Duo by Kalkbrenner; a March, La Victoire, by M. Guzman; and a number of Cuban Dances for four hands by Gottschalk. It has never before been my fortune to hear two artists play together with such perfect unity, such elan, such abandon. The effect—above all in the Cuban dances—was amazing, and resembles nothing which I have ever heard. The gifted artists were frequently recalled, and the murmurs of surprise and curiosity heard on all sides bore ample testimony of their success.

They will soon give a public concert at Steinway Hall, and will, undoubtedly, make a sensation here this winter. They were assisted last evening by Miss Jenny Landsman, who sang several pieces with excellent effect.

BERLIN.—(Extracts from a private letter). A Quartet Soirée with Joachim playing the first violin; The E-flat quartet of Mendelssohn, C major of Haydn and D minor of Schubert. I have enjoyed a great deal of music in Berlin, but no programme has been so enjoyable throughout as this. The ensemble playing was perfect; I had never heard or dreamed of such violin playing as Joachim's. Such varied expression, such jollity and comic humor in the Haydn, such tenderness and such fire in the Schubert! I have heard Joachim twice before, but always at a great distance, for when we first came to Berlin we had to trust to the Hausdiener to get our tickets, now we get our tickets ourselves and get much better seats. We were quite fortunate yesterday, for nearly all the best seats and nearly all the good ones were taken by subscribers; and just as we were debating about taking the only seats that were at our disposal, a servant of Prince Radziwill came to return his master's tickets, four I think, as the Prince was ill and neither he nor his family could go to the concert. We reaped the advantage of his economy and got two seats very near, as near as possible to the performers. Good concerts are expensive here; I paid $1.50 currency for my ticket last night. All the concerts have been as much as $1.00; then you have to pay for the care of your wraps in the cloak room, and sometimes for your programme. I have heard one orchestral concert here, one of a regular series given by the royal orchestra. They gave Overture to the Abencerrages by Cherubini, Overture to Manfred by Schumann, Jupiter Symphony, Mozart, and Beethoven's G major Pianoforte Concerto, played by Ober-Kapellmeister Taubert. I had never heard of him except as a composer, principally of songs, and was surprised and delighted at his playing. It seemed to me that the orchestra played the accompaniments to the Concerto better than they did any thing else; they were wonderfully played. Then I have heard the Dom Chor of boys, who sing without accompaniment, the Kozoltverein of mixed voices, who also sing without accompaniment, and last Sunday evening I heard the Sing Academie give Mozart's Requiem, Bach's Cantata, "Gottes Zeit ist der alle beste Zeit," and a chorus "Bleib bei uns" and Choral also by Bach.

I have been disappointed in the Opera here, that is in the solo singers. The operas are splendidly put upon the stage, the scenery very beautiful; the scene in Oberon when Rezia sings "Ocean thou mighty monster," was more effective than I had imagined anything could be upon the stage. The waves come rolling in upon the shore, the sky is covered with dark clouds and there is a storm; then the clouds break away and the sun sets clear, tinging the sea and clouds with a golden light. Then the stars come out, and in the dim light you see Oberon in a fairy boat attended by mermaids, one of whom sings the mermaid's song and the others swim about and play among the waves. But the singing was pretty poor. Rezia was passable, but the tenor was about the worst I have ever heard. I have heard three tenors and none of them are good. I expect to hear the famous one to-night, and hope at last to hear a voice worth listening to. I had supposed that every part would be done well in Germany, in the royal Opera of Berlin. I have heard Mme. Joachim twice at the same time that I heard her husband. She has a lovely voice, round and full, and she sings in such a pure, simple style that it is a real delight to hear her. Not a superfluous note or grace, her style is almost severe in its simplicity. At one concert she sang Bach's "Erbarme dich," her husband playing the violin obbligato! Imagine it! She is a concert singer and sings classical music entirely; I have heard her sing Handel, Schumann, Schubert, Bach and Marcello. She has a very sweet face, lovely figure, and her bearing on the stage is just like her singing and like the music she sings.

On account of having the Prince's seats we were among the noblest last night, surrounded by gentlemen in uniform and with lots of stars and crosses and orders of all kinds dangling on their coats. Our seats were so placed that we had a full view of the audience, and I could not help once in a while looking at the people. The hall was crowded, and every face expressed thorough enjoyment. And such stillness! One poor man who sat near me, in trying to dispose of his cane, had the ill luck to drop it, and such a noise as it made in that utter quiet! The poor fellow colored up to the roots of his hair, and looked as if he would give anything to be invisible.

Nov 29th.—Well, I have heard Clara Schumann. She played a piano quartet of her husband's, a Sonata of Beethoven with Joachim, an Impromptu of Schubert, two songs without words of Mendelssohn, "Warum" and "Traumgesirren" by Schumann, and Chopin's B minor Scherzo. Parts of the quartet I enjoyed very much, but it seemed to me not to be wholly in Schumann's best vein. The Beethoven was perfect. I enjoyed it more than any thing else; it was well worth all the rest. The solos were beautifully played, but I have heard them played just as well, and at the risk of being thought infatuated by those who have not heard both, I must tell you that Mme. Schumann does not begin to play Chopin like Mr. Dresel, and I have yet to hear the person who does.

I went to the Opera last Wednesday to hear Niemann, the tenor, and was disappointed. He is a very good singer, a tenore robusto, a good strong, voice but no sweetness, and the part I saw him in—Fra Diavolo—not at all adapted to him. As a whole the opera was very well given in all the parts, much better than any I had seen before. The King was in his box and everything had to be done well. Lucca, who was Zerlina, is just the most perfect piece of prettiness I ever saw. Every feature is perfect, and she has the loveliest little figure, and she is so graceful and such a finished little actress, that she fascinates completely. I don't know whether she is capable of anything greater, but she was perfect as Zerlina, and as Angela in the Domino Noir.

I forgot to tell you I saw Auberbach at Clara Schumann's concerts; he is a fat, genial-looking little man, and seemed thoroughly to enjoy the music. Sunday before last was a Todten-Fest in Berlin. I got a wreath and for the second time made the attempt to find Mendelssohn's grave and succeeded. His grave is covered with ivy.—I enclose a leaf which I gathered—and is next that of Fanny Hensel who lies between her brother and husband, who died in 1861. On the other side of Mendelssohn lie, I suppose, two of his children, one a young boy, the other a girl 19 years old when she died in 1863; her name, Pauline Felicita, for the two brothers. His wife lies in the graveyard at Frankfurt. A fresh wreath was lying on Fanny Hensel's grave.

Concerts.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The sixth Symphony Concert crowded the Music Hall. It was the largest audience yet. The first number on the programme was the Orchestral Suite, in D, of J. S. Bach,—i. e. the same three pieces from it that were played here by Theodore Thomas recently. 1. Overture—a broad, tranquil polyphonic movement, thoroughly genial, though of quaint, antique cut, ending with a spirited and interesting fugue. The instrumentation, besides the strings (in full force), consists only of a pair of oboes, and a pair of trumpets,—the latter partly added, we believe, by Mendelssohn. 2. The lovely Aria, which charmed every one. 3. The Gavotte, full of exulting life and joy and strength, yet perfectly self-possessed, and altogether original. Our Chamber Concert-goers will remember Mr. Dresel's piano-forte arrangement of it. The whole work is full of beauty, and of a serene, deep life. It is all wholesome music; nothing of weak sentimentality about it, nothing of false excitement. We touch Bach and are strong. The pieces were quite evenly and delicately rendered, though not with all the precision of instruments long trained to move like one; and we cannot help feeling that the native tempo of that Gavotte is somewhat more deliberate than as it was then taken.

Meanwhile the stage had been crowded at both ends by a hundred or more singers of both sexes, who now came forward and were massed together for the performance of the Magnificat, in D, by Durante, (of the Neapolitan school, pupil of A. Scarlatti, contemporary of Leo and Marcello, as well as Bach and Handel:—a great day of musicians that!). Robert Franz had given it full modern orchestral accompaniment, as befitted the large, resounding, open and triumphal character of the music. It is in the sterling old Italian church style,—again a specimen of healthy music; a noble theme is started by the soprano, answered by a florid second theme in other voices, and the first theme passes in turn to every part,—all worked up together with masterly means of counterpoint, developing as from a vital germ.

Some of the six movements are in the minor, but the exulting tone prevails; the greatest moment in it is the short Gloria Patri, into which the Chorus: Sicut locutus est opens sublimely as into a boundless sea of praise:—wonderfully rich, grand harmony. The wide flood gates are twice closed for a moment, giving place to very brief, but beautiful duets of tender character, by soprano and alto, and by tenor and bass. Many listeners were greatly impressed by this large music. All must have felt how thoroughly vocal the composition is; those who rehearsed it quickly fell in love with it. But the general audience received it rather coldly, or as if doubtfully. To most it was an unwonted style, and needed to be heard several times. Moreover it was produced under great disadvantages. In the first place the choir had to be made up of volunteers from many sources, the nucleus being a portion of the Cæcilia and the twenty members of the Brookline Club, both under the tuition of Mr. KREISSMANN; to these were added six or eight sure voices of each part from the ever ready and obliging Handel and Haydn Society, a number from the Orpheus, from the Harvard Musical Association, and several ladies of Cambridge and Boston ready to make sacrifices in their zeal for Art. The opportunities for rehearsal had been few. Then, it is one thing to rehearse in a small hall like Chickering's, and another to sing, with orchestra, on the vast platform of the Music Hall; and that Hall, occupied up to the last midnight by a three week's Fair, was not accessible to the singers to try their places and their voices in the unwonted space, until within three or four hours of the Concert. Of course much was risked: and the success, on the whole more than could have been expected, was mainly due to the earnest and inspiring efforts of the director, Mr. KREISSMANN, who infused his own valor into his little regiment. It was a good ensemble of tone quality and power; an air of culture about it; excellent material, could it be kept together as a permanent singing club connected with the Symphony Concerts.

Then came Mendelssohn's second Piano Concerto, in D minor. Indulgence was bespoken for Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, who was suffering with a lame hand; but all felt that he played it admirably, only betraying a little want of strength once or twice in the rapid octave passages, while in point of finish and expression he seemed to surpass himself.

Part II. opened with the Symphony—Schumann's No. 1, in B flat, the most familiar of the four, and probably the favorite one with most. Its unity is so complete, it soars on such strong wings, sustains itself so grandly; its promises are all so surprisingly, triumphantly fulfilled; its feeling is so deep and so intense, its purpose so unerring, that you cannot get away from it, and would not if you could. Many a touch reminds you of Beethoven, to whom no one else but Schubert ever came so near. It was perhaps the best Symphony performance that our orchestra have yet realized; all was clear and well proportioned, well subdued and blended; even the wind instruments appeared to love to keep in tune; and Mr. ZERRAHN must feel that his severe labor in rehearsal is more and more rewarded. Nothing thus far in these concerts has called forth more expressions of delight than that performance and that Symphony.

Two more choruses came next; very short and very strongly contrasted, perhaps too much so. The Ave verum corpus of Mozart is well-known as a pure gem of harmony. Schumann's "Zigeuner-Lied" (Gypsy Life) is very graphic music, wild, suggestive, full of genial life. Of course there is room in the subject for very picturesque accompaniment, of which Schumann has availed himself happily. From merry tambourine song and dance, to solemn legend told by crones crouching round the midnight fire, the color of the harmony keeps changing; and the bits of solo and duet issuing from all parts of the chorus, upon a lively orchestral background, are extremely interesting.—A capital rendering of Weber's Euryanthe Overture closed the concert brilliantly.

The programme for next Thursday offers, for the grand attraction, Schubert's Colossal Symphony in C. Before it come the Wasserträger Overture by Cherubini; Beethoven's C minor Concerto, to be played by Miss ALICE DUTTON; and two male choruses: "O Isis," from the Magic Flute, and the Forester's Chorus (with horns, &c.) from Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose," sung by the Orpheus Society.

THE RUSSIAN SINGERS. Truly a fresh sensation, and a delightful one, was that produced on us by the first concert of Mr. DIMITRI AGRENEFF SLAVIANSKY and his choir of nine male voices, in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. They are worthy of far more attention than they have yet received, and, could they but remain here (after the Opera is gone) and make their quality more known, their entertainments surely would be always crowded. They appear in national fancy costumes, and are men of interesting look and bearing. Mr. SLAVIANSKY himself, their leader and director, a man of noble and commanding presence, has one of the sweetest, purest, and most cultivated tenors we have heard since Mario; indeed his upper tones remind us of that singer. His middle and lower tones are rich and manly, and he sings with remarkable feeling and expression. The Cavatina by Glinka, the humorous piece called "A Farm House" of his own composition, the "Cradle Song," and above all, the wild and characteristic "Volga's Sailor Song" (also his own, and thoroughly Russian), proved him one of the very best tenors to be heard anywhere just now.

All the other pieces were choruses or part-songs, of various character, mostly, however, in the Russian minor vein, which is very winning, and sung all in the Russian language, which, like the Slavonic tongues generally, is as musical as the Italian, and more liquid. The "Song about North," rich and wild and full of variety; the deep, religious harmony of the "Cherubim Prayer;" the Russian Songs grouped together at the opening of the second part; the "Olga Waltz," "Polish Mazurka," &c., all had a fresh, original charm; and the well-known National Hymn, by Lvoff, gracefully preceded by "Viva L'America," in English, never sounded so well to our ears. We doubt if all our Arions, Liederkränze, &c., could furnish a dozen voices that could sing so admirably together. The principal basso, a dark, Oriental looking man, is like one of those great organ pipes behind him there; there he stands, straight and still,—you cannot even see his lips move, and a great round deep sub-bass tone breathes through him, sustaining the shifting harmony at times in a prolonged organ-point. The two principal baritones also are remarkable; and all the voices are of rare power and beauty, and they sing, though unaccompanied, with perfect purity and truth of intonation.—They give a Matinée this afternoon, and we advise all to go and hear them.

ERNST PERABO'S second Matinée (second series) had for programme:

Sonata, Op. 98, No. 2, (E flat major).....Richter.
Zwei Balladen (First time in Boston).....Carl Löwe.
Drei Clavierstücke. (Recently published). No. 2, E flat major (First time in Boston).....Schubert.
Sonata, Op. 27, No. 1, E flat major.....Beethoven.

The Sonata by Richter,—Hauptmann's successor in old Sebastian Bach's place of Cantor at the Thomas Schule in Leipzig—was quite interesting; a musician-like and genial work; the Adagio particularly impressive. The two Ballads by Löwe hardly needed words (though it was well to put them on the programme), played as they were, to bring out the delicate pathos of the one ("The Departed," a Serenade by Uhland), or the grotesque, wild, weird fascination of Goethe's "Dance of the Dead," to which the music is singularly true at every point. The little piano piece by Schubert did not strike us as one of his most interesting. The E-flat Sonata of Beethoven,—the one coupled in the same opus with the "Moonlight,"—and never, that we remember, played in public here before, was exceedingly well worth hearing and was admirably rendered.

Next time we shall have a Suite by Bennett; the great Etude en forme de Variations, op. 13, by Schumann; and Beethoven's Sonata, op. 10, No. 3.

We are obliged to postpone our notice of the delightful private Soirées of the PARKER CLUB given on Friday the 14th and 21st of this month. The principal selections were the entire Athalia music of Mendelssohn; a Tenor Recitative and Choral from Bach's Christmas Oratorio; a Benedictus (Soprano Solo and Chorus) by Weber; and a selection from Gluck's Orpheus (Alto solo with chorus and dance of Furies).

English Opera.

THE PAREPA ROSA troupe has been steadily growing in favor, and seldom has the Boston Theatre witnessed a nightly average of such full houses. That is certainly an English opera far superior to our past experiences in that way, that can give so charming a performance of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" as we heard on Wednesday night. That was the second time, and the house was packed from floor to ceiling. The sudden news which reached Mme. ROSA of her mother's death in London changed the programme of last week; it was a heavy blow to her, yet she has had the energy to sing in "Der Freyschütz," as Agatha; in the "Puritan's Daughter;" in "Martha," as the Lady; wonderfully well in all, and even more so, and with a fine vivacity and grace of action too, in Mozart's bewitching Susanna. She was charmingly sustained in this by Miss ROSE HERSEE as the Countess, and Mrs. SEGWIN in the pretty part of Cherubino; not badly either by Mr. CAMPBELL as Figaro, and by Mr. LAWRENCE as the Count; while the delicious orchestral music, (flowers springing all the time spontaneously as it were at the feet of the singers), and the whole ensemble, moved satisfactorily under the now sure and energetic baton of CARL ROSA. That orchestra contains some musicians who have been of note in London; among them Mr. HOWARD GLOVER, the composer, and Mr. HOWELL, an excellent contrabassist, a cousin of Parepa. But Figaro is played again to-night for their Finale, and we will speak of the performance more at length thereafter.

Of the other productions which we have been able to attend, we may note, first, a fine one of the "Sonnambula," in which Rose Hersee's Amina, both in song and action, was as good and true as we could wish, and Mr. CASTLE used his sweet, rich tenor with a great deal of expression. Fra Diavolo, perhaps, suffered less than any piece in its English dress; it was delightfully presented in nearly all respects. A more fascinating Zerlina than Rose Hersee we hardly remember. Castle sang and acted the bravo with a free and easy grace for him. Mrs. Seguin was as pretty, and sang with her pure contralto voice as artistically, in the part of Lady Allcash, as she does in all her parts, and Mr. Seguin was the true conventional Milord. Mr. CAMPBELL and Mr. HALL took the parts of Beppo and Guiseppe, not like Italians "to the manner born," but cleverly, and the former certainly sang finely. Then there have been two capital performances of "Martha,"—Mme. ROSA as Martha, Miss Hersee as Nancy, Castle and Campbell as Lionel and Plunkett, and Seguin as Sir Tristan. And Weber's ever wonderful Der Freyschütz,—though neither Castle's Max nor Campbell's Caspar came up to old impressions of those parts—was done as a whole about as well as it has been by any German or Italian troupe here. The Agatha and Anthon of Parepa and Rose Hersee were of course artistic, though the Prvor as sung by Frederici reached a purer height of feeling. We did not hear the "Trovatore" (given three times); nor Gounod's "Faust," which appears to have been a great success, (and, next to Figaro, it was a severe test of the capabilities of an English company); nor the new Balfo opera "The Puritan's Daughter." But we shall hear the "Marriage of Figaro" again to-night, if we live, and so may you all, dear readers!

NEW HAVEN.—We think many of our readers will be interested in the programmes of three "Historical Recitals of Piano and Vocal Music" given here a few weeks since. It will be seen that the earlier and later music of the English, German, French and Italian Schools are represented in short pieces, to allow a great variety. The interpreters were: Mrs. Sara A. C. Eastman, Soprano; Mr. J. Sumner Smith, Tenor; Mr. E. A. Parsons, Pianist, and Mr. Thos. G. Shepard, Accompanist.

SALEM, MASS.—We hear but one opinion of the performance of the Messiah, on the 12th inst., in Mechanics' Hall, by the Salem Oratorio Society,—a young Society, formed about two years ago, and numbering some 300 voices in its chorus. All witnesses pronounce it one of the best performances of the Messiah that they ever heard; and some even say that it surpassed any recent effort of our Boston Handel and Haydn Society. The truth is, any young Society has some advantages over our old organization. Starting, in the first place, at a more advanced point of general musical culture and sincere belief in music, it is composed of young, fresh voices and spirits, eager for new tasks, new difficulties, unhampered by old habits and the quietistic spell of old associations. Its members do not go into the chorus ranks to revive the memories of their youth; its faces are all upturned to the future. Then again, in a quiet old town like Salem, the more cultured portion of society, not distracted by a hundred interests and attractions, like the same class in Boston, where one thing is continually jostled by another, can devote itself with whole heart and loyal punctuality to one or two good things, so as to make them truly good. As we had not the good fortune to be present, we quote from the report in the Advertiser:

The soprani were excellent, and indeed all the parts were well performed. Mrs. J. W. Weston of Salem, Mrs. C. A. Barry and Dr. J. W. Langmaid of Boston, and Mr. W. H. Beckett of New York, were the soloists. Mrs. Barry and Dr. Langmaid were almost unexceptionable, and Mrs. Weston, though slightly nervous at first, soon recovered herself, and sang the solo "I Know that my Redeemer Liveth" with fine effect. Mr. Beckett brought a great deal of care and attention to the performance of his role, but his voice is more of a barytone, and was hardly deep enough for the music of the part. Mr. Zerrahn, who seems to be indispensable to the satisfactory conducting of oratorios, was the director, and Mr. Frank W. Upton, an excellent musician, presided at the piano. The Germania Band was the orchestra, and their performances left nothing to be desired. The success of the affair is due largely to the talents and energy of the society, who, by their efforts, heartily seconded by the members, have succeeded in placing it in the front rank of our musical organizations. Mr. D. B. Hagar, of the Salem normal school, who fills the office of president of the society, has done much toward securing its prosperity.

WORCESTER, MASS.—Mr. B. D. Allen's second Chamber Concert took place Jan. 4. The Palladium says:

The concert opened with Mozart's beautiful Piano-Forte Sonata in F, with violin accompaniment, performed by Messrs. Allen and Listemann, who brought out its lovely strains and choice modulations with rare fidelity, and nicety of finish: it was a choice selection awakening anew one's loving appreciation of this artistic composer. Mr. Kreissmann sang two of Schubert's rare songs, Nos. 12 and 3 of the Schwangesang; the former, the lovely "On the Sea," admirably adapted to his voice, and sung with fine feeling and soul-felt earnestness; these with Beethoven's "Liederkreis," Op. 98, and Schumann's Songs, "Widmung," and "Frühlingsnacht," receiving interpretations such as he alone is capable of giving; it is one of the treats of a life-time to listen to him. Mendelssohn's Andante for violoncello and piano, in which Mr. Heindl's violoncello unfolded such wondrous beauties, so feelingly expressed, was highly enjoyable; the two instruments combining to make this one of the finest selections. Mr. Listemann thrilled his hearers with his fine interpretation of that very difficult piece, "La Trille du Diable," by Tartini, in which his violin became a miniature orchestra, so rich was it in harmonies. He had previously played it at seventy concerts (without notes) and yet it was rendered with the warmth and fervor of a newer and fresher experience, so earnestly did it move him. The Trio for violin, cello, and piano was thoroughly Haydnish; genial, happy and sunny; and performed by three such artists could not fail to give enjoyment.

Previous to the closing piece, Mr. Allen played Chopin's Funeral March; a touching tribute to his friend, Mr. Hamilton; played as soul speaking to soul, awakening responsive chords in the hearts of all.

DEATH OF EDWARD HAMILTON.—Edward Hamilton, Esq., died in this city Sunday noon, at the age of 57, after an illness of about three weeks, of lung fever. He was a native of Worcester; was educated as a lawyer, and had an office for a while in Barre, and subsequently in Millbury; but for many years had been employed in the Worcester County Institution for Savings. Much of his time had been devoted to Music, in which he exhibited remarkable taste, discrimination, and cultivation; and to him, more than to any other, is Worcester indebted for the reputation it has achieved in musical matters. He was a composer of music, and had published three volumes of church music—"Songs of Praise," "The Sanctus," and the "Voice of Praise," which are extensively used in the churches, and are much admired for the genius and exquisite taste they exhibit. A man of decided ability and culture, he was not less remarkable for his purity of life and character, his modest appreciation of himself, and his sympathy in all measures for the public good.—Worcester Palladium, Jan. 5.

DEATH OF GOTTSCHALK.—The last Brazilian mail steamer brings news of the death of Louis Moreau Gottschalk, the celebrated American pianist. It appears that during a concert at Rio Janeiro, while playing one of his newest compositions, called "La Morte," he fell senseless. He was taken to Tiçua, where, after lingering three weeks, he died on the 18th of December. He was about forty years of age, having been born in New Orleans in 1829. He was educated in Paris, and made his first public appearance as a pianist in April, 1845. He travelled for several years in Europe, giving concerts, and in January, 1853, gave his first one in America, at New York.

M. LEFEBURE WELY, the well-known French organist and composer of Offertories, &c., for the organ, fell dead, a few days since, at the foot of his organ, in the church of St. Sulpice, Paris.—Jan. 8.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Au revoir! not adieu. 3. D minor and major. Levey. 35

A very desirable song, far above the ordinary grade.

How gently fall those simple words, "God bless you." 3. C to e. Thomas 35

Essentially a home ballad, embodying sentiments with melody combined, which must find a home in every human heart.

A brighter world than this. 2. F to f. Cox. 30

A sweet, soothing ballad, which ought to (and probably will) become a great favorite.

Don't treat a man disdainfully. 3. C to g. Williams. 30

A lively song, fraught with good-natured sentiment.

Sweet and low. Quartet. 3. C. Barnby. 35

Tennyson's Lullaby set to music, which, if babies had musically-cultivated ears, would not fail to lull them in their most uneasy moments.

Jim the Carter Lad. 3. C to e. Williams. 30

A cheerful, jolly strain, well calculated to drive away the blues.

A Star in the dark (Una stella in notte brava).

When the corn is waving. Blamphin. 30

Non Partir. (And wilt thou go). Boott. 35

Il mio dolor. (My sorrow). Guglielmo. 35

Instrumental.

Addie Galop. Brillante. 5. Ed. Wiegand. 60
Good practice for pupils, and good music withal.

Lob der Frauen. (Praise of Woman). Polka

Mazourka. 3. D. Strauss. 40

A very graceful and pleasing Dance Piece which will more than satisfy the most fastidious Terpsichorean devotees.

Lingering Joys. Polka Mazourka. 3. C. Gerster. 30
Another attractive dance piece similar in character to the preceding.

Floating Waltz. 2. A. Wright. 30

March for the Piano-forte. 4 hands. For Teacher and Pupil. 2. C. Mason. 75

The pupil's (or primo) part of the duet is limited to the compass of a fifth, and is consequently available to pupils of the smallest executive capacity.

Polka from "Hamlet". Thomas. 35

Ein herz, ein sinn. (One heart, one soul). Polka Mazurka. Strauss. 40

Memories.

"The bird I hear sings not from yonder elm;
But the flown ecstasy my childhood heard
Is vocal in my mind, renewed by him,
Happily made sweeter by the accumulate thrill
That threads my undivided life and steals
A pathos from the years and graves between.
I know not how it is with other men,
Whom I but guess, deciphering myself;
For me, once felt is so felt nevermore.
The fleeting reliqu at sensation's brim
Had in it the best ferment of the wise.
One spring I knew as never any since:
All night the surges of the warm southwest
Boomed intermittent through the shuddering elms
And brought a morning from the Gulf adrift,
Omnipotent with sunshine, whose quick charm
Startled with crocuses the sullen turf
And wiled the bluebird to his whiff of song;
One summer hour abides, what time I perched.
Dappled with noonday, under shimmering leaves,
And pulled the pulpy exchearts, while aloof
An oriole clattered and the robins shrilled
Denouncing me as an alien and a thief;
One morn of autumn lords it o'er the rest,
When in the lane I watched the ash-leaves fall,
Balancing softly earthward without wind
Or twirling with director impulses down
On those fallen yesterday, now barred with frost,
While I grew pensive with the pensive year.
And once I learned how marvelous winter was,
When past the fence rails, downy-gray with rime,
I creaked adventurous o'er the spangled crust
That made familiar fields seem far and strange
As those stark wastes that whiten endlessly
In ghastly solitude about the pole,
And gleam relentless to the unsetting sun;
Instant the candid chambers of my brain
Were painted with these sovran images;
And later visions seem but copies pale
From those unfading frescoes of the past,
Which I, young savage, in my age of flint,
Gazed at, and dimly felt a power in me
Parted from nature by the joy in her
That doubtfully revealed me to myself.
Thenceforward I must stand outside the gate;
And paradise was paradise no more,
Known once and barred against satiety."

Rossini's "Barber of Seville."

From the Life of Rossini, by H. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS.*

When Rossini signed his agreement with Cesarini he had not the least idea what the libretto furnished to him would be. The manager had to arrange that matter with the censor before consulting the composer at all. Rossini had bound himself to set whatever was given to him, "new or old"; and it was, perhaps, fortunate that he had not left himself the right of refusing the admirable subject which Cesarini proposed to him a few days afterward.

The statement that Rossini wrote the whole of the "Barber of Seville" in thirteen days belongs originally to Stendhal. Castil-Blaze* says one month. It is certain the work did not occupy the composer near a month, and he really seems to have completed it in about a fortnight.

On the 26th December, when the agreement was signed, there was no libretto, and Rossini had not yet finished with "Torvaldo e Dorliaka," which was produced on the evening of the 26th. On that evening, and the two following ones, Rossini had to direct the execution of his new work. He was not free then until the 29th; but he was not bound to supply the first act—more than half the opera, allowing for the length and musical importance of the finale—before January 20th. The second act was to be furnished to the manager "at the time wished," and he certainly would not have desired to have it many days later than January 20th, inasmuch as the opera had to be presented to the public on February 5th.

Rossini, then, may have worked at the "Barber of Seville" from December 29th to January 24th, which would allow for the rehearsals just the time ordinarily required at the Italian theatres—twelve days. He must have composed the opera in less than a month; and he may, as Stendhal says, and as M. Azevedo repeats, apparently on Stendhal's authority, have finished it in thirteen days' time, for it is certain that some days were lost in choosing a subject, or rather in getting the choice approved by the Roman authorities.

At last, when the "Barber of Seville" had been decided upon by the manager and the censor, Rossini would only consent on condition that an entirely new libretto should be prepared for him. The construction of the new libretto was entrusted to Sterbini, the poet of "Torvaldo e Dorliaka," and as no time was to be lost, the composer suggested that he should take up his quarters in "the house assigned to Luigi Zamboni."

In this remarkable establishment, the composer, the librettist, and the original Figaro, lived together for, say a fortnight, while the masterpiece was being manufactured.

For materials Rossini and his poet had Beaumarchais' comedy and the libretto of Paisiello's opera; and this time, by way of exception, instead of composing the music piece by piece as the words were furnished to him, Rossini commenced by asking Sterbini to read to him Beaumarchais' comedy from beginning to end.

"Il Barbieri" has quite the effect of an improvisation corrected and made perfect; and it was, indeed, produced under the most favorable circumstances for unity and completeness. Rossini had made Sterbini promise to remain with him until the opera was finished, and as rapidly as the latter wrote the verses the former set them to music.

Paisiello's distribution of scenes was not adopted—was purposely avoided; though the great situations in the comedy are of course reproduced in both the operas. In the new version of the "Barber" the grotesque episodic figures of "la Jeunesse" and "l'Eveillé," which Paisiello had retained, are very properly omitted. Where recitative would have been employed by the old master, Rossini has substituted dialogue sustained by the orchestra, the current of melody which flows throughout the work being here transferred from the voices to the instruments. There are more musical pieces, and there is two or three times as much music in the new "Barber" as in the old.

Fortunately Sterbini was an amateur poet, unburdened with literary pride, and prepared to carry out the composer's ideas. Rossini not only kept up with the librettist, but sometimes found himself getting in advance. He then suggested words for the music which he had already in his head. Some of the best pieces in "Il Barbieri," notably that of "La Calunnia," seem to have been directly inspired by Beaumarchais' eloquent, impetuous prose.

On the other hand, the famous "Largo al Fattotum," though equally replete with the spirit of Beaumarchais, may be said to owe something of its rhythm, and therefore something of its gayety, to Sterbini's rattling verses. The librettist was in a happy vein that morning, and thought he had overwritten himself. He told Rossini to take what verses suited him and throw the rest aside. Rossini took them all and set them to the rapid, elastic, light-hearted melody, which at once stamps the character of Figaro.

In the room where the two inventors were at work, a number of copyists were employed, to whom the sheets of music were thrown one by one as they were finished. Doubtless the chief lodger, Luigi Zamboni, looked in from time to time to see how the part of Figaro was getting on. Probably, too, the spirited impresario called occasionally to enquire how the work generally was progressing.

But whether or not Rossini received visits, he certainly did not return them. Without taking it for granted as M. Azevedo does, that the joint authors for thirteen days and nights had scarcely time to eat; and slept, when they could no longer keep their eyes open, on a sofa (they would have saved time in the end by taking their clothes off and going to bed), we may be quite sure that "Il Barbieri" is the result of one continuous effort—if to the act of such rapid spontaneous production the world effort can be applied.

Rossini is said to have told some one, that during the thirteen days which he devoted to the composition of the "Barber" (if Rossini really said "thirteen days" there is of course an end to the question of time), he did not get shaved.

"It seems strange," was the rather obvious reply, "that through the 'Barber' you should have gone without shaving."

"If I had got shaved," explained Rossini, very characteristically, "I should have gone out, and if I had gone out I should not have come back in time."

While Rossini was working and letting his beard grow, Paisiello was quietly taking measures to insure a warm reception for the new opera.

FIRST REPRESENTATION.

First representations are a composer's battles. Rossini's hardest fight was at the first representation of the "Barber of Seville." For some reason not explained, the Roman public were as ill disposed towards Sterbini, the librettist, as toward Rossini himself—who was simply looked upon as an audacious young man, for venturing to place himself in competition with the illustrious Paisiello.

Paisiello's work had grown old (as the preface to Rossini's libretto, with all its compliments, ingeniously points out), and it had ceased to be played. Perhaps for that very reason the Roman public continued to hold it in esteem. Rossini, all the same, was to be punished for his rashness, and he seems to have been hissed, not only without his work being heard, but before one note of it had been played, and, according to M. Azevedo, before the doors were opened.

At least two original accounts have been published of the "Barber's" first representation to the Roman public—one, the most copious, by Zanolini;* the other, the most trustworthy, by Mme. Giorgi Righetti, who took a leading part in the performance on the stage. Mme. Giorgi Righetti was the Rosina of the evening.

Garcia, the celebrated tenor, was the Almaviva.

The Figaro was our friend the chief lodger, Luigi Zamboni, who, after distinguishing himself on all the operatic stages in Europe, became, like Garcia, a singing master, and taught other Figaros, besides Almavivas and Rosinas, how to sing Rossini's music.

The original Don Basilio was Vitarelli; Bartholo, Botticelli.

The overture, an original work, written expressly for "Il Barbieri," and not the overture to "Aureliano in Palmyra" afterward substituted for it, was executed in the midst of a general murmuring, "such," remarks Zanolini, "as is heard on the approach of a procession." Stend-hal says that the Roman public recognized, or thought they recognized, in the overture the grumbling of the old guardian, and the lively remonstrances of his interesting ward. But he also says that the overture performed was that of "Aureliano;" probably he confounds two different representations. M. Azevedo thinks the original overture was lost through the carelessness of a copyist, but it is difficult to understand how not only the composer's score, but also the orchestral parts, could have been lost in this manner. One thing is certain, that on the opening night the overture met with but little attention.

The introduction, according to Stendhal, was not liked, but this can only mean that it was not heard.

The appearance of Garcia did not change the disposition of the public.

"The composer," says Mme. Giorgi Righetti, "was weak enough to allow Garcia to sing beneath Rosina's balcony a Spanish melody of his own arrangement." Garcia maintained, that as the scene was in Spain, the Spanish melody would give the drama an appropriate local color; but unfortunately, the artist who reasoned so well, and who was such an excellent singer, forgot to tune his guitar before appearing on the stage as Almaviva. He began the operation in the presence of the public; a string broke; the vocalist proceeded to replace it, but before he could do so, laughter and hisses were heard from all parts of the house. The Spanish air, when Garcia was at last ready to sing it, did not please the Italian audience, and the pit listened to it just enough to be able to give an ironical imitation of it afterward.

The audience could not hiss the introduction to Figaro's air; but when Zamboni entered, with another guitar in his hand, a loud laugh was set up, and not a phrase of "Largo al factotum" was heard. When Rosina made her appearance in the balcony, the public were quite prepared to applaud Mme. Giorgi Righetti in an air which they thought they had a right to expect from her; but only hearing her utter a phrase which led to nothing, the expressions of disapprobation recommenced. The duet between Almaviva and Figaro was accompanied throughout with hissing and shouting. The fate of the work seemed now decided.

At length Rosina reappeared, and sang the cavatina which had so long been desired; for Mme. Giorgi Righetti was young, had a fresh, beautiful voice, and was a great favorite with the Roman public. Three long rounds of applause followed the conclusion of her air, and gave some hope that the opera might yet be saved. Rossini, who was at the orchestral piano, bowed to the public, then turned toward the singer, and whispered, "Oh, natura!"

The entry of Don Basilio, now so effective, was worse than a failure the first night. Vitorelli's make-up was admirable; but a small trap had been left open on the stage, at which he stumbled and fell. The singer had bruised his face terribly, and began his admirably dramatic air with his handkerchief to his nose. This in itself must have sufficed to spoil the effect of the music. Some of the audience, with preternatural stupidity, thought the fall and the subsequent consequent application of the handkerchief to the face, was in the regular "business" of the part, and not liking it, hissed.

The letter-duet miscarried, partly, it appears, through the introduction of some unnecessary incident, afterward omitted; but the audience were resolved to ridicule the work, and, as often happens in such cases, various things occurred to favor their pre-determination.

At the beginning of the magnificent finale, a cat appeared on the stage, and with the usual effect. Figaro drove it one way, Bartholo another, and in avoiding Basilio it encountered the skirt of Rosina—behaved, in short, as a cat will be sure to behave mixed up in the action of a grand operatic finale. The public were only too glad to have an opportunity of amusing themselves, apart from the comedy; and the opening of the finale was not listened to at all.

The noise went on increasing until the curtain fell. Then Rossini turned toward the public, shrugged his shoulders, and began to applaud. The audience were deeply offended by this openly-expressed contempt for their opinion, but they made no reply at the time.

The vengeance was reserved for the second act, of which not a note passed the orchestra. The hubbub was so great, that nothing like it was ever heard at any theatre. Rossini in the meanwhile remained perfectly calm, and afterward went home as composed as if the work, received in so insulting a manner, had been the production of some other musician. After changing their clothes, Mme. Giorgi Righetti, Garcia, Zamboni, and Botticelli went to his house to console him in his misfortune. They found him fast asleep.

The next day he wrote the delightful cavatina, "Ecco ridente il cielo," to replace Garcia's unfortunate Spanish air. The melody of the new solo was borrowed from the opening chorus of "Aureliano in Palmyra," written by Rossini, in 1814, for Milan, and produced without success: the said chorus having itself figured before in the same composer's "Ciro in Babilonia," also unfavorably received. Garcia read his cavatina as it was written, and sang it the same evening. Rossini, having now made the only alteration he thought necessary, went back to bed, and pretended to be ill, that he might not have to take his place in the evening at the piano. The charming melody which, in "Il Barbiere," is sung by Count Almaviva in honor of Rosina, is addressed by the chorus in "Aureliano" to the spouse of the grand Osiris, "Sposa del Grande Osiride," etc.

At the second performance the Romans seemed disposed to listen to the work of which they had really heard nothing the night before. This was all that was needed to insure the opera's triumphant success. Many of the pieces were applauded; but still no enthusiasm was exhibited. The music, however, pleased more and more with each succeeding representation, until at last the climax was reached, and "Il Barbiere" produced those transports of admiration among the Romans with which it was afterward received in every town in Italy, and in due time throughout Europe. It must be added, that a great many connoisseurs at Rome were struck from the first moment with the innumerable beauties of Rossini's score, and went to his house to congratulate him on its excellence. As for Rossini, he was not at all surprised at the change which took place in public opinion. He was as certain of the success of his work the first night, when it was being booed, as he was a week afterward, when every one applauded it to the skies.

The tirana composed by Garcia: "Se il mio nome saper voi bramate," which he appears to have abandoned after the unfavorable manner in which it was received at Rome, was afterward re-introduced into the "Barber" by Rubini. It is known that the subject of the charming trio "Zitti, Zitti" does not belong to Rossini—or, at least, did not till he took it. It may be called a reminiscence of Rossini's youth, being note for note the air sung by Simon in Haydn's "Seasons," one of the works directed by Rossini at Bologna when he was still a student at the Lyceum.

Finally, the original idea of the air sung by the duenna Berta is taken from a Russian melody which Rossini had heard from the lips of a Russian lady at Rome, and had introduced into his opera for her sake. It is melodious, and above all lively; yet, occurring at a point in the drama where, for a time, all action ceases, it came to be looked upon as a signal for ordering ices.

Rossini wrote a trio for the scene of the music lesson, which has been either lost or (more probably) set aside by successive Rosinas who have preferred to substitute a violin concerto, or a waltz, or a national ballad, or anything else that the daughter of Bartholo would have been very likely to sing to her music-master. It is a pity that the trio cannot be recovered. Rosina might still sing a favorite air between the acts.

The original Rosina, by the way, Mme. Giorgi Righetti, had a mezzo soprano voice; indeed, Rossini in Italy wrote none of his great parts for the soprano. When he first began to compose, the highest parts were taken by the sopranoist, while the prima donna was generally a contralto—an arrangement somewhat suggestive of our burlesques, in which male parts are taken by women, female parts by men.

Rossini rose from the contralto (Mme. Malanotte in "Tancredi," Mme. Marcolini in "L'Italiana in Algeri," to the mezzo soprano (Mme. Giorgi Righetti and Mlle. Colbran); but in his Italian operas, the part of Matilda in "Matilda di Sabran" is the only first part written for the soprano voice. Amelaide, the soprano of "Tancredi," is a lady of secondary importance, the chief female part being of course that of Tancredi.

About the Boston Music Hall.

Thus from his "Easy Chair," in Harper's Magazine, discourseth our old friend, GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS:

It is not, of course, possible that New York feels any chagrin that Boston has given the most colossal concert ever known upon the continent; but it is observable that, as wind and fire finally levelled the last timber of the Boston Coliseum in the dust, the first step was taken toward the Beethoven Centennial Celebration in New York. The project is not yet matured; but a vision of something very large indeed, something "metropolitan," begins to allure expectation; and Boston, having scored handsomely in the game, sits upon the ruins of her Coliseum and the profits of her Jubilee to see what New York will do.

If New York will build a proper hall for musical and other public purposes, she will do well, and the Beethoven Centennial will not be in vain. The Cooper Institute Hall is large enough for political meetings, and Steinway Hall is good for many purposes; but it is not a beautiful nor imposing room, as a great hall should be. The most impressive hall in the country is still the Boston Music Hall, where great height and two galleries, one above the other, with the organ and the imposing statue of Beethoven, give a fine feeling of dignity. But the Music Hall lacks one of the chief characteristics of a noble room for the purposes to which it is devoted, and that is, brilliancy. It is too dark. There is no smiling splendor of effect, which is always so enlivening. The darkness of the hall may be agreeable to weak eyes; it may even be described as "very much better than a glare of light"; but brilliancy remains an indispensable quality of a great hall devoted to popular enjoyment.

Yet, whether dark or light, how much has been enjoyed in that stately room! What memorable figures have passed across that platform! What exquisite strains of music, sung, played, or spoken, have died along those walls! No one who is familiar with our history for the last twenty years will sit in that hall for any purpose but suddenly he sees it crowded with a silent and attentive throng; sees a reading desk with vases of flowers, and a man of stately figure standing behind it, whose voice is deep and penetrating and sincere; whose words are things; who has a certain rustic shyness of movement, but whose sentences roll and flash like the volleys of a trained soldiery, and who stands in the warmth of his own emotion and the sympathy of his audience an indomitable gladiator, compelling the admiration even of his enemies as he fights with the Ephesian heasts. Against him, as he stands there every Sunday preaching to that vast multitude what seems to him the truth, and breaking to them what he believes to be the very bread of life, other men are preaching and praying, and the excommunications of the Vatican against Luther, shorn of their thunder and lightning, are hurled. Who is he that judges motives and sincerity? We do not know in this world what is believed, but only what is said and done.

This man, with bald head set low upon high, square shoulders, who looks firmly at the great audience through spectacles, and speaks in a low, half nasal tone, visits the widows and fatherless, and keeps himself unspotted from the world. What he believes, others may question. What he is, every aspiring soul must admire. Although almost every one of them would have theologically cast him out, and have recoiled from him with dismay, yet he preserves more than any other the traditional power and individuality of the old New England clergy. He applies the eternal truth, the moral law, as he feels it, to the life and times around him. They are heated white, and his words are blows of a sledge hammer to mould them into noble form. That dauntless mien is the true symbol of his mental aspect as he confronts the menacing principalities and powers; and the man whose voice has so often charmed the crowded hall is one of the few who distinctly see and foretell the terrible war.

Long since his tongue is silent. He who came of the toughest stock, and might have looked to live almost a century, died when it was half spent. It may have seemed to the great throng easy to climb that platform and preach a sermon every Sunday morning; but to study early and late, as if he would master all knowledge—to write books, lectures, and speeches—to travel hard by night and day, losing his sleep and his food, and by the dim light in the car still pushing out the frontiers of his learning—to deny himself exercise and useful rest while the mental tension was so constant and the moral warfare so intense—this was not easy; this was to violate all the laws of life, which none knew better; and suddenly the stretched harp string snapped, and there was no more music!

Not every one who knew his power knew into what sweetness and tenderness it could be softened, nor suspected that in the gladiator there was the loving and simple heart of the boy. Here, as the Easy Chair sits listening to the orchestra, it recalls the preacher when he was the minister of a rural parish, and used to come strolling through the fields and patches of wood to measure his wit with the friendly scholar who was the chief at Brook Farm, or to sit docile at his feet of counsel and sympathy. Or, again, it sees him in his country pulpit, the same sturdy, heroic athlete, trying and tempering the weapons with which he was to fight upon this larger scene. It was a noble character; a devoted, generous, inspiring life; a memory always hallowed in this hall. The conductor waves his baton! The symphony thunders from a hundred instruments, but through them all breathes the low tone of the remembered voice.

Fled is that music? Do I wake or sleep?

And as the concert proceeds, one of the series of the Harvard Musical Association, whose concerts are the musical pride of Boston, at which the performance is all of the purest classical music—so pure and so severe that the profane sometimes secretly ask whether melody in music is the unpardonable sin, and are peremptorily answered by the elect, "No; but rab-dub-dub and tum-tiddy are not music!"—as the concert proceeds it is surely a striking spectacle. The great hall, rather dimmer than ever because of the consciousness of daylight outside, is full of people, gathered in the afternoon, not only from the city, but from all the environs within twenty miles, and they sit as attentive and absorbed as a class of students at an interesting lecture. If, in such a concert, melody is not the unpardonable sin, whispering is. Woe betide a whisperer at a Harvard Musical! It were better for him, or even her, that the money for the tickets had been expended at the minstrels or the museum. You might as well be a forger, a swindler, a perjurer, a burglar in ordinary life, as to be a whisperer at a Harvard Musical. Yes—you might as well "speak right out in meetin'" itself as whisper here.

Such a disciplined audience, so quiet, so attentive, so susceptible to the slightest sigh of the oboe or wail of the violin, is a marvelous spectacle. They are hearing the finest and much of the freshest music in the world. They are not exactly sympathetic; perhaps the character of the music does not permit it. They applaud calmly, and, as it were, with reservations. It really seems sometimes that they approve the music rather than enjoy it. But the Easy Chair reflects with pride that the organizer of these concerts, if such a word may be used—and certainly with no exclusion of the cooperation which alone makes such concerts possible—is a Brook Farmer; and it complacently smiles upon the great multitude as unconscious pupils of that Arcadian influence.

And, indeed, in other days in this same city of Boston—in the halcyon days of the "Academy" concerts at the old Odeon, or still more ancient Boston Theatre—many of the Brook Farmers were often present in the flesh. Those were the days, or rather the nights, when Beethoven was truly introduced to America. Precluded with the pretty "Zanetta" overture by Auber, or with the "Serenade" or the "Domino Noir," or with Hérold's shrill "Zampa," or some strain which would not now be tolerated in the Harvard concerts, the Fifth Symphony was played until it became familiar. And the long, willowy Schmidt stood at the head directing, proud as a general commanding his column. In the audience, earnest, interested, attentive, sparkling with humor was Margaret Fuller, not hesitating, when the thoughtless girls whispered and giggled in the most solemn adagio strains, to lean over when the movement ended, and to say to the offenders, "But let us have our turn, too; some of us came to hear the music."

There, also, was the delegation from Brook Farm, in whose appearance it was plain to see that in Arcadia the hair was worn long, that the stiff cravat and collar were repudiated, and that woollen blouses were a mute protest against the body coats of a selfish and competitive civilization. Those young fellows walked in from the Farm and out again. They made nothing of ten miles or so each way under the winter stars. And with them and of them, already accomplished in the beautiful science, already familiar with the great works of the great composers, was the present tutelary genius of the Harvard concerts, whose life, consecrated as critic and lover to this art, has been a true service to his city, and, reflectively, to the country.

But even Boston does not deny the charm of Theodore Thomas's orchestra, and the delight of the New York Philharmonic music. Indeed, there was no audience which, from its training, was more authorized to judge the great excellence of the Thomas orchestra than that of the Harvard concerts. But when he went to Boston it was not a doubting Thomas. He did not play Bach and Beethoven only, but he tickled the amazed multitude with positive tunes. He raised his baton, and his varied orchestra, a single instrument in his magic grasp, consented to waltzes; or, like a cathedral choir becoming suddenly a lark, trilled airy roundelays, with which delighted, but not all assured of the propriety of delight, the audience smiled and shook, and the youngest catechumens even tapped time faintly with their feet! A sound which, could it be conceived audible in the midst of one of the Harvards, would probably cause such a shudder of horror that the hall itself would fall as by an earthquake.

Thus the Music Hall itself is a kind of symphony of memories. It is full of delightful ghosts. Among the visible figures there are a host of the unseen; and every singer, player, speaker, as he stands for an hour upon the platform, is measured by the masters of his art. But in the famous Peace Jubilee it had no part. Indeed the musical taste of which it is peculiarly the temple resisted the colossal and continuous concert with bells, anvils, and cannon as something monstrous, and as repulsive to true art as a huge and clumsy Eastern idol. But not even the finest taste of the Music Hall denied the impressiveness and grandeur of the result. New York, in the Beethoven Centennial, will have immense advantages. The musical resources of the city are truly "metropolitan," and such should the festival be.

Music in Rome.

[Correspondence of the Philad. Evening Bulletin.]

THE OPERA SEASON.—SGAMBATI'S MATINEES.—BEETHOVEN, SCHUMANN AND RAFF PLAYED BY ITALIANS.—PICTURE OF A ROMAN CONCERT ROOM.

ROME, Jan. 7, 1870.—Advent is over. This is a signal at Rome for all sorts of gaieties to begin. From now until Lent the opera, vaudeville and concerts have full sway. At the "Apollo," the opera house of the mode, they are giving Donizetti's Leonora and the Brahma ballet. I tried to rent a box in the dress-circle for the season—no other part of the house is proper for a lady, according to the fiat of the Roman Mrs. Grundy—but it was impossible. I shall have to bide my time, and pounce down on one some day when death or the departure of an ambassador leaves an opening. An opera director whom I know had to wait two years to get a box for his bride, and then seized on one by chance.

The opera is a necessity to a Roman lady. She does not care to go every night, but at least twice a week; and every woman of means and family expects to have her opera-box even more than her carriage. The first and third nights of an opera are the grand dress occasions. The second and fourth are off-nights. Many persons rent a box for every first or every first and third, or every fourth representation, and so on, as the affair suits their purse or convenience. A family, or two friends, will often divide the four representations between them. The season of the Carnival, as the present one is called, gives twelve operas, each one four times; thus offering a chance to every one. The off-nights are not so costly as the dress nights. If you rent a box, for example, for the fourth representation, you pay seventy scudi for the season of twelve nights. If you can get one for a first representation, you pay ninety scudi, or more.

When you cannot get a box for the season, you must watch for a chance when their owners are going to some ball, or are otherwise engaged. Almost every night there is a possibility of doing this, especially on off-nights. You cannot rent a single seat. You must take a whole box, which holds four persons comfortably. And it is a very nice thing to do, not only for your own pleasure, but for your friends, especially if you have not an establishment, and do not entertain, as almost every one does in Rome. An opera box makes honors easy between you and those to whom you owe agreeable debts of hospitality; and it is not a ruinous thing either.

The Sgambati matinees began on Wednesday. They will last from six weeks to two months, as they will take place once a week or fortnight. They are always delightful. Yesterday the programme was a string quartet of Beethoven (F major, op. 59, No. 1), one of those "three miracles," as the three quartets of the opus are called. Pinelli and his companions played it tolerably. They have improved since last season. But Italians never play Beethoven as Germans do. It is strange, for they play Schumann well; they seem to comprehend his music, but they execute Beethoven as if they were afraid of the poor old musical giant. The tradition remains among them that his music was once pronounced by artists of that day mystification and unplayable; they never forget it.

The second piece was Raff's Sonata in E minor, opus 73, for piano and violin—especially violin—like the fifteenth amendment's "specialty Pomp," as Pinelli's violin part was not equal to Sgambati's piano, and yet the composition exacted that it should be better. I did not like "Pomp." But the cream of the cup was the third and last piece—Schumann's quartet in E flat, opus 47, for piano, violin, alto and cello. The string performers played smoothly and true—they felt the influence of Sgambati's fine execution. The second movement struck me especially; it went off gloriously. But, indeed, the whole thing was played in perfect balance, and the piano was ruling power with Sgambati on the throne. Liszt came in for the cream with his friend, the handsome Hungarian Envoyé, a Monsignore with whom I have seen him so much lately. The great pianist made, as he always does, a little flutter. Liszt brings with him an indefinable influence that certainly does make the music go better; he is what these Italians call sympatico, and Sgambati especially feels it, I am sure, for when Liszt is present, he plays with an elan and pride that make his music charming to listen to, and Liszt's appreciation is magnetic.

But there is always a grotesque side to everything poetical, you know, and we had it at the concert, or at least I had, to perfection. Beside me sat a fanatico per la musica. He acted as if the music was specially for him; the audience was a vexatious intrusion; he would have turned us out if he could; he looked like a little terrier in pursuit of a rat, watching the whole. He applauded each musician as if he was their especial patron. Liszt's entrance had no effect on my fanatico, except to bore him; he knew nothing nor nobody greater than the music. It was a serious grumbling pleasure he took in it, however; and once, when there was a slight whisper in a far-off corner of the room, he rose up then and there, right in the middle of a movement, and uttered a furious "CHUT!" which startled us all half out of our senses. How Liszt lifted his eyebrows, and pouted out his tiger lips at him! But that made no difference to my neighbor; he cared for neither Piano King, nor Kaiser representative, nor Lord nor Lady; to him

"Musical life was real,
Musical life was earnest,
And conversation was not its goal."

The room in which these matinees are held is as old-fashioned as possible. It looks like a deserted drawing or ball-room—not a very handsome one either—turned into a music-room for the occasion. There is a chimney-place, with an old mirror; a rough uncarpeted platform is in a corner near one of the windows, with seats huddled together for the musicians, and not room enough on it for the piano, which extended out in the audience part. Straw chairs are placed in rows against the wall, chimney recesses and around the piano and platform. There is a simple ingrain carpet on the floor, and an old chandelier which is never lighted. And this is the room they use year after year.

At the front entrance are a couple of gens d'armes; up stairs, two more gens d'armes. This gives style. A spruce little Buttons, who looks like a Roman gamin dressed up for the occasion, hands you a programme. One of the artists takes your shawl or coat and gives you a check for it, even though you may have your Jeemes Yellowplush following you with a foot-warmer, as some of the ladies have. Another artist receives your ticket, and very likely a third will offer you his arm, especially if you are a distinguished patroness, or one whose opinion he values. He will escort you into this poor little concert-room with all the grand Roman air, entertain you with a charming bit of conversation, and look all the time as if he was your condescending slave. A royal duke introducing you into the palace of his ancestors could not do it better or more naturally.

Before the concert is over, if the musicians cannot read their music, two or three wax candles are hunted out of a corner, or a pocket, or an instrument-box, and put into the tin candle-holders of the music stands, more often awry than straight; but that is no matter to these Italians; they are all born artists, and consequently never do anything in an orderly way. But, after all, there is a charming picturesque effect produced, which makes you think of an old picture or an old stone.

The other afternoon, when the Schumann quartet was played after the second movement, while the applause was going on, these dolce far niente musicians were bowing and routing around at the same time for some candles, looking at each other helplessly. At last a piece of one was hauled out of a pocket, wrapped in paper, doubtless kept by the owner for going up and down the dark staircases of these Roman palazzi, which are never lighted, unless wealthy forestieri rent the apartments. At last three candles were mustered together out of hidden recesses, jammed into the rickety tins, and the music poured out its rich flood in the lovely ante-chamber. Heart and soul went into it; the artists played as much for their own pleasure as for that of their audience. Pinelli's rather commonplace Roman face grew very dreamy and interesting; the candle-light, mingled with the dim day, fell on Sgambati's curious head and features, and made him look like an inspired Zingara. And the audience—Princesses whose names are in the Almanach de Gotha, lords and ladies and rich commoners, a distinguished prelate-ambassador, the great Liszt—about two hundred and fifty of us in all—were as happy as if we had been in a fine hall whose appointments were in keeping with the delightful music. And such a picture as it made—full of suggestions for fifty romances!

The Libretto of Der Freischütz.*

A short time before his death (on the 25th June, 1844), Friedrich Kind published at Leipzig a work entitled Das Freischütz-buch, containing, besides the libretto of Der Freischütz, some curious details concerning the relations between Kind and his collaborator, Carl Maria von Weber, from which we extract the following particulars:

"Some time during the year 1816, Herr Schmiedel, Kammermusicus, called upon me, and brought with him a stranger dressed in black, and having a pale but clever face. Judging from his long arms, and his unusually developed hands, I at first took him for a pianist; it was Carl Maria von Weber. I was delighted at making his acquaintance; he had already a certain amount of reputation. He had set to music some popular songs taken from those of Herder and the Wunderhorn, of Körner and myself. This had flattered me all the more, as, up to then, I had never had any communication with him. I knew, moreover, that he was to have the post of chapel-master at Dresden.

"The conversation became animated; we spoke of a variety of subjects. At length, Weber said to me: 'You must write me an opera.' The proposal made me laugh. I had tried my hand at various kinds of composition, it is true, but the notion of writing a libretto had never entered my head. I rather liked the idea; besides, it is my firm conviction that nothing ought to be impossible for a poet. I frankly confessed to Weber that I scarcely knew my notes. He said that that would make no difference. 'It is settled; we shall understand one another; we will arrange the rest some other time!' We took leave of each other like two old friends.

"Weeks and months passed by; I had all sorts of work to do, but this did not cause me to renounce my project. I remembered that certain of my poems had been set to music, and proved successful; I remembered, too, having read, somewhere or other, that, by being united with opera, tragedy would reach the acme of perfection. Lastly, Weber came and settled at Dresden, though I forget when.† He called and again spoke of my libretto. I at first affected unwillingness, but I did so like a girl who only desires to get married. I had often heard of the exacting disposition of composers, who look upon an opera merely from a musical point of view, and compel the author to introduce all sorts of modifications and alterations. I spoke out frankly to Weber on the subject. 'I will set your book,' he said, 'just as you send it in, of that I give you my word; as for details, which will require simply a stroke of the pen, you will, out of friendship to me, not refuse to change them.'

"The question was now to find a subject; I wanted a popular one, suited to Weber's peculiar kind of talent and my own. We looked through Museums and a Benedictus; collections of romances and of tales. At length we decided on Apel's Freischütz, but we afterwards gave it up. The censure was severe; the subject might be considered dangerous, as tending to propagate superstitious ideas. Besides, in Apel's story, the lovers die. This would not be allowed on the stage. All these difficulties discouraged us, and we parted without coming to any determination.

"But the notion had taken a firm hold of me; my heart beat high; I paced up and down my room, exciting my imagination with the fresh poetry of the forests and of popular legends. At length, the mists cleared away, and the dawn began to appear. That same evening, or the next morning very early, I ran off to Weber. 'I will do Freischütz for you. I will tackle the devil himself! I go back; I will have nothing modern. We are living at the end of the Thirty Years' War, in the midst of the Forests of Bohemia. A pious hermit has appeared to me! The white rose is a protection against the Demon hunter! Innocence comes to the aid of the strong one, when the latter is hesitating; hell succumbs, and Heaven is triumphant!' I narrated my plot at length, and we flung ourselves in each other's arms, exclaiming: 'Long live our Freischütz!'

M. Edmond Neukomm relates (History of Der Freischütz, Paris, A. Faure, 1867) how the two friends came to quarrel after the triumph achieved by their work at Berlin, on the 18th June, 1821:—

"Weber had only returned a short time to Dresden, when his recent joy was succeeded by a feeling of sorrow, caused by the susceptibility of his collaborator, Kind.

"Kind accused Weber of not having brought him sufficiently forward, and, in addition, with having used him merely for his own ends. It was in vain that Weber appealed to their old friendship, and reminded him of his letters immediately after the first representation of their work at Berlin. But nothing was of any avail.

† He left Berlin on the 12th January, 1817, and arrived the next evening at Dresden.

Quite the contrary: just as the success of Der Freischütz increased, the greater was the amount of dissatisfaction manifested by Kind, who, at length gave full vent to his feelings. It was at the end of 1821. Der Freischütz had made its way triumphantly through all Germany; it had been represented simultaneously at every large theatre in that country. Its success had everywhere proved the same, immense and nearly unopposed; the work had, in consequence, brought in the sum of 1,693 thalers to its author, in less than six months. Weber thought this was the time for making another attempt at reconciliation with his friend Kind. He wrote him a charming letter, one of those letters which he so well knew how to write, a letter which was dictated by the heart from beginning to end. Considering his embarrassed circumstances, Weber begged Kind to accept thirty ducats, a sum equal to that they had fixed for Kind's share, and which had been paid . . . 'My dear fellow, allow me to slip this into your hand, and promise me you will lay it out in some way agreeable to yourself, and to your friends, so that I may see my sole object in sending it gratified, namely: a wish to please you.'

"But Kind was not in the slightest degree touched by Weber's delicacy. He returned the present, accompanied by a letter, in which he complains of composers, who purchase a poem dirt cheap, and then consider the business settled, while they continue to enable every one else, singers, machinists, choristers, and even lamp-men, to profit by the large sums the opera brings in. He summed up by saying that a person worthy of belief, had stated that Count Brühl had sent 800 thalers for him, but that he had not seen a rapp. He returned, therefore, the thirty ducats to Weber, and looked upon the business as terminated. Weber kept his sorrow to himself, and said nothing."

Pauline Lucca.

An instance of the revolution which the possession of a fine voice will effect upon the poorest fortunes is given in the career of Mme. Pauline Lucca. Like Mlle. Nilsson, the Baroness von Rahden owes her prosperity to exceptional natural abilities discovered among humble surroundings. Her youth was passed in poverty. The necessities of her family drove the little child to eke out subsistence by dancing in the Vienna Hoftheatre ballet, where she received more rebuffs than praises—rebuffs amounting often to positive cruelty. In 1850 the child of eight was scolded and threatened by the ballet master: even her parents' religion (they were Jews) being added to the scoffs of which the German language is so susceptible. Little Pauline was stupid, or wilful, and was ultimately rejected as useless for a dancer. In this extremity a relative who possessed some means offered to have her educated for a governess. She was sent to school, where she fared ill, according to her own account, published in a foreign paper from which we take some few particulars of her life. The story of her school-life is contained in a letter to a friend. She says:

"When I first entered the school I was scarcely nine years old. Some years before, as the child of a well-to-do merchant, I had attended school, but now learned the difference between such a position and my present standing. It was a long time before I could drill my childish heart to endure in silence all the humiliations to which I was subjected. But a triumph lay in store for me. At the time for the examination drew near, teachers and scholars were in continual excitement. I, alone, beheld the preparations with indifference, because certain I would be considered too insignificant to be questioned. Every day, from twelve until one o'clock, we were practised in singing; not in the form of regular musical instruction, but simply required to follow the air played on a violin, and drilled like so many canary birds. I was never allowed to sing, but served the teacher as a music stand, holding his notes for him. Everything was finally prepared, and the august day arrived. I remember how awed we were by the appearance of the principal in a new cap of extraordinary construction. We were required to dress alike, and trouble enough my poor mother had had to meet the expense of my outfit. The guests were assembled; the girls were ranged on benches—I in a corner behind the others—and the terrible man, the Examiner, proceeded to business. A solitary question was put to me just when I had arranged myself most comfortably to overlook the room. Of course, as I had not the least idea of the proper answer, I replied at random, and sat down again amid the scornful laughter of my fellow-scholars, and the frowns of my teachers. The Examiner alone seemed intensely amused, as if he considered the reply especially appropriate. I was again aroused by the rising of the whole school preparatory to singing. I looked up and saw my mother directly before me, the tears rolling down her face, and looking reproachfully at me. For the first time I was really mortified, and the thought flashed through my mind: How can I make up for that stupidity? I had been forbidden even the privilege of holding the notes at my examination, but with the assurance of fate, my heart urged me to go forward with the rest to sing.

"Quick as thought I advanced, heedless of the curious looks of the teachers. After the others had, parrot-like, gone over the songs required, the Examiner, whom I had earnestly, wistfully stared at during the singing, turned suddenly to me, with the question: 'Now, what can you sing?' 'Ach! every thing the others have sung—every thing,' answered I, sturdily.

"So, so! then sing this—"

"It was a little air which I disliked; I turned up my pug nose, but sang it; then instantly asked permission to sing the Ave Maria, which, being the most difficult, had been omitted by the others. Permission was granted, and seizing the notes with the eagerness of one determined at one stroke to make amends for the past, I sang that simple but inexpressibly touching composition; (even now when I sing it the tears spring to my eyes). How did I sing? I do not know—only this much I remember, that as I ended I found myself caught in the arms of the Examiner, who, between tears and kisses, exclaimed, 'Child, thou hast sung like an angel!' I turned to my schoolmates, to meet only sour, envious faces—but one little girl ran up to embrace me and congratulate me. My mother was in a flutter of delight, and could not sufficiently express her wonder."

From the day when Pauline proved at school the possession of at all events one talent in an admirable degree, her vocation was decided. She was at once made a member of the chorus connected with the Kärnthner Theater, and half a dozen years later she made her first impression upon the public. She was seventeen, when in October, 1857, she sang the role of the first bridesmaid in "Der Freischütz." We are indebted to her again for a description of this important evening. The theatre was crowded to excess, and away upon "Olympus" sat a little, dried up, weather-beaten Jew, anxiously waiting for the moment of his child's success, for she had assured him she meant to create such a furore as to incite the manager to engage her for the rendition of the second best parts. She has not greatly altered since that time in personal appearance—is now, as then, a plump, graceful figure, with large, brilliant, blue-grey eyes, shadowed by long black lashes, and arched by boldly defined brows. She entered, leading the bridal chorus, and kneeling before Agathe, began the well-known melody in such a joyous, dashing, lark-like fashion, that the audience broke out in tumultuous applause. Such a rendition they had never before heard, and the little leader was called to the front of the stage to repeat the song. When the curtain finally fell, and the little old man waited impatiently at the door of the chorus green-room, Pauline flew out with the delightful news that she was engaged at six hundred guineas yearly to sing the lesser solo parts. It was, however, necessary that the orchestral conductor, Eckert, should first test her voice. This he did the following day, and pronounced the astonishing judgment that she possessed neither voice nor talent, and must remain in the chorus. Pauline has never lacked spirit, so she stamped her little foot in a rage, crying out that she had both voice and talent, and would show him sometime what he had lost; furthermore, she would never sing in the chorus again—and never again in Vienna. She persuaded her father to leave Vienna, and six months later we find her prima donna of the theatre of Olmütz. Here, during that winter she studied eighteen new parts, running the gamut of impersonations, from the tragic to the most extravagant soubrette. From Olmütz she went to Prague, where the intendant of the Royal Opera in Berlin discovered her—a happy man when he coaxed the rare bird to remove to that city. Since 1861 she has been attached, under a life-long contract, to the Royal Opera of the Prussian capital. The little Vienna Jewess—Pauline Lucas—has become the Christian Pauline Lucca, since a few years back the wife of the Baron von Rahden.

From the first evening of her appearance on the Berlin stage, she has been adored by the enthusiastic Berlin public. Whether personating Margaret, Selika, Valentine, Lronora, or the many other characters for which she is fitted, she is as successful in her wonderful influence upon her audience. There are greater artists in so far as the brilliant execution of astonishing trills and painfully wonderful staccato measures goes for music, but there are few such singers as Pauline Lucca. It is her peculiar talent to merge all individuality in the rendition of the character she may be performing—it is never Pauline, it is always Margaret, Selika, Valentine we see and hear. She is utterly free from affectations of any sort, and her great success is mainly due to her being always so simply, charmingly natural.

Her house as that of the Baroness von Rahden, is one of the most popular among the aristocracy of Berlin, and, although she gives delightful balls, dancing still remains her weakness—she likes it no better than when an eight-year old child. By a strange freak of fate the same operatic conductor who pronounced such severe judgment upon her in Vienna is now occupying the same position in Berlin. For the past year, the Baroness has been suffering from a disease of the throat, which has prevented her interpretation of the more important musical roles.—Orchestra.

Lefebure Wely.

By the death of this great virtuoso, aristocratic and elegant Paris has lost its own particular organist. I mean that one among contemporary organists whose talent was a more faithful expression than that of any one else of a class of persons of the present epoch, who pursue the road to Heaven with every possible regard to their own comfort. This favor, this reputation was something he saw spring up and grow without much effort on his part, for he simply obeyed his artistic temperament, and followed the impulses of a lively disposition, and of an extraordinarily fertile imagination.

Lefebure (Louis James Alfred), born at Paris, the 13th November, 1817, was the son of an organist of St. Roch. It is very certain that he knew his notes and the key-board before he knew his letters. At the age of eight, he played his first mass. When he was fifteen, he acted as his father's substitute, and about the same time, carried off at the Conservatory, where he had Halévy for master, the prizes for organ, counterpoint and fugue. It was on the organ of St. Roch that he began to indulge in his picturesque and daring extempore playing, always elegant, and sometimes grand and elevated; it placed him at the head of a new school, which possesses the secret of combining, in due proportions, melody and sentiment with science.

On being appointed organist to the Madeleine, in 1847, he found an instrument of Cavallé-Coll's. Its resources, until then ignored, were destined to put it in his power to realize all his inspirations. With what ardor, with what skill, did he not assist the impulse given to the organ building of modern times by physical science! By constant application, he acquired the art of combination, exquisite taste, a happy mixture of the different stops, an inexhaustible variety of sonorous effect, and, lastly, his mechanical virtuosity. He found, too, in this church, select, delicate and impressionable hearers, who responded to his natural inclinations, and mundane tastes, and, by their suffrages, furnished with wings his exhibitions of extempore playing.

Lefebure was at the apogee of his reputation, when, in the month of April, 1863, he took possession of the great organ at St. Sulpice. In his new position, he found himself exposed to the jealousy of his rivals, and to a fresh outburst of criticism. The principal charges against him were the want of religious character in his ideas, and their petulance; these, however, constituted a great portion of the secret by which he achieved success in a church, the services of which should be distinguished by a great austerity of character. He could not bring himself not to shine, not to please, not to "faire diversion," and for this he sacrificed seriousness. The mathematical side of his art, the cold and inflated style [!] of the fugue, damped his dashing nature. Not that he ignored or did not appreciate these things; far from it. In his notebook, under the date of May, 1865, I read: "I extemporized to day an intermingled fugue for them; I hope they will not now say that I can play only polkas! He was a profound harmonist, and no one was more capable of coming back to his melody, by a series of chords, sometimes astonishingly daring. On other occasions, a simple modulation sufficed to carry him away from his original theme. Yet, such was his love for art, that he neglected nothing which could contribute to expand and embellish the theme. For instance, every Sunday he used to read over the particular Offertory of the day, and then extemporized according to the sense and character of the words. Ought not every good organist to do the same. His extempore playing was, indeed, the accentuated re-echo of his nervous disposition. He entranced and carried away even those who did not like his manner. Rossini said to him one day, very justly: "People like you much more for your faults than for your good qualities."

A blade so thoroughly tempered naturally wore out the scabbard. On the organ at St. Sulpice, an organ requiring a great deal of physical strength, Lefebure, whose health was already much shaken, expended his energies with an ardor that accelerated his end. He was eaten up by fever; his extempore playing revealed his state. "He seemed to fear," as our colleague, Hip. Prevost wrote, the other day, "that he would not have sufficient time to sing, in his own harmonious language, all the melodies in his soul." The moment arrived, however, when he was compelled to beg M. Louis Dessane, the organist of the choir, to take his place "up there," when he was compelled to trust his reputation to that gentleman, as distinguished as modest, whom, during his lifetime, he designated as his successor—and this artistic testament will, doubtless, be carried out. It was only with great difficulty that Lefebure could now ascend the steep stairs leading to the organ loft. One day, not long since, he promised to perform at a marriage, and he wished to keep his word. He was, therefore, laboriously making his way up, when suddenly the sound of the blow, given by the Swiss with his halberd, announced the commencement of the ceremony. In less time than is required to write down the fact, the gallant artist ran up forty steps, and, bathed in perspiration, and suffering from a cough which brought the blood-tinged foam to his lips, he placed his hands upon the keyboard. He was never, perhaps, grander. 'Twas his last piece of extempore playing; the farewell of the organist to the organ, the strains of which are like an echo of the Infinite.

Lefebure-Wely wrote a great deal for his instrument; for the harmonium; and for the voice. I will cite merely his "Cantiques," which are exceedingly well known; a remarkable "O Salutaris," a collection of "Offertories," some pieces composed expressly for the Mustel Harmonium; a fantasia entitled "Titania, for piano; the "Duo sympathique," dedicated to his two daughters, &c. At the Opera Comique, he brought out a work, Les Recruteurs, in which Capoul made his first appearance, but which was not a success. It is but a few days since that, with a hand already struck by death, he traced his last compositions: "La chant du Cygne," a melancholy reverie, for pianoforte and harmonium, in which we perceive very plainly the presentiment of his approaching death. He has left some posthumous works. "In all that he composed"—as M. Ambroise Thomas, a most competent judge, proclaimed, at the tomb—"we must always admire the grace, the good taste, the purity of the style. He has left works, noble in character, and elevated in sentiment, which will bear evidence of his passage among us, and of the influence he must have exerted." A sure, devoted, and faithful friend; endowed with cutting frankness, tempered, however, by a large amount of kindness; an amiable companion; generous with the calculating spirit peculiar to musicians; witty and caustic like a real child of Paris, as he was, and, moreover, a spoilt child of Paris: of naturally distinguishing manners, an enemy of everything trivial and commonplace; possessing, like all men on whom fortune smiles when they are young, a very strong opinion of himself individually, and never neglecting an opportunity of declaring his own merit:—such, with well-directed activity, and exceeding versatility of humor, is the complete physiognomy of Lefebure-Wely, whose reputation extended to foreign countries, especially Germany.

This valiant and sincere artist has left his mark. In the gallery of organists of St. Sulpice, in which Nivert represents correctness; Cleremhant, majesty; Coppeau, religious unction; Nicolas Séjan, elevated thought; Louis Séjan, elegance of form; and Georges Schmitt, impetuosity, and brilliancy; Lefebure Wely may claim many of the qualities of his predecessors, adding the radiant charm of melody, and the scintillations of a most charming fancy.

He leaves many sympathizing friends, whose feelings of esteem are now, alas! directed exclusively to his two charming daughters, his son, and his wife, herself an eminent artist, who appreciated him so well, and loved him so much.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 25.—On Wednesday evening of last week Mlle. MEHLIG gave a very interesting concert at Steinway Hall, assisted by Messrs. Kopta and Bergner, and by a female vocalist. I quote the instrumental numbers:

P. F. Trio, B flat, op. 97.....Beethoven.
Nocturne, F minor, op. 55, No. 1.....Chopin.
Prelude and Fugue in G minor (arr. by Liszt).....Rach.
Variations Brillantes, (Violin).....Vieuxtemps.
Carneval, op. 9.....Schumann.
Grande Polonaise.....F. Liszt.

The fine Trio, with its wonderfully beautiful Adagio, was well played, but the hall is too large to admit of one's enjoying anything in the way of chamber-music. Mlle. Mehlig seemed at times a little tame, especially in the first movement; but it was impossible to say as much with regard to her performance of the extremely difficult Fugue which she certainly gave with most admirable force and vigor. This was also true of the "Carneval," in which she showed herself a really great artist. The scope for expression and shading is so vast, and the changes of tempo and character are so frequent, that none but a thoroughly competent and self-poised artist should ever attempt to play these little gems which Schumann called "Carneval." At times indeed we could desire more abandon, but then one cannot have every thing, and her touch is certainly exquisitely delicate and yet firm. I did not exactly approve of her manner of playing the Chopin Nocturne, for she certainly took too much liberty with the tempo, and her indiscriminate use (or misuse) of the pedal was quite painful.

Mr. Kopta played delightfully. His tone is so good and accurate that one is delighted with its purity, albeit a little more strength would be agreeable. He played several double note passages in a masterly manner.

Mr. Bergner played carefully and well, but at times his 'cello seemed the least bit out of tune.

As for the "Vocalist"—who evidently sang her two solos in order to "fill out" the programme—in simple charity let me decline to say anything more than that she has neither voice nor method, and cannot sing at all.

The audience numbered something like 1,800 people, and most of them (not being Americans) paid marked attention to the programme as it was performed.

Musical matters are very dull here this winter, and if it were not for the Philharmonics I should be in despair. Theo Thomas has, in a mysterious way, disappeared from public gaze, and his "Symphony Soirées" (very delightful but very non-paying entertainments) have gone with him; this is also true of the Sunday Evening concerts, which were so enjoyable for the last two winters, but which are not even mentioned this season. Then we no longer have any Mason and Thomas' Soirées of chamber music; they were discontinued winter before last; the Harmonic Society and the Mendelssohn Union (our choral societies) seem to be either dead or hopelessly lethargic.

FEB. 7. On Saturday evening we had our 3d Philharmonic Concert, with the appended programme:

Symphony: "Consecration of Sounds".....Spohr.
Cavatina, "Da plaser".....Gassa Ladra.....Rosenbl.
Miss Clara J. Kellogg.
P. F. Concerto, E flat major, No. 5.....Beethoven.
Mlle. Anna Mehlig.
Overture, Sacuntala.....Goldmark.
Aria, "Del vien," Nozze di Figaro.....Mozart.
Overture Leonora, No 2.....Beethoven.

The orchestral playing was in every respect excellent, and too much praise cannot be given to the perfect unity with which every movement of the elaborate Symphony was performed. To my mind this celebrated work of Spohr's is less attractive than it is to many musicians, and the merits of the composition seem very unequally distributed; as for instance, the 2nd movement—Cradle-Song, Serenade, &c.,—with its curious mixed rhythm, is certainly a "gem of purest ray serene," while the "Marche" is totally out of keeping with anything else, and is indeed, to my mind, even trivial.

The "Sacuntala" Overture, performed for the first time in this country, is essentially Frenchy in its effect, and therefore not immensely solid or forceful.

There are some neat bits of instrumentation, and there are some harp passages which might possibly have been attractive if the sound of the harp had not been entirely drowned out by the other instruments; as a whole, very suggestive of Batiste's elaborate and frothy organ voluntaries.

Mlle. Mehlig achieved an artistic success in her performance of Beethoven's superb Concerto, which was played at one of our concerts last winter by Mr. Mills. Her excellences are a wonderfully delicate touch, an admirably even technique, and a poetic spirit which always grasps the meaning and plan of the composer. Her one especial weakness is a lack of breadth in style and phrasing. This deficiency was more especially evident in the final movement, which unquestionably requires great strength and force to give the requisite dignity and grandeur.

Mlle. M. was enthusiastically encored, in fact called out three times, but she declined to play again, and only acknowledged the compliment by bowing.

Miss Kellogg sang her two selections creditably and well, and had she been less self-conscious and "airy" would have made a pleasing impression. O that she would only listen to reason, and try to tone down her exuberant self-gratulatory manner, for she really is not a great artist, and no amount of printed encomiums will make her one; neither will that end be gained by the purchase of any number of floral testimonials, by previous arrangement among enthusiastic admirers. She was encored, and sang, in response, a trifling and totally incongruous "Chanson," Carl Bergmann—much to the surprise and satisfaction of the audience—playing the pianoforte accompaniment.

CHICAGO, FEB. 5.—Very few occurrences in a musical way are just now to be noted here. Since my former letter the Ritchings English Opera Troupe gave a season of three weeks at McVicker's Theatre, a little old-fashioned, rather inconvenient place for an audience, but, as I am told, a very good stage, and a good house for sound. The usual category of "Bohemian Girl," "Maritana," "Martha," "Trovatore," and "Crown Diamonds" was gone through with, and further, "Faust," "The Postillion of Lonjumeau," "The Huguenots," and "Traviata."

The vocal resources of this combination were not extravagant. The principals are, as you know, Mrs. Bernard herself, Miss Howson (whom I did not hear), Mrs. Annie Kemp Bowler, Mr. Bowler, the Peakes, Mr. Bernard, and Henry Drayton. The chorus was very spirited, but very small. The orchestra was an indigenous growth, the product of a part of the city not yet "raised to grade," and so I forbear criticism. Mr. Behrens was said to direct; how well, I cannot say, not knowing how badly they could have played but for his restraining hand. Mr. Behrens must enlarge his repertory of high Dutch expletives, or give up the direction of a Chicago orchestra. These men are said to be hired at the rate of so much a cubic foot of tone. The kettle drummer gets the largest pay; the trombone next.

The costumes were really splendid. And however the ensemble might fall below what one could desire for the heavier operas, there was in every performance (except "Faust") much to admire, enough, indeed, to repay the listener. There is one performance to which I wish to call your especial attention when they visit Boston, and that is La Traviata. The scene in the second act between Mrs. Bernard (La Traviata) and Mr. Drayton (Georgie Germont), and afterwards between Drayton and Bowler (Alfredo), was done the most perfectly of any operatic performance I ever saw. I have many times heard better voices than either, although these are pleasant to hear; but so complete a realization of what must have been the dramatist's intention, so lively a representation of the grieving father, and the loving, heart-broken woman, I never saw. It did not seem acting. Mrs. Bernard and Drayton did admirably throughout the season. Every single personation of Drayton's was a new revelation to us; one would not dream that Plunkett in "Martha" and Germont were rendered by the same man.

The ORATORIO SOCIETY gave the Messiah, Jan. 27 and 28, to very good houses. Chicago is yet too poor to afford an organ in a public hall, so we had only orchestral accompaniment. This Society was organized last Spring and has a chorus of about three hundred. The President is Mr. Geo. L. Dunlap, a solid man; the Secretary, Mr. O. Blackman, Principal of Musical Instruction in our public schools. The musical direction has been from the first in the hands of Hans Balatka, who holds with us much the same relation that Zerrahn does in Boston.

The Messiah was given here about ten years ago by the Musical Union, under the direction of Mr. C. M. Cady (Root & Cady). The chorus numbered seventy and the orchestra fifteen. Since then it has not been attempted till now. Indeed until the Young Men's Christian Association built Farwell Hall, there was no good place in which to hold concerts or rehearsals of a large choral society; our only reliance was the churches, and these are always liable to be taken with a revival at inopportune times, (although Dr. Hatfield thinks the Chicago churches are as free from that as any he knows.) Now, however, we have Farwell Hall, which, although deficient in the staid blue-stocking air of your Music Hall, is yet a pleasant, commodious, and feasible place of gathering. The chorus on this occasion went well. The alto was too light. The tenor and bass was splendid! The soprano good enough. The orchestra did well in the choruses and fairly in the solos. The poor trumpeters had a "hard row" of it in the trumpet song; but Mr. Whitney came through with very little apparent regard to the abnormal developments behind him. And this Mr. Whitney (M. W.), Mr. Editor, quite captivated our city. His voice is so resonant, his method so broad and artistic, and his presence so proper, that we have nothing to do but to envy Boston the possession of so admirable an artist. Miss Brainard did the soprano solos in her usual excellent way. The alto got sick at just the wrong time, so we left her parts out. The quartet altos were taken by Miss Mary Holden. Mr. Jas. Whitney sang his parts very much to the audience's satisfaction, except a certain suspicion of nasal quality in the tone, and too much tremolo. On the whole, however, Chicago is glad to get him. The Society proposes to take up Elijah or the Hymn of Praise.

Concerts.

The seventh of the SYMPHONY CONCERTS, crowded of course, was a fair fulfilment of the following programme:

Overture to "The Water Carrier".....Cherubini.
Choruses for Male Voices:
a. Priestchor: "O Isis and Osiris," from "The Magic Flute".....Mozart.
b. Foresters' Chorus, from "The Pilgrimage of the Rose".....Schumann.
Orpheus Musical Society.
P. F. Concerto, No. 8, C minor, op. 37.....Beethoven.
Miss Alice Dutton.
Symphony in C major.....Schubert.

One of the newspaper critics merely mentions the Cherubini Overture en passant as a pretty thing. It is one of the great Overtures, and season after season has been slowly but surely winning the recognition of the many, as it did of the few in the first season of the Concerts; a work of rare nobility and beauty, and seemeth better upon every hearing. With still more emphasis may this be said of the great Schubert Symphony in C,—his Ninth and last—the one of "the heavenly length," as Schumann said; a work in which his genius seems to have tried the strength of its wings and found them equal to the highest and the longest flight, new aspiration still begotten of new triumph. After the brooding, earnest, self-suppressed, deep planning and resolving introduction, how the heroic, high-strung rhythm, strong enough for all the wealth of harmony with which it is weighted, sweeps away with you and bears you on from glory unto glory, as on a joyous and unlimited excursion amid starry clusters of new worlds! Perpetual surprise, —the more so that the same rhythm is kept up and the same motives constantly return. After the wonderful Andante, a long and complete poem in itself, the same exhaustless, soaring and adventurous energy, striking out new paths, new rhythms, in the Scherzo (with its delicious Trio, as if touching for a moment upon one of the Happy Isles) and the Finale, with those thundering reiterations in the basses, sustains itself unflagging to the end. The whole Symphony reveals a great state of mind, an inward realization of the soul's richest life, which it seems marvellous that any man could so sustain throughout so long and arduous a work. The Symphony was remarkably well played, and it is the universal testimony of those who have heard it many times, that still the last impression is more glorious than all before.

The entire C-minor Concerto of Beethoven had never been played here before. Mr. Lang, in the second season of the Concerts, played the first movement only, which is certainly the most significant, with the Cadenza by Moscheles. This time his fair pupil, Miss DUTTON, allowed us to hear the whole, using in the first part the fine Cadenza written by Carl Reinecke. The Largo, although full of beauty and of tender feeling, is not of Beethoven's best; its perpetual figures of embellishment seem commonplace for him, and such as Hummel or some others might have written. The Finale, however, common as its gay and piquant motive sounds, is full of delicate and fine originality. Miss Dutton won much praise for the performance, showing marked improvement, though the strength flagged a little near the end, and there was sometimes want of clearness, of self-possession, quiet strength in the left hand.

The Orpheus, now under Mr. ZERRAHN's direction, numbered some forty voices, rich, resonant, well blended, and sang better than we have heard them for some years. The fresh and breezy "wood notes wild" of Schumann's chorus, all in praise of forest life, caught new animation and a poetic tinge from the accompanying horns and bass trombone, the peculiar rhythm of whose passages seems to have misled a critic of the Advertiser into the impression that they stammered and blundered in the execution; they are meant to come in somewhat tumultuously, with crossing and commingling echoes as it were.

Next Thursday's Concert offers us: Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; Overtures: "Melusina," by Mendelssohn, and "Wood Nymph," Bennett; Serenade, from a Quartet, (for all the strings), Haydn; Piano Concerto in D, (first time), Mozart, played by Mr. Hermann Daum.

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER resumes his TRIO CONCERTS, on successive Saturday evenings, at Chickering's. We felt it to be a real privation that we had to lose the first one, which took place last Saturday evening; but we have no hesitation in endorsing what we find said of it and of him in the Advertiser of Monday:

It is pleasant to say a word about Mr. James C. D. Parker, whose artistic career all of us who care for our city's progress in other and better things than the increase in population and wealth must watch with interest. Born and bred in Boston, he has done his best to repay the debt which every one owes to his birth-place and home, and we should find it hard to name another native Bostonian who has accomplished so much for the cultivation among us of pure musical art and taste.

His first trio concert of the season was given at Chickering's Hall on Saturday evening. Listemann with the violin, and Heindl with the 'cello, played so well that our regret that the great West has swallowed Schultze and Wulf Fries was sensibly diminished. Mrs. Barry, always Mr. Parker's right-hand woman, sang a recitative and air by Paisiello and a couple of Mendelssohn songs as our best contralto should. She is singing this winter in some respects better than ever before. The trios were Haydn's in A flat and Beethoven's in E flat.

Mr. Parker himself, beside his part in the trios, played a Nocturne of Chopin and a charming little novelette (whatever that is in music) by Schumann. And all that he did was done excellently. We have often thought that Mr. Parker does not appear at his best in a concerto in the great hall, (though, we confess we almost changed our mind after his rendering of the Mendelssohn concerto at the Symphony concert last month,) because his playing is so very quiet, —so severely undemonstrative. It is not that it lacks warmth, so much as that it has not always flash and sparkle enough to hold its own against the full orchestra. But here, in a chamber concert, his exquisite refinement and taste give an admirable account of themselves. They are worth all the virtuosity in the world. We hope that our readers will not neglect the remaining concerts of the set, which will be given on the three following Saturday evenings.

MR. PERABO, in his third Matinée (Friday, Feb. 4), played to the great satisfaction of a large and appreciative audience, the following selections:

- |  |                       |
|--|-----------------------|
| Suite, op. 24. C sharp minor.....                    | Wm. St. Bennett       |
| a) Presto e leggero.....                             | d) A l'a Fantasia.    |
| b) Allegretto leggiero.....                          | e) Presto agitato.    |
| c) Agitato assai.....                                | f) Lento ed Allegro.  |
| "Tier Clavierstücke," op. 5.....                     | Otto Dresel.          |
| No. 2, Präludium. G flat major.                      |                       |
| No. 4, Scherzino. F major.                           |                       |
| Etude en forme de Variations, op. 13. C sharp minor. | Rob. Schumann.        |
| Sonata, Op. 10, No. 3. D major.....                  | Beethoven.            |
| a) Presto.....                                       | c) Menuetto, Allegro. |
| b) Largo e mesto.....                                | d) Rondo Allegro.     |

The Suite by Bennett is not an imitation of the old dance forms of Bach and Handel's day, but simply an agreeable succession of short, graceful fancies altogether modern in their features. Two or three of them were strikingly beautiful, but the series as a whole, though pleasing, not particularly inspiring. The two little pieces by Mr. Dresel were like old friends to most, and very welcome; a graceful tribute of the younger to the older artist, whose long absence is so much felt.

That Etude by Schumann is a remarkable piece of Variation work, truly creative developments of a theme that has much in it; at every change it gives you something new and of deep import. A very difficult work withal, but not so to Perabo. The selection from Beethoven's earlier Sonatas was a happy one. We are not sure that it has found its way into our concert rooms before, although a favorite in private. The contrast of its weighty and impressive Largo, in 6 8 time, with the light, airy elegance of the Minuet and Trio, and of both with the impetuous opening Presto and concluding Rondo, is very fine, and never lets the interest flag. It was admirably rendered, though the intensity of the player now and then betrayed him into an apparently unconscious hurrying of the tempo for a few measures at a time.

At the last Matinée (next Friday), Mr. Perabo will play a Sonata in A minor by Mozart, something by Schumann (op. 23), and again, what will be particularly welcome, the last Sonata (op. 111) of Beethoven.

ENGLISH OPERA. If the Prepara-Rosa Company had done nothing else, the manner in which they can perform the "Marriage of Figaro" (as they have done three times in the Boston Theatre) fully establishes their right to the remarkable success they have had here and elsewhere. Of course we would much rather hear Mozart's delicious music sung in the Italian; but with this single drawback, and in spite of it, the presentation of that rare work of pure imaginative genius as a whole was worthy of any opera troupe that has been heard here. No, we must say in spite of one or two deductions further. The Figaro of Mr. CAMPBELL, particularly, which was too stiff and serious; he sings the music finely, and with a rich, sonorous voice, but it is no fault of his that he was not born with the ris comica, such as we have seen in the Italians and somewhat in Formes. Nor was Mr. HALL's Don Bartolo more than indifferent good; but here it is a small part compared with that in Rossini's "Barber." But speaking of the smaller parts, we must acknowledge that the tenor, Mr. NORDBLOM, really appeared and sung to very good advantage as the old music master Don Basilio, and the old Marcellina of Miss STOCKTON was a fair contribution to the completeness of the thing. Mr. LAWRENCE, as the Count, both sang and acted better than we have heard him in other rôles; his baritone is of a rich and musical quality, and he uses it generally well, if sometimes with some overdoing of expression.

Now for the rest we can indulge in praise with little scruple. Surely it is rare good fortune to see the three principal female parts so charmingly presented. To each of them has Mozart given of his divinest melody without stint. The airs of Susanna and the Countess and the Page are a whole priceless treasury of song. By favor of the ladies, his superiors, this fascinating young rogue of a Cherubino must be allowed to claim our attention first. And never was he more fascinating than in the impersonation of Mrs. SAGUN. It lacked no grace of personal beauty; free, natural, refined action; rich, pure mezzo-soprano voice, and expressive rendering of the music. This young Don Juan in the bud, just awake to the strange mystery of the passion that is to absorb him, could not have sung his own trembling sweet confessions (we mean the ideal Cherubino himself) more feelingly, more beautifully than they were sung here. The "Non so più rosa son" and "Voi che sapete" told their story after Mozart's own heart, there can be no doubt. All the pretty by-play, too, was all alive with cunning humor.

Miss ROSE HENNES had only her petite figure (dwarfed still more in the presence of her maid) to contend against in her otherwise very happy presentation of the Countess. Her action was natural and easy, and she sang, with her somewhat small but telling voice, delightfully. She is indeed a finished singer, and is always in earnest, making the most of every moment of her part whether in song or silent.

Then, for the Susanna, in one of her many and successful rôles as Miss. PERABO-Rosa pleased us so much. You almost forgot the ponderous physique in the unflagging animation, the ease and sprightly humor of her action, ever felicitous and winning every one's good will. She was in fine voice, —particularly that closing night, the stormy Saturday, when the theatre was crowded —and sang in her best style. In the pure and heavenly melody of "Dei t'ami," to a most obscure, fine execution she added something nearer to the true high feeling than we have felt in many of her vocal triumphs. The latter duet: "Sull'aria," between her and the Countess, was surpassingly beautiful, and had of course to be repeated.

[The rest, our printer says, must wait.]

WERE MENTION. Do not forget Mr. PARKER's Trio Concert this evening; nor the Russians this afternoon, and best of all, their Sacred Concert at Selwyn's to-morrow evening; they had the best sort of audience, and a large one, on Wednesday, the first night of their return.

Miss Mehlig's Concert.

(From the New York Tribune, Jan. 20)

A new pianist has come among us. She has been heard several times in public, but only as an accessory, and not as the central point of interest. Each time, however, that she has appeared, the good impression that she first produced has been strengthened, and the belief confirmed that her abilities are of no ordinary measure of excellence.

Last evening, this young lady gave her first concert at Steinway Hall. The programme was addressed rather to musicians than to a general audience, and the selections were made with a view doubtless of showing the general scope of Miss Mehlig's studies in her art, and the results that she has attained. The recital of the pieces that she played will illustrate the variety of her subjects and styles:

- |   |            |
|---|------------|
| Trio, op. 97 (piano-forte violin and 'cello)..... | Beethoven. |
| Nocturne.....                                     | Chopin.    |
| Prelude and Fugue.....                            | Bach.      |
| A Carnival piece, op. 9.....                      | Schumann.  |
| Grand Polonaise.....                              | Liszt.     |

Here we have a programme that is calculated to test the powers of the most consummate pianist. To play it one must be master of every style, of the breadth and repose necessary to the interpretation of Beethoven, of the nervous sensibility, capriciousness of mood, and poetic subtlety that belong to Chopin; of the dramatic intensity, restlessness, fire, and passion that characterize Schumann; of the steadfastness, and strength, and firmness that are essential to the playing of the fugues of Bach; of the transcendent execution that Liszt requires of those who would conquer his most difficult works.

That all these gifts should be centred upon one performer it would be too much to expect, and yet Miss Mehlig has so far possessed herself of them as to entitle her to be considered a really great artist. No other could hold an audience of connoisseurs such as that gathered last evening so long and so firmly, for some of the pieces were certainly "caviare to the general," and such as one looks rather to hear in a quiet music-room, with a handful of listeners, than in a public concert hall. Of this character was Schumann's description of the Carnival, a composition we should hardly think less than 40 pages in length, and requiring at least 20 minutes to play; but it was listened to not only with patience but with interest, and its close was followed by the applause of those unmistakably pleased.

The sentiment with which the Nocturne of Chopin was played was of the right quality, not exaggerated into sentimentality on the one hand nor held with too much strictness on the other. The fugue by Bach illustrated the accuracy of Miss Mehlig's playing and the mechanical finish to which she had brought it, for in a fugue there is no room for sentiment and nothing tells but inexorable exactness. Four melodies are being twisted and interwoven and still are to be kept distinct, and a false note ruins everything. The fugue that Miss Mehlig played was the one in G Minor, composed for organ and arranged by Liszt for the piano. The arrangement is one of great excellence, the pedal part being finely worked in. Miss Mehlig played it grandly, with a downright earnestness that befitted the composition, and with a clearness and force and a distinctness of the themes that did her the greatest credit. That it might be seen how far she had overcome the final possibilities of the instrument as summed up by the great headmaster of the school of difficulties, the young artist played for a closing piece Liszt's Grande Polonaise. The composition was, we have heard, studied by her under the personal direction of the composer, and Miss Mehlig certainly rendered it with wonderful nerve and power, and a technical skill that at once set at rest all question as to her being entitled to hold a foremost rank among the pianists of the present day.

The Russian Opera.

The Russian Opera Company now performing at the French Theatre is worthy of more than a passing notice. It is presenting to the public a performance entirely different from any that has been given here—an exceptional performance—one that we hear as it were by accident, and which is not likely to be repeated soon. Judged by the standards that we apply to French and Italian operas, the representation falls curiously short of artistic perfection, and those who care only to have their ears gratified by melodious strains will not attain that result by going to the Russian Opera. And for this very reason the performance seems to us to be the more interesting, and the more absolutely it differs in every particular from the Italian models, the more deeply interesting it becomes. And certainly from this point of view it is everything that could be wished. It is the reverse of all one's preconceived notions of opera.

In the first place, it is most curious to hear a language spoken, not one word of which from beginning to end carries the slightest idea to the mind of the hearer. This is not possible either with the French, the German, or the Italian, all of which are cognate to our tongue, and have many words of a familiar sound even to those who have never studied the language; but the Russian fails to give the hearer a single clue. The work performed is called a "comic opera." It is as comic as its title, "Askold's Tomb." An important scene is in a graveyard, and a heavy pall of solemnity covers the entire play. In fact, the predominant feature both of the music and the words is melancholy. If, then, this is a specimen of Russian comedy, we shudder to think what Russian tragedy must be. We believe this work to be a direct reflection of the character of the people. Light-heartedness is the last result of civilization. Neither the Irish, nor the Hungarians, nor the Poles, nor the Russians have any of it in their national music. The opera, besides being very heavy and sombre, is not treated at all after the manner of operatic composers in general. There is not a trio, or a quartet, or a concerted piece of any kind, except one duet, from the beginning to the end. The performers sing each by himself, assisted sometimes by a chorus. No action is attempted. The prima donna folds her arms and moves quietly and sadly up and down the stage as she sings. It is not that she does not know how to act, but that she has no intention whatever of trying to. A perfect repose and self-control and quiet is manifested in every motion.

The dresses are quaint and singular, and some of them are very rich and beautiful.

In the course of the opera two national dances occur. The first of these is danced by four of the ladies of the company in long dresses, with the stately movements of a minuet, and accompanied with graceful, slow wavings of the arms—altogether a strange and unaccustomed dance, as different as possible from the indecent caperings of the French stage.

Finally, the whole performance seemed to us not only novel and interesting, but wonderfully instructive. In two hours at this representation one can get a clearer insight into the manners, and costumes, and customs, and national traits of this far-off and great Slavic race, than in weeks of delving among books. The stage is the epitome of a nation's life, and here is an opportunity such as seldom occurs to study that of our Russian friends.—N. Y. Sun, Dec. 17.

A Fashionable Concert at Steinway Hall.

The Church Music Association is an organization that has created quite a sensation among the fashionable people of the city. It is under the auspices of the clergy and laity of the Episcopal churches of this city in general, and of Trinity Church in especial. Upon its Executive Committee are Mrs. Astor, Mrs. Cutting, Mrs. Mott, Mrs. Sam. Barlow, Mrs. Dix, and other prominent ladies.

Its purpose is to organize a chorus from the most proficient amateurs, having regard also to the social position of the members. As amateurs are not altogether to be trusted, there is a nucleus of German professionals to give them steadiness and courage. In all there are about 150 in the chorus, and they are supported by an orchestra of some fifty pieces. Dr. Pech, an organist of Trinity parish, conducts.

They give three concerts; no tickets are sold. The affair is supported by the subscribers, of whom there are fifty, each subscriber paying one hundred dollars, and being entitled to twenty-three tickets to each concert. With these they invite their friends. On the ticket is printed "Evening dress"—an indication that the gentlemen are expected in dress-coats, and the ladies without bonnets. The ushers are gentlemen prominent in society. The place of holding the concerts is Steinway Hall. The music performed is a mass by one of the great composers, and a secular composition.

On Wednesday last, the first concert of the season took place. A canvas covered way from the street to the entrance of the hall was erected, and the hall itself was carpeted for the occasion. There never was such an audience in it before. All fashionable New York was present in elegant attire, and as for the chorus it was resplendent in low-necked dresses and powdered hair, and smiled sweetly to its near relative, the audience. The clergy flecked the audience here and there in spots of blandly smiling black, and looked complacently upon their flocks. Ordinary concerts begin at 8 o'clock, but this one began at half-past 6, though it compensated for the late beginning by not getting out till half-past 11.

Mozart's Twelfth Mass and the first half of Oberon were sung indifferently well, though far better than any one who heard the rehearsals would have supposed possible. Though some two thousand persons were present, the concert was a private one, and is entitled to immunity from criticism, and we therefore make none. A marked feature of the occasion was the conductor, Mr. James Pech, "Mus. Doc. Oxon.," or Oxford musical doctor. His peculiarity as a conductor is that he kicks time. The method, though singular, might be pardoned as an eccentricity if he kicked at the same time with his beat; but as the two were seldom together, his orchestra, totally unused to such proceedings, were at a loss whether to give their attention to his feet or his hands, and, between the two, floundered badly in their time. Dr. Pech has also signalized himself by a printed analysis of the music, interspersed with biographical references to himself and his own emotions at various epochs of his life. Among the singular statements that he makes is one to the effect that if he had been more intimate with his chorus he would have left out a few bars from one of the movements, but we fail to do him justice; his own words are alone sufficient for that—here they are:

"Had our acquaintance with the highly-refined and cultivated circle, comprising those ladies and gentlemen who compose our very excellent chorus, been of longer standing, we should have exercised a judicious daring, and expunged the middle part of the Dona, when our delight, we might say our raptures, would have been as perfect as intense."

And here is another bit of autobiography of refreshing sweetness and simplicity, and so artlessly introduced:

"The Et Incarnatus is exquisite. The flow of the melody is so graceful—the answers are so finely made in the several parts, and the whole is so divinely pathetic as well as simple, that (on hearing it, some years since, when conducting this Mass at the People's Philharmonic Concerts, in Exeter Hall, London, with Mme. Catherine Hayes as Prima), we thought it could not be exceeded, till we arrived at the Benedictus."

At the next concert the Association is to give Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and Haydn's Sixteenth Mass.—Sun, Jan. 18.

"In die Ferne."

[At Mr. Perabo's first Matinée, Oct. 24th, Löwe's beautiful ballad "In die Ferne," was sung by ANNA WARREN. No one present can forget the tones of her voice, which (in connection with words) seemed prophetic of the approaching departure of the gifted and beloved singer].

A voice fell on my listening ear;
The singer's gracious form was near,
I heard her tones so sweet and clear:

"In die Ferne!"

A prelude was it, fit and rare,
To harmonies awaiting there
In der Ferne.

For in the coming season's hours
The young interpreter of powers
So vast and high, was to be ours

In der Ferne;

Touching all depths of heart and soul,
Swayed by the Master Mind's control,
In der Ferne.

But e'er those hours had reached their last,
The singer's spirit backward cast
Its mortal form, and upward passed

In die Ferne.

And as she winged her Heavenward flight,
She saw the glories of the Light
In der Ferne.

Again he struck the chords which stirred
The inmost soul, yet undisturbed
Mingling with those notes I heard:

"In die Ferne."

The voice, the song was yet the same,
As floating on the air it came:
"In die Ferne."

Bach's Grosse Passions-Musik. (ST. MATTHEW.)

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

It is strange even to wonder that the matchless productions of the greatest master of counterpoint should have remained a secret in the land of his birth, and the locality of his activity, for as long again as the whole term of his life, after death had closed his labors. So, when Mozart was in Leipzig in 1790, it was only by laying the separate parts side by side of some of Bach's least inaccessible compositions, in the library of St. Thomas's Church, that he could peruse and take delight in those great works whose existence and concealment are almost equally marvellous. In 1803, more than half a century after the surcease of the grand old cantor, Forkel declared to the world what a hidden treasure was in his unknown music, and proved his assertion by bringing into public some, though but a small quota, of the master's noble art-legacy. These few specimens of his rare genius, with the two series of Preludes and Fugues known collectively in England as the "forty-eight," were all that was printed of Bach until the new interest in him and his writings was kindled by the reproduction of the music for the Matthew Passion, in the hundredth year after its original performance.

It is less remarkable that the fame, the works, nay the name of Bach reached not this country. So little did Englishmen guess at the radiance which would beam from the countenance of the then veiled prophet, that the ponderous Burney, who devoted four massive volumes to general musical history and one to his researches in Germany, Burney, who was personally familiar with Carl Philip Emanuel the most fortunate son of Bach, dismissed the man, the musician, the master, whose now acknowledged greatness is the glory of art and of mankind, in a single paragraph; and this may be regarded as evidence of how little people here knew, how little people here cared about Bach and his works at the close of the last century. After the publication of Forkel's biography and selections, Samuel Wesley obtained some of Bach's music, promptly perceived and justly prized its endless beauty, and zealously strove to propagate a knowledge of and respect for it. He joined with C. F. Horn in printing an English edition of the Wohltemperirte Clavier, and some of the organ trios. Horn, a German by birth, was organist of the Chapel Royal, Windsor, and the father of the popular song writer and singer, Charles Edward Horn; and it was probably he who, in those days of difficult communication with the continent, imported the first copies of Bach's music. Then, and not till then, was the veil torn which had hidden the might of the master from English observance; and even then, his power was so partially revealed to musicians wholly unprepared for its recognition, that its extent and its very nature were totally mistaken. Bach was assumed to be a profound scholar, and his works within reach were regarded as scholastic exercises, while the character, the variety, and, above all, the wondrous expression that specially distinguish them were, to the generality scarcely more than to the student, imperceptible. He was supposed and commonly said to be a writer of fugues, but of nothing else; and this brief sum of his capabilities included no acknowledgment of the interest, far beyond the elaboration, that he of all men imparted to the fugal form. To this very day the prejudicial influence of that false estimate clogs our comprehension of the genius of Bach, and the merit of his music; and, in spite of growing familiarity with the beauties of his Suites, and countless other lighter writings, the habit here is to fancy that Bach is fully represented in his fugues, to regard these but from one narrow aspect, and to expect fugalism in every fresh specimen with which we meet of his innumerable productions.

Who looks for this characteristic of the master in his music of the Passion will look vainly; and if he be not disappointed at the absence of the fugal element throughout the work, he will be surprised at the poetical beauty of its declamation, the continuity of its melodies, and their truthfulness to the subject they aim to express, at the choral effects as fine as they are unfamiliar, and at the loving tenderness and intense religious feeling that infuse the whole. The work is indeed a contrapuntal marvel, albeit the device of imitation is almost totally unemployed in it, from first to last. The appliance of the art of counterpoint to the multiplication of the melodic interest, is shown in the complexity of the writing, and this evidences an unparalleled freedom, which is not more subject for astonishment than for admiration. It is practised in the accompaniments of the songs, wherein every instrument has a melody independent of the vocal part; and in the construction of the choruses, wherein all the voices and instruments, often of the two separate orchestras, have each their individual and distinctive progressions.

Such complication induces, of course, the extreme of difficulty in performance; but German example establishes that the difficulty has a limit, is not endless, not insurmountable. What has been overcome, always may be; and even the endeavor to master this masterpiece need not be endless if undertaken in the right artistic spirit by executants and auditors, whose repayment for their pains will indeed be ample.

The general character and prevalent expression of this oratorio are indicated by its title of The Passion. "He suffered and was buried" is the entire subject of the work, in the embodiment of which no tones but of sadness could appropriately be employed, since no feeling but of grief was to be illustrated. Despair, however, is as remote as jubilation from the purport and the rendering of the text; and thus all powerful means of contrast were beyond the use of the artist, whose sole resource, therefore, in this respect was to vary the accents of one penitential outpouring, which is as deep in its pathos as it is infinite in its sweetness. Here, then, are no Hallelujahs, no shouts of glory, no ejaculations of great rejoicing, such as diversify the great Sacred Oratorio of Handel; sorrow is the ceaseless theme, and meekness is the steadfast spirit in which this is uttered.

In order to a proximate comprehension of this work, a modern hearer needs to regard it in the objective rather than the subjective mood—as representing rather the tenets of others than his own.

Firstly, the lapse of a hundred and forty years has wrought great changes in the theological views of mankind. In the days of Solomon Deyling and Sebastian Bach, it was men's habit to think more of the physical features of the gospel story, whereas now their thoughts run rather upon its intellectual bearings. Their minds then dwelt upon the personal pains of the great sufferer, and were still imbued with the early Christian principle of enhancing to the utmost his bodily agony, even to the extent of making pain paramount at the expense of beauty, as exemplified in the pictorial illustrations of the doctrine, which represent the Saviour and the Virgin as hideous, to prevent their possible involvement in pleasurable associations. The loveliness of the divine character, its resistless attraction to all men, even the enemies of Him who bore it, and the exquisite beauty of holiness, are points more fondly regarded, and, indeed, more familiar in the present day; and we assert our Christianity rather in emulating the charities of sacred example, than in deploring the pangs through which He passed who taught the lesson of love. Hence, we must to some extent look through a glass tinted with the feelings of a bygone age, in order to perceive what was addressed to that generation in the light in which it was conceived and in which it was received. Hence, we must think ourselves into the thoughts of those men who strove to renew in themselves the anguish of the great sufferer from taunts and wounds and bleeding and thirst, and who believed that in such renewal was piety.

Secondly, the means and circumstances of the first performance of the Passion are not now, and may never be again attainable. In England, at least, a numerous party, whose views are as earnest as I believe them to be false, wish to exclude all such works as the Passion from performance in sacred buildings, wish to deny its loftiest uses to the musical art. Even were the influence of this well-meaning, but, it may be ill-judging party, still resisted, other reasons than their opposition prevail to prevent this particular work from being given, according to its original design, as a special Church Service. Were there nothing else, the people's unfamiliarity with the choral tones of the hymns, and, still more, of the tunes in inseparable association with the same words, makes it impossible that any English public can take part in any performance of Bach's oratorio that then was sustained by the congregation of St. Thomas' Church in Leipzig, who not only sang the tunes, but felt in them the voice of a mother's carresses awakening the sweetest memories of infancy.

Hence, we can now at most only imagine the holy place with all the thoughts that cling to it, the two opposite platforms with the double choir of singers and players, and the devout audience participating in due place in the performance with the two trained choirs; but this we must imagine, as completely as we must the frame of mind wherein the work was cast, if we would do justice to the composer, the composition, and ourselves, in witnessing the performance of the Passion.

Throughout this work, the instrumentation presents a special and most interesting subject for study. Very much less than in the contemporaneous compositions of Handel, is the completion of the harmony left to be improvised by the organist. Save in the recitatives, and in those not universally, there is no place where the voice and the bass parts constitute the entire score, and the music has, so to speak, to be made into music by indispensable additions from another hand than that of the composer. There are always several instruments engaged in the accompaniment of the voice; but, for the most part, they are less employed to fill up the harmony than to multiply the melodies, less to perfect the fullness of tone than to enrich the counterpoint, less to support the solo part than to divide the interest. Handel often, one might say mostly, writes but the voice and bass, leaving the larger, if not the more important portion of the accompaniment, to be supplemented on the harpsichord or organ, and intersperses his truly skeleton scores with occasional phrases for violins or other instruments, chiefly during the rests of the voice part, and rarely to accompany the singing.

When he makes use of this last device, his higher instrument or instruments have generally such parts as are better described by the term counterpoint than accompaniment, having to play less with the voice part than against it, standing as often above as below it, and being, indeed, quite independent of the principal melody. In like manner are Bach's instrumental parts constructed, except that, instead of such imitative or responsive points for them being of occasional occurrence, they run throughout an entire piece, and, indeed, through nearly every piece. The main aim in modern accompaniment is at giving paramount prominence to the vocal part, and at enhancing this prominence, while nourishing its effect by ample but always subordinate harmony. The subordinate harmony of Handel is indicated only by the figures over his bass parts, which afford no clue for the distribution or dispersion of the chords or the figurative forms wherein their notes may be scattered, a matter greatly essential to their effect. Bach equally implies by his figured basses that he, unlike modern musicians, requires similar discretionary amplification of his incompletely written scores; but his written parts are so continuous and so entangled, that a skill all but equal to his own is needful for the construction of anything that can be subordinate to them, that can sustain but not obtrude upon them.

The number and the variety of instruments employed in the course of the Passion are remarkable. This must not suggest, however, that the oratorio presents any beyond the very slightest anticipation of that beautiful art of combining and contrasting the widely-various qualities of tone of different instruments, akin in music to the art of coloring in painting, which was perfected if not wholly originated by Mozart, and which gives such charm to musical effect, that, too often in later days, some composers trust in its exercise to veil their weakness of ideas.

Two flauti traversi are often employed in both orchestras—the flauto traverso being distinguished from the elder flute, which was held longways from the lips and blown at the end like a clarinet or oboe, since held transversely and blown at the side—the German flute, whose name figures in the old-fashioned title-pages of last century arrangement, the only form of flute now in use, though its mechanism is now so elaborated that at present little more than the form remains of the original.

Twice two oboes are also frequently required; the oboe d'amore is sometimes substituted for the more ordinary instrument of the same class; and two parts occasionally also appear for the oboe da caccia. This reminds one of the ancient custom of making all classes of instruments—viols, trumpets, hautboys, shawms—in sets, comprising the various sizes necessary for the several parts of treble, mean, tenor and bass, in each class or "consort" of instruments. Already in Bacon's time, who wrote as knowingly on music as upon everything, exception was sometimes made from the practice of restricting a composition to a single set of instruments, and when some of one consort were employed together with some of another, the combination was defined as "broken music." So, in Shakespeare's Henry the Fifth, in the scene where the King courts the French princess, whose imperfect English is pointedly syllabled by the poet, Henry says, "Come, your answer in broken music; for thy voice is music, and thy English broken."

The oboe d'amore was—for one dares not say that a single specimen is extant—longer than the ordinary instrument, with a thinner bore and smaller bell; was pitched a third lower, and had a finer and perhaps sweeter, though more plaintive tone. The oboe da caccia was much larger; its parts stand in the alto clef, and it is, perhaps, fairly represented by the corno Inglese or cor Anglais in present vogue. Two of these low oboes and one flute form the entire accompaniment to the soprano voice in the air, "From mercy will my Saviour perish," which, exceptionally, has no figured bass, no part for the organ; a lovely combination, whose unbroken use, however, reminds one more of the treatment of the organ, where certain stops are drawn for two manuals, and are unchanged throughout a piece, than of the orchestra where new qualities of tone are brought into play at each new phrase, and even for the enforcement or individualization of any particular chord. Similarly, in several, nay in most of the other pieces, some particular instruments are employed throughout to the exclusion of the rest, and so a distinctive quality of tone characterizes many of the numbers, but is not varied in the course of any one movement.

Two songs, "Have mercy upon me," and "Give, O give me back my Lord," have a part for a solo violin, the distinction of which from the multiplied violins of the orchestra will always be marked by the speciality of the player's tone, as in modern instances of an obbligato accompaniment.

Another air, "Come Blessed Cross," presents a difficulty to modern performance in its part for the viol da Gamba, an instrument now unattainable, and without a player, even if a specimen could be found. Its name distinguishes it from the viol da Braccia, which is virtually the viola of present use, this being the viol to be rested on the arm, the other being that to be held between the legs, according to the plan with our violoncello. The term viol da Braccia is corrupted in the German word Bratsche, the colloquial name in that country for the viola or tenor, the word viol being dropped, as with us it is when we speak of a bass viol, and call it exclusively a bass. There were two kinds of viol da Gamba, one with six strings, the other with seven. The latter must have been that for which this piece was written; its strings were tuned as follows:—

Its part stands in the alto clef, with occasional notes in the bass. It seems that, generally, florid passages were written for it, and cantabile phrases still more, that lie on the four upper strings; and that the last three strings, those below the break in the order of tuning by fifths, were of a somewhat different quality of tone, and were rarely used but for single notes that were the bases of the phrases that followed them. Chords of three or more notes, even to the extent of comprising all the seven strings, were sometimes written for it, which were of course played as are such combinations on the violin—the notes following in instant succession, since the arch of the bridge prevents their being sounded together. A recitative in the oratorio is accompanied in chords on the viol da Gamba, but the author must have been dissatisfied with the effect of this arrangement, for it was discarded in favor of another, but the original part is printed as an appendix to the score of the oratorio in the edition of the Bach Gesellschaft. Here, then, is an anticipation of the ugly modern English practice of accompanying recitative with chords in arpeggio on the violoncello, and here, too, is a valid protest against it by Bach.

The instrument is said to have had a tone lighter, and of a more nasal quality than our violoncello. It is said to have been a great favorite in this country, and certainly the last eminent player upon it, C. F. Abel, spent many years in high esteem among us, and died here in 1787. Some ingenuity is wanted to adapt the part for this obsolete instrument to present possibility, which may, perhaps be best effected by assigning to the viola all the continuous phrases and passages, and to the basses those detached notes which are below the compass of this substitute.

Sweetness and roundness of tone appear to have been the composer's object rather than loudness; for in no instance are brass instruments employed, though Bach's frequent use of drums, trumpets, and trombones in other of his orchestral works, proves that these were all at his command when he chose to avail himself of them. It strongly exemplifies the practice of the age, that he, who wrote more voluminously for the organ and more fitly than any other man, should have left the part entirely blank for this instrument, as Handel always did; but whereas, with rare exceptions, Handel's figuring seems to have been filled in by some kind of copyist or secretary, not by himself, Bach's is written in his own hand, both in the score and in the parts which he himself transcribed. Here is clear enough evidence that he wanted the organ to be played; but one may suppose that as, if he played one, he could not play both organs, he wrote the figures for the guidance under his control of whomever should fulfil this delicate task. In places which have not two organs—and where is the public building that has?—it may be desirable, in accompanying the double choruses, for the player to appropriate one manual to each choir, so as to make up for his unity of place and instrument by an always obvious distinction of tone. These are all points, however, for the decision of conductors and players; and the foregoing suggestions must be received as such.

The Boston Art Museum.

(From "Old and New.")

There is one department of popular education which has been hitherto neglected in Boston, so far as any public provision for it is concerned. The instinct for art is quite as native and perhaps quite as general as the instinct for letters, science, or music, but it has never in any scheme of popular instruction been admitted to an equal place with these. Art has been and still is very generally regarded as a matter of pure luxury, and quite apart from the every day business of a working people. But it would be difficult to prove that it is any more apart than the literature or science which is admitted to be a necessity of the most humble school systems. How does a course of elementary physics help a man forward in a life of trade or mechanical work more than a study of the Parthenon frieze? How does a poem of Wordsworth or a speech of Webster, committed to memory from a "First Class Book," prepare a boy or a girl for the business of life more directly than a picture of Edward Frère, or a photograph of a Gothic cathedral?

The persistent wrong-headedness of the American people on this point is very curious to observe. Whether it is a relic of the old prejudice which made the Puritan look at a picture or a statue much as a bull looks at a red cloth, or whether it is but the natural self-limitation of the Anglo Saxon mind, which loves to believe itself clear and positive and free from sentiment, emphasized and aggravated by the exigencies of circumstance which have beset the people of the New World and which are but just now beginning to lighten their pressure, we do not venture to say. But, either as cause or effect, the phenomenon is closely related to the hardness and angularity, the lack of what Matthew Arnold is so fond of calling "sweetness and light"—which characterizes the shrewd communities of America, intelligent and facile as they are, and which draws so sharp a line of contrast between them and most of the nations of continental Europe. These, less shrewd, less intelligent, less adaptable, exhibit in their manners, their art, their manufactures, an easy grace, an instinct for what is tasteful and picturesque, which might well make the most prosaic pedagogue of the old school ask himself whether education do not include more things than his philosophy has ever dreamed of.

No person who has ever observed carefully the crowds of people of all conditions which throng the little back galleries of the print shops, will deny the following propositions:

1. That the people in general like to look at pictures. This proposition is entirely independent of the cultivation of the people, or the quality of the pictures.

2. That practically speaking, the crowded little rooms above mentioned are the only places in the country where they can gratify this liking.

3. That whether they see at these places good or bad pictures, depends wholly upon the question whether good or bad happens to be at the time the most profitable investment for the proprietors of the print-shops.

4. That these proprietors, however intelligent, liberal, and enterprising, are not in a position which qualifies them for acting as the sole educators of the people in a branch of culture so important as this. [Thus in Boston at Mr. Childs's establishment, the succession of business gives us the magnificent collection of carbon photographs from the drawings of the old masters, sandwiched between a sensation picture of Bierstadt and Mr. Wright's picture of "Eve at the Fountain," so called.]

If, these general propositions are agreed to, what follows is a matter of course, namely, that as the providing of other and better means of education in the fine arts is a matter in which nobody is so much interested as the people themselves, the people ought to provide such means without loss of time, by establishing at once, on a scale commensurate with the just fame of the city of Boston, an Institute of the Fine Arts which shall as far as possible offer the same opportunities for cultivation in matters of art which the libraries offer for cultivation in literature. This duty was recognized a long while ago. It is now twelve years since a memorial was presented to the legislature asking for a reservation of land on the Back Bay for the purpose of a Museum and Gallery of the Fine Arts. It was signed by many "citizens of credit and renown," and advocated before the proper committee by many earnest and sensible lovers of art. It was represented to the committee that the time was ripe for the foundation of a gallery which should be a just source of pride to the city and State; that the pictures and statuary of the Athenæum would be at once deposited there; that the Jarves pictures waited only for a purchaser, and that contributions from other sources would flow in as soon as a suitable shelter could be provided. But whether the legislature of that remote period was not sufficiently penetrated with a sense of the place which the fine arts ought to occupy in the popular education, or whether the committee harbored a suspicion that the zeal of some of the petitioners was based on a desire to realize an advance in the prices of real estate adjacent to the proposed institution, the result of the application was unfavorable. The project was abandoned, its friends accepted the defeat, the Athenæum continued its exhibitions in the top of its high building, the Jarves gallery was in whole or in part deposited in the New Haven art building, where it still remains, and during the twelve crowded years which have since gone by, although two or three times every year some friend of progress has been fired with enthusiasm enough to inspire a more or less lively communication in the "Transcript" or "Advertiser," there has been until now no real attempt to set agoing what all the while seemed to everybody a scheme at once so important and so practicable.

The effort and the failure looked like another example of the sanguine temper in which the good old town conceives the most hopeful and imposing schemes for the worthy aggrandizement of its people, and after well airing them in public meetings, and in legislative committees, quietly drops them and leaves to some other community the benefit of its deliberations and the realization of its dreams. We are not, however, much inclined to regret that the effort resulted in a failure. The civilization of the city was not ripe for it. We should be bold indeed in saying that it is ripe for it now. But it is certainly more nearly ripe. Anybody can see the change which twelve years have worked in the readiness of the people to receive and appreciate an institution of the kind we are speaking of.

It is then with the liveliest satisfaction that we have this winter seen the project revived by another set of men and in a somewhat new aspect. Strange to say, the Social Science Association, which has doubtless seemed to many of our readers only one more of the numberless societies with sounding titles, which appear to have been created chiefly with a view to multiplying the opportunities for speech-making, has accomplished what private interest had failed to accomplish, and has set this movement on foot again with a momentum which promises this time to carry it out of the region of projects into that of facts.

It happened oddly enough, that during the summer months, when the Social Science Association was endeavoring to determine upon the best shape to present its scheme to the public, the proprietors of the Athenæum, embarrassed for some years past by the encroachment of their growing library on the space devoted to the collection of pictures and statuary, and just then reduced nearly to despair by the bequest of Colonel Lawrence's collection of mediæval armor, revived the proposition which they had for some years considered, to build a Museum on their own account which should provide room for all their works of art, and at the same time leave their house in Beacon Street to be occupied by the books alone, and the necessary reading and conversation rooms. Repeated conferences between the special committees of the Athenæum and the Social Science Association, in which the inevitable dangers of divided counsel among a score of men seeking a common end through various methods seem to have been overcome with singular success, resulted finally in a substantial agreement on all the essential points of organization and government. It was determined that while a certain portion of the trustees should be selected from the citizens at large, on the simple ground of knowledge and experience relating to art, the rest should be made up of public men ex officio, as the Mayor of Boston, the Superintendent of Schools, the Secretary of the State Board of Education, the President of Harvard College, etc., the aim being to recognize and emphasize the distinctly educational character of the undertaking.

With respect to the financial aspect of the project there is little to say, except that the city government is reckoned on for the gift of the square of land known as St. James Park, the same on which the Coliseum was built a year ago. The funds for the building and its furnishing and maintenance, are to be collected by subscription from the citizens, the only money already promised being the gift of $25,000 from Mrs. Lawrence, having reference chiefly to the bequest of her late husband above mentioned, and given on condition that an additional amount of $75,000 should be collected by subscription or otherwise. But though the sum of $100,000 thus obtained would probably be more than sufficient for the cost of such a building as would be needed for the present, the committee foresaw so many and large additional expenses at the outset, added to what must necessarily be reserved as a fund for meeting the running expenses of the Museum, that the sum to be raised was, we believe, fixed at double that amount. Even this amount would be insufficient to provide for any regular increase of the collections, and it therefore was not proposed to make the galleries free except on one or two days of each week.

The details of the undertaking are, however, of course to a great degree undetermined, and may well remain so for some time to come. What the public are interested to know is, that they are in the hands of competent and earnest men who have no motive for any action but the wisest, and who will be able, if any can, to command the means which may be found necessary to place this important institution on a sure and firm foundation.

The collections with which the new Museum may be expected to open, include the pictures and statues belonging to the Athenæum, the engravings bequeathed by Mr. Gray to Harvard College, the works of art now in the Public Library, including the engravings lately given by Mr. Appleton, the admirable collection of architectural casts now belonging to the Institute of Technology, and the collection of armor of Mr. Lawrence, with such immediate additions as the funds at the disposal of the government may admit of. The Museum will thus begin life under circumstances far more brilliant and promising than those which attended the opening of the Public Library, and with half the aid from private munificence and public appropriation which that has received will take rank among the noblest educational institutions of America. No one will expect another Louvre or another Vatican; as no one expects another Notre Dame, or another St. Peter's. But Paris and Rome are beyond the reach of the mass of the people; and it is to lift the mass of the people into higher regions of enjoyment, and cultivation, and knowledge, that this undertaking is to be carried through. If we believe as we profess to do, that the civilization of America is to be raised to a higher level than the civilization of any by-gone age, we shall best prove it by neglecting no effort to preserve and to better all the instruction which has come down to us from the past, and to use it as a leaven with which to enlighten the heavy and gross materialism which has become our distinguishing trait among the nations of the earth.

The Tosti Collection of Prints.

The admirable collection of prints belonging now to the city of Boston, spoken of above, has but just now been presented to the Public Library by Mr. Thomas G. Appleton. The full number of prints is ten thousand, several hundred of which are framed and glazed, so that they are arranged for general exhibition in the reading-room and other halls.

Cardinal Tosti, whose portrait is in this collection, at the right end of a row of the cardinals of his time, was a handsome man, who lived to be ninety or thereabouts. He was one of the managers of the hospital of San Michele, but was none the less at the same time a lover of the fine arts, and was, indeed, sometimes blamed by his brother cardinals for too much interest in them. Two of the youths of the hospital, Mercuri and Calamatta, under his encouragement, devoted themselves to art and became the leading engravers of their time, as is well known to all collectors of modern engravings. Specimens of all their works, many of which are now very rare and precious, mostly before the letter, are to be found in this collection. Whether the happy accident of being the patron who had the development of these two geniuses lay at the foundation of a collection of which they were a centre, or whether they were added to a collection before made, we are unable to say. At all events the collection speaks for itself. It was made according to the taste, whim, or opportunity of the Cardinal, and solely to gratify his own desires. He did not aim to be historically connected, nor probably did the means of the Cardinal enable him to gratify himself with all the more costly examples. It presents not merely very many engravings whiare useful for popular instruction, but contains certain specialties, such as a most extensive collection of portraits, and as might naturally be expected, many prints of religious subjects which will be acceptable to our sterile Protestant portfolios. Nearly six hundred fine prints, so carefully selected, neatly framed in mahogany or black walnut, were of course very suitable for a public institution where they could be hung without risk of injury before the eyes, and not buried in the silence and darkness of portfolios, or if exposed, liable to speedy destruction. To these must be added one hundred and thirty-seven volumes containing a variety of subjects largely architectural, architecture having been a passion with the Cardinal; and by their solid binding, guaranteed against injury when used by the public. These are deposited in convenient and spacious cases, open to examination in the upper gallery of the Library.—Ibid.

Anecdote of Rossini.

MR. DWIGHT:—In the last number of the Journal of Music I see an extract from a new Life of Rossini, in which a question is raised as to the time required for the composition of the "Barber." Now, I remember well a certain winter in Florence, a good many years ago, when this opera was given, with great success, at the Pergola. Rossini was living then in Florence, but, according to his wont, never troubled himself to hear his own music performed. An English painter, Mr. S. (he who afterwards built the theatre at Fiesole) met the composer at an evening conversation, and ventured to congratulate him on the admirable performance of his work. "Roba leggera," said Rossini, "'lho fatta in cinque giorni," (Light stuff, I did it in five days.)

Rossini is known to have been an incorrigible wag, but what he meant probably was that, in that time, he had mapped out the whole composition in his brain, and the rest was only, comparatively, mechanical work. Even this, to other mortals, would seem only possible by miracle. To create the "Barber" in five days, or the Universe in six, may be held to be equally difficult; both seeming impossible, and belonging to the same category, the superhuman.

In retracing those by-gone days, I think I see the maestro pacing the streets of Florence, with slow gait and head erect. I remember once being in the company of an American friend, newly arrived, meeting him in the Mercato Nuovo. As the lion advanced on the opposite side of the street, I stopped and drew my friend's attention to him.

"Do you see that man?"

"Yes."

"That's Rossini?"

"Who?"

"The celebrated Rossini, the great composer."

"Ah, yes; I think I've heard of him."

"But he evidently had not. Now, if it had been Beethoven, or Franz.....?"

Monday Popular Concerts. (London).

[From the "Saturday Review," Jan. 22.]

At the Monday Popular Concerts we have music for itself, and for itself alone—music precisely as it was intended by the composers who produced it, and with no other temptation of any kind to make it pass muster. Of course efficient execution with such an end in view was a sine quâ non, and this, in various degrees of perfection, has been obtained. String quartets, piano sonatas, and other compositions coming under the head of "chamber music," represent art in its highest manifestations. He who can listen to them with attention and pleasure shows himself essentially an amateur, inasmuch as he finds gratification in music simply as music, and not as music set off by this or that extraneous aid. That many such exist is certain; otherwise, instead of 332 concerts, which, from February, 1859, to the present time, Mr. Chappell has been able to give, he would never, in all probability, have advanced so far as the first half hundred. Meanwhile, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., are become "household words" in a closer sense than was ever the case before. We previously knew Mozart by his operas, Haydn by his symphonies (in a small degree, be it understood) and vocal canzonets, Mendelssohn by his oratorios and his inimitable Lieder ohne Worte, almost alone. Now we are beginning to know them in their most intimate relations—listening to what they said and thought while "musicizing" (as Richard Wagner would say) at their own firesides, for the love of art, and for nothing else. But it is not only with these bright stars that Mr. Chappell is making us thus familiar. He has exhibited some luminaries—"lesser lights" if we will—which have afforded only less gratification. If all musicians were Mozarts and Haydns and Beethovens and Mendelssohns, a painful sense of oppression, we cannot but think, would ensue. A perpetual intercourse with giants might tend to become irksome. True, Haydn, in his way, was an occasionally condescending giant; but the others, Beethoven in particular, were apt to exhibit themselves in such a manner as to persuade lookers on that all the rest of the world were dwarfs. For this reason, if for no other, one must feel a strong sympathy for men like Dussek, Woelfl, Sterndale Bennett, &c., who, giants enough compared with ordinary musicians, reveal, nevertheless, certain shortcomings which allow us freely to criticize them, and, while envying their gifts, to love them all the more. To the works of men like these, not forgetting Clementi, Hummel, and others, we have been now and then introduced at the Monday Popular Concerts; and rarely has one been heard, when adequately performed, without affording unanimous satisfaction. The comprehensiveness, in short, with which the scheme of these entertainments is carried out forms by no means one of their least salient attractions.

But to quit generalization, we may proceed at once briefly to comment upon what, up to this moment, have been the leading incidents of the twelfth season. Let us first state that Mr. Chappell had, as usual, provided well for the legitimate success of his speculation, by engaging the services of a quartet of string instrument players of proved ability. At the head of these was a lady, whose singular genius absolved her from any necessity of claiming precedence under shelter of the universally-accepted motto—"place aux dames." Woman though she be, Mme. Norman Neruda holds her position by right of thorough ability to sustain it with honor. She has for some time enjoyed a reputation on the Continent as the greatest lady-performer on the violin since Teresa Milanollo, who played "first fiddle" at some of the concerts of the "Beethoven Quartet Society," instituted by the late Mr. T. Alsgar (one of the most enthusiastic amateurs of his day), more than a quarter of a century since. But, in our opinion, Mme. Neruda surpasses her famous predecessor in more than one respect. During her short visit to England, last summer, she showed herself a mistress alike of fantasia and concerto—of the free and severe styles of bravura playing. At a concert in St. James's Hall she also declared her capacity in another way, by admirably leading Mendelssohn's quartet in D major, No. 1, Op. 44. At the Monday Popular Concerts, during an interesting series of performances, she has now emphatically proved herself, without distinction of sex, a master of quartet-playing inferior to few that could be named. To say that she possesses a tone equal in strength and richness to that of Herr Joseph Joachim, or that in depth of sentiment and vigor of execution she emulates that greatest of all living masters of the violin, would be to say what is untrue; but where Mme. Neruda falls short of Herr Joachim is where, on such an instrument as the fiddle, a woman must inevitably fall short of a man. On the other hand, she has graces of her own which Herr Joachim would no more attempt to rival than Mars to rival the fascinations of Venus. Her handling of the "instrument of instruments" is, in its manner, perfect. Her tone, though wanting in breadth, is singularly sweet and agreeable; her mechanism, almost invariably true, is in certain respects prodigious; her intonation is rarely, if ever, at fault; and her expression is enchanting, not only because it is always natural and unaffected, not only because it is utterly devoid of commonplace, but because it bears the stamp of original thought. One of the great attractions of this lady's expression is the entire absence of exaggeration; and this, combined with a manner of phrasing which could scarcely by any possibility be more finished, lends an indescribable charm to her playing. Enough that, in Mme. Neruda, Mr. Chappell has obtained both a new attraction for the public and a mainstay for his quartets, when "the inimitable J. J."—as Herr Joachim is familiarly (and appropriately) styled among amateurs—is not at disposal. The other members of the quartet, during the concerts preceding Christmas, were Herr L. Ries, who has been "second violin" from the commencement; Signor Zerbini, an occasional and very serviceable, because very competent, viola; and Signor Piatti, whose absence from the quartet of the Monday Popular Concerts would, we think, be more severely felt than that of any other performer. A violinist may lead, and, for a time, Herr Joachim not be missed; but a violoncellist, no matter who, can never play without creating cause for regret that Signor Piatti is absent. Happily, Signor Piatti is now invariably present, his engagement at the Monday Popular Concerts being for the uninterrupted series, season after season.

And now, in a few sentences, we may state what Mme. Neruda played, and what she played the best. At the first concert the quartets were Mendelssohn's in D major (already mentioned), and Haydn's in D minor (so often compared with that of Mozart in the same key, which Mozart dedicated to Haydn). With Mendelssohn we were pleased—as was the case last summer; but with Haydn we were beyond measure charmed; purer expression of music that is purity itself could hardly be imagined. At the same concert the lady-violinist gave to perfection the sonata of Mozart in B flat, for violin and pianoforte, written for Mlle. Strinassacchi—the Norman-Neruda, doubtless, of Mozart's day, although her fame is now exclusively due to the sonata composed expressly for her by the man who also composed Don Giovanni and the Requiem. In this performance Mme. Neruda's coadjutor, at the pianoforte, was Herr Ernst Pauer—a worthy coadjutor, we need hardly say. At the next concert Mme. Neruda led a quartet by Haydn, in B flat—a display of execution as superior to that in Beethoven's "Rasoumowsky" quartet, No. 2 (E minor), first piece in the programme, as the quartet of Beethoven is superior to that of Haydn. Here we could not but feel that beyond a certain line the genius of the new and interesting violinist, however unique, could not travel. The ripe productions of the greatest musicians, are out of her intellectual reach. At the subsequent concert, however, she not only showed that she could play Mozart's quartet in D minor as well as she had already played its counterpart, by Haydn, in the same key, but she roused the audience to enthusiasm in the adagio from Spohr's ninth violin concerto. To play Haydn and Mozart so as to satisfy their most fervent admirers is no small thing; but to add Spohr—the great realist, who could see the clouds, and imagine nothing above—was to earn a fresh claim for versatility. At the fourth concert, Mme. Neruda gained a new kind of victory, with Schubert's romantic and somewhat melancholy quartet in A minor (the "Hungarian")—playing on the same occasion, with Mr. Hallé and Signor Piatti, his grand trio in B flat (about which Schumann talked so much rhapsodically), and with Mr. Hallé, Beethoven's sonata in A minor (Op. 23). The last named composer's quartet in G major (Op. 18), and a quartet by Haydn (in C), at the concert after, provided for Mme. Neruda not only an occasion again to show how thoroughly she could enter into the spirit of Haydn, but one to show how in Beethoven's earlier works she could feel just as thoroughly at home with Beethoven. At this concert she played, with Mr. Hallé, Mozart's beautiful sonata in F (containing the variations in D minor)—administering to all who heard her a salutary lesson in natural and unadorned phrasing. Next followed, on her last appearance, Mme. Neruda's greatest success, and also her only failure—if failure, where there was so much of excellent, it could justly be called. Anything more touching, refined and beautiful than her reading of Mozart's "Orphean" (it has been aptly styled) quintet in G minor—the quintet of quintets—was never heard; anything more comparatively disappointing than her performance (with Mr. Hallé) of Beethoven's well-known sonata dedicated to Kreutzer, could scarcely be fancied. But this merely proves that if we expect constant perfection we are likely to be deceived. In summing up, briefly, the effect produced upon us by Mme. Neruda's successive performances, we may say that she is the greatest and most accomplished lady violinist in our remembrance; but that she is still a lady violinist. In Haydn and Mozart she is perfect; in the earlier works of Beethoven (whose Romances, in F and G, by the way, she played at a morning and evening concert respectively, as well as we could dream of hearing them played), she is perfect; in Mendelssohn she is showy and brilliant; but in the larger and profounder works of Beethoven she is somewhat out of her depth. Criticism apart, however, she is a genuine artist, and an invaluable acquisition to the Monday Popular Concerts.

We have already hinted that among the pianists before Christmas were Herr Pauer and Mr. Hallé. Herr Pauer produced, on one evening, a very marked effect by his vigorous and artistic execution of Schubert's very difficult and very elaborate fantasia in C—the one in which the theme of the well known song, "The Wanderer," is introduced. Mr. Hallé brought forward nothing that he had not previously given at these concerts. This gentleman's execution is as exquisitely neat, as mechanically irreproachable, as ever; but his expression, as was shown more particularly in the sonatas of Schubert in B flat major and A minor, is becoming somewhat over-elaborated. He will not allow a phrase to speak for itself, but puts all, so to say, in "fine language." One might imagine that Mr. Hallé looked upon every simple melody (to quote Les Précieuses Ridicules) as "du dernier bourgeois," and strove its utmost to make it assume "le bel air des choses." The other pianist before Christmas was a young lady, a foreigner, who attempted Beethoven's so-called Sonata Pastorale (in D, Op. 28), and played it in a manner so closely resembling that of an imperfectly educated school-girl, that we withhold her name, and merely enter a protest against such exhibitions at high-class entertainments as altogether out of place.

The two concerts since Christmas have been interesting for more reasons than one. That conscientiously striving violinist, Herr Ludwig Straus, on each evening, led the quartets with his accustomed zeal and ability. These were the glorious No. 1 (so-called, although, in strict accuracy, No. 3) of Beethoven, in F, and his still more glorious No. 9 (No. 3 of the "Racounowsky" set), in C. Then we had, for the twentieth time at least, the same composer's famous septet in E flat, for string and wind instruments, about which Haydn thought so much, and Beethoven, affectedly so little, while posterity, without reference either to Haydn or Beethoven, has proclaimed it "immortal"; and Mozart's scarcely less familiar, and certainly not less beautiful, quintet in A, for clarinet and string quartet, in which Mr. Lazarus plays the clarinet part as well as he has ever played it,—and he has played it often enough. On each occasion the pianist, Mme. Arabella Goddard, in accordance with what, in her case, is a time-honored custom, brought forward something never previously heard at the Monday Popular Concerts. On the first evening it was a grand fantasia by Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, eldest of Johann Sebastian Bach's twenty-one children, and most gifted of his twelve sons, the majority of whom were more or less musical. The second son, Philipp Emmanuel, is in the world's belief, after his father, the most celebrated who bears the honored name; but this Philipp Emmanuel himself said of his elder brother, W. Friedemann, that he (W. Friedemann) represented their father better than all the rest of them put together. ("Er konnte unsern Vater eher ersetzen als wir alle zusammenkommen"). The truth is, however, that Friedemann Bach was more richly endowed than industrious—that is, be it understood, compared with the people about him; for an idle "Bach" would have been something very far beyond a perseveringly diligent composer bearing any other name. Enough that Friedemann Bach has left a great deal of music, much of which is in print, still more, possibly, in manuscript.

What is known of him shows that he stands nearer to his illustrious father even than Philipp Emmanuel, of whom Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven (totally ignorant of Friedemann) knew so much, and whom they esteemed so highly. Friedemann was the greatest organist of his day and the greatest organ composer. What Mme. Goddard selected as an example of his genius, was one of those works for the clavichord (now pianoforte) which have hitherto only existed in manuscript.* She has already played it at her pianoforte recitals, last year, to a more select (which may signify less numerous) audience; but the reception given to it by Mr. Chappell's "2,000" or thereabouts, was heartier than could by any likelihood have been obtained from a "fashionable" audience in the summer. The work itself, which we have no space to describe, is eminently remarkable; it not only foreshadows Haydn and Mozart, but occasionally even Beethoven. Unlike the organ music of Friedemann Bach, which bears so close a resemblance to that of his father, it is something quite new and distinct from the clavichord music of that great model—as new, indeed, for its time, as anything that ever came from spontaneously plastic genius. At the second concert, Mme. Goddard played the magnificent "Introduction, Fugue, and Sonata," in C minor, of Woelfl—another among the many neglected musical geniuses who have lived, and labored, and produced comparatively in vain. To Woelfl, however, about whom we hope to find some other opportunity of speaking, we have already cursorily referred; and all we can at present say of his sonata in C minor is that it was just as welcome and just as cordially received as the fantasia of W. Friedemann Bach. Mme. Goddard's other performances were Mendelssohn's sonata in D (No. 2), for pianoforte and violoncello, and W. Sterndale Bennett's sonata duo in A for the same instruments—in both of which her associate was Signor Piatti. Players better matched could not be named—in saying which we are paying the highest possible compliment to each. The sonata of our greatest English musician was especially interesting, as having been given for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts—although it is now some eighteen years since it was written (expressly for Signor Piatti). A more finished, interesting, and engaging piece of its kind could hardly be named. The middle movement alone would stamp it as a work of genius.

The vocal music at these concerts, though not invariably of the same high order, or exhibiting the same commendable spirit of research, as the instrumental, was especially noticeable at the two performances under immediate consideration. The singer was Mr. Santley, who at the first concert introduced, for the first time, an Italian song by Alessandro Scarlatti (father of Domenico Scarlatti, the celebrated composer for the harpsichord)—"O cessate di piangermi," which Handel might have owned, and from which Handel unquestionably drew inspiration; besides two of the most familiar songs of Schubert—the "Praise of Tears" and "Hark! the Lark." When Mr. Santley sings, and when Mr. Santley sings such music, it must add to the attraction of any concert, however classical.

At the afternoon performance on Saturday we shall once more hear Herr Joseph Joachim—with whose appearance, as of yore, the Monday Popular Concert season attains its zenith.

Something about Franz Schubert.

At the time the above letters were written I was only slightly acquainted with Schubert, though I had heard him sing his songs on two or three occasions. His voice (une voix de compositeur) was something between a sweet tenor and a baritone; his style simple and natural, full of feeling, and without the slightest affectation. In the winter of 1824-25, as a jurist of four years' standing, I was, what with the Vienna edition of Shakespeare, and what with my own productions, overwhelmed with work. I was gradually accumulating innumerable dramas and comedies, among which was the Gescheitster von Nürnberg, as well as subsequently Der Musicus von Augsburg, Fortunat, and other ideal and romantic effusions, with which, for the moment, practical, realistic managers would have nothing to do. But I still continued to work on without respite, and spent nearly all my evenings in my lonely room.

I was sitting, then, in that hermitage of mine, one evening, in the month of February, 1825, when my old friend, Schwind, came in, bringing with him Schubert, who was then already celebrated, or at least known. We soon became intimate. In compliance with Schwind's wish, I was obliged to read some absurd things I had written in my youth. We then went to the piano, and Schubert sang. We played, also, with four hands, and then adjourned to the tavern where we remained to a late hour of the night (I am vain enough to mention that it is to my continuous musical practice with my friend that I owe my tolerable skill in reading at sight.)

The alliance was concluded. From that day forth, we three friends were inseparable. Others, too, gathered round us, most of them painters and musicians, and formed a set of individuals, full of fresh life, animated by similar sentiments and similar aspirations, and sharing with each other their pleasures and their pains. First among them was that fine fellow, Schöber, who, in the summer of 1825, at length arrived in Vienna.

Old age becomes from time to time garrulous, but it is only in youth that people have really something to tell each other, and have never finished doing so. Such was the case with us. How often did we three wander about till nearly daylight, seeing one another home in turns, and not being able to part, not unfrequently passing the night at one or the other's rooms.

We were not very particular about comfort. Friend Moritz would, for instance, fling himself, merely wrapped in a leathern counterpane, upon the bare floor, and on one occasion, when a pipe was wanted, he cut up the case of Schubert's eye-glasses into one. As regards property, communistic ideas prevailed; hats, boots, neck-handkerchiefs, and even coats, as well as any other articles of apparel, that happened to fit him who required them, all formed one common stock, but gradually, if often worn by the same individual, who thus gained a kind of affection for them, became his undisputed private property.

Whoever happened to be in cash paid for the other, or others. Sometimes it came to pass that two had no money, and the third only—the same. Of course, Schubert was the Croesus among us, now and then rolling in silver, when he had sold a song or two, or even a whole series, as, for instance, the songs of Walter Scott, for which Artaria or Diabelli paid him five hundred florins, Austrian currency—a price with which he was perfectly contented, and which he resolved to husband carefully, but as was always the case, at once failed to do so. For a time, he spent the money freely, treating everyone—then came once more short commons. In a word, the tide was continually ebbing and flowing. It was to the fact of its being high water in Schubert's pocket, that I owe the pleasure of hearing Paganini. I could not manage the five florins that Concert-Pirate required. Of course, it was absolutely imperative that Schubert should hear him, but he would not go a second time without me. He grew quite angry when I refused to accept a ticket from him.

"Nonsense!" he exclaimed, "I have heard him once, and I was savage you were not with me! I tell you there will not be another fellow like him! Money is a drug in the market with me at present, so come along!" and he dragged me off.

Who would not, under the circumstances, have allowed himself to be persuaded? So we heard the infernally-celestial fiddler, on whose fantasies Heine has written such fine ones himself. We were no less entranced with his wonderful Adagio, than surprised at his diabolical dodges. We were, also, no less humorously edified at the incredibly ludicrous bows made by the demoniacal individual, who resembled a thin black doll upon wires. According to custom I was taken to a tavern, and treated after the concert, a bottle more than usual being consumed and set down to the account of our enthusiasm.

That was when it was high tide! But there was a reverse to the medal. On another occasion, I went, early in the afternoon, to the café near the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, and ordered a "Mélange" with which I ate half-a-dozen "Kippfel." Shortly afterwards, Schubert appeared and did the same. We were both surprised at our respective appetites being so good so shortly after dinner.

"The fact is I have not dined," said my friend, in a somewhat dejected tone.

"No more have I," I replied laughing.

Without any previous arrangement, we had both come to the café, where we were well known, and had "stuck up" the "Mélange," instead of having a dinner, for which neither of us was that day in a position to pay. It was completely low tide with both of us.

It was under similar circumstances that the fact of our calling each other "Du," was celebrated in sugar and water! Then again came Schubert evenings, "Schubertluden" as they were called, with jolly, high-spirited companions, when the wine flowed in streams; that good fellow Vogl sang all the splendid songs for our amusement, and poor Franz Schubert had to accompany them, till his short fat fingers would scarcely obey him any longer. But he was worse off at our house parties—merely "Wurstelbälle" in those simple times—though there was no scarcity of pretty women, married and unmarried, at them. Our "Bertel," as he was occasionally called in a coaxing tone, had to play his newest waltzes over and over again, till an endless cotillion was finished, so that it was only at the modest supper that the short, corpulent manniken, bathed in perspiration, had a moment's rest. It was not astonishing that he sometimes escaped, and that many a "Schubertlade" had to be given without Schubert, if he did not, perchance, feel inclined for company, or some one or other among the persons invited did not particularly please him. It not unfrequently happened that he would let a whole party wait for him in vain, while he was sitting over a bottle, in some obscure wineshop, with half-a-dozen ushers, his former colleagues. When we reproached him, the next day, for his conduct, he would answer with a good-natured snigger: "I was not in the humor."

This is, perhaps, the proper place for correcting certain errors which circulate from time to time, regarding the easy-going, genial artist, especially among persons who have no small opinion of their own good breeding, as they call it. "It is not to be denied that Schubert, poor fellow, possessed talent, but he was totally deficient in polish, in good tone, and even in acquirements—nay, in everything constituting a scholar or a gentleman." people used to say, and, at last, they were rather inclined to picture the genial songster as a kind of "drunken savage," as in his day the prosaic Voltaire designated that poet giant Shakespeare in usum Delphini.

It is certainly true that Schubert had no regular University education; his studies had not extended much beyond the course prescribed at the Gymnasium, and he was a self-taught man, all his short existence. In his own branch of art, he was tolerably acquainted with the composers and models, and, under Salieri's direction, had applied himself sufficiently to theory, though, as I will afterwards relate, it was not till the last year of his life that he set about studying certain subjects, which he had previously neglected. In literature, too, he was anything but ignorant, and the poetic way, full of life, with which he could grasp the most different poetic individualities, such as Goethe, Schiller, William Müller, J. G. Seydl, Mayrhofer, Walter Scott and Heine; clothe them anew in flesh and blood, and faithfully reproduce in beautiful, noble, and characteristic music the idiosyncrasy of each one—such instances of palingenesis should suffice, by the mere fact of their existence, and without any further proof, to show from what deep feeling, from how delicately strung a soul his creations flowed! Any one who so understands poets is a poet himself. And there is a great difference between a man who is a poet, and occasionally quaffs his wine in an Anacreontic spirit with his friends and those who think as he does, and a drunken savage! This savage, too, read seriously; extracts exist in his own hand from historical and even philosophical writers; his diaries contain his own ideas, which are sometimes highly original, as well as poems; and his favorite associates were artists, and persons connected with art. He entertained, on the other hand, a perfect dread of ordinary prosy individuals, and with regard to those narrow-minded beings, high or low, commonly called the educated classes, Goethe's exclamation:—

"Lieber will ich schlechter werden

was always his motto, as it was that of us all. In mediocre company he felt isolated, uncomfortable, and oppressed, and easily grew ill-tempered, despite the great attention shown him when he was beginning to be celebrated. It was not, therefore, astonishing, if he sometimes at table took more than he could bear, and, by a few strong outbursts, sought to free himself from the depressing influence of those around him, so that they started back in dismay. I myself witnessed a scene of this description, but, after all, it was more comic than reprehensible. It was one summer's afternoon. We had strolled out, with Franz Lachner and others, to Grinzing, for the purpose of having some of the new wine, a beverage of which Schubert was especially fond, though I myself never liked its sharp, arid taste. We sat talking pleasantly over the liquor, and did not walk back till it was dark. I wanted to go home at once, as I resided at that time in a distant suburb, but Schubert dragged me forcibly into a tavern. I was also obliged to accompany him to a café, where he was accustomed to finish his evening, stopping in fact till late into the night. It was one o'clock in the morning, and an exceedingly animated musical discussion had sprang up as we sat drinking hot punch. Schubert tossed off one glass after another, and fell into a sort of enthusiastic fit, and, more eloquent than usual, explained to Lachner and myself all his plans for the future. As fate would have it, a very unlucky star conducted into the café two musicians, celebrated members of the band at the Operahouse. On their entrance, Schubert stopped short in the midst of his animated harangue. His forehead grew wrinkled, and his small grey eyes glared wildly from beneath his spectacles, which he kept pushing ceaselessly backwards and forwards. Scarcely, however, had the musicians caught sight of the master, before they rushed up to him, seized hold of his hands, said a thousand complimentary things, and nearly crushed him with flattery. At length it came out that they were most anxious to have a new composition, with solos for their own particular instruments, for a concert they intended giving. "The maestro Schubert would assuredly be so obliging as to, etc., etc."

The master, however, appeared anything but so obliging, and made no reply. Being repeatedly pressed, he at length said curtly, "No! for you I will write nothing."

"Not for us?" said the musicians in amazement.

"No! most certainly not!"

"And why not, Herr Schubert?" was the reply, in an irritated tone. "I think we are as much artists as yourself! no better are to be found in all Vienna!"

"Artists!" exclaimed Schubert, hastily drinking the last glass of punch, and getting up from his seat. Then, cocking his hat, over his ear the little fellow placed himself, as though menacingly, before the two virtuosos, one of whom was a big, and the other a corpulent man. "Artists!" he repeated, "Catgut-scrappers, you mean. You are nothing more! One of you nibbles the brass mouthpiece of his wooden cudgel, and the other puffs out his cheeks by blowing down his French horn. Do you call that art? It is a mechanical trade, a knack, that brings in money, and there an end!—You, artists! Do you not know what the great Lessing says?—How can a man do nothing all his life but nibble the end of a piece of wood with holes in it!—that is what he says!"—(turning to me)—"or something of the kind. Am I not right?" (Again addressing the virtuosos), "You pretend to be artists! You are only fiddlers and blowing machines, the whole lot of you! I am an artist, if you like. I am Schubert, Franz Schubert, whom everyone knows, and of whom every one speaks! A man who has written great things, and beautiful things which you are incapable of understanding—and who will write something still more beautiful."—(To Lachner): "Is not that true, my boy?—Something very fine indeed! Cantatas and quartets, operas and symphonies! I am not merely a waltz-composer, as you see stated in the stupid papers, and as stupid men repeat—I am Schubert! Franz Schubert! Remember that! When the word art is uttered, the speaker refers to me, and not to you, insects and worms, who ask for solos, which I will never write for you—I know why! You crawling, gnawing worms, you whom I ought to crush beneath my foot—the foot of a man who touches the stars—sublimi feriam sidera vertice,"—(to me): "translate that for them.—The stars, I say, while you, poor horn-blowing worms, wriggle in the dust, and with the dust as dust are blown about and rot."

Such a tirade, only verbally far worse, though I have faithfully reproduced its spirit, was that which he launched at the heads of the dumb-founded virtuosos who stood gaping with their mouths wide open, and without being able to say a word in reply, while Lachner and myself endeavored to get the excited composer away from what was, at any rate, a very unpleasant scene. We took him home, soothing him as we went along.

Concerts.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The eighth Symphony Concert (Thursday Afternoon, Feb. 17), was made up as follows:

Overture, "The Fair Melusine,".....Mendelssohn.
Symphony, in G minor.....Mozart.

Pianoforte Concerto, in D major, No. 2, Ed. of Breitkopf and Härtel. First time.....Mozart.
Allegro. Larghetto. Allegretto.

Hermann Daum.
Unfinished Symphony, in B minor.....Schubert.
Allegro moderato. Andante con moto.
Serenade (from a Quartet), by all the strings.....Haydn.
Overture, "The Wood Nymph".....Bennett.

This was not altogether a fortunate combination. We say not fortunate, because the programme as a whole, as it resulted after various balked purposes and changes, was somewhat the accident of an accident. Too many sweets, too little contrast, although plenty of variety; but a variety entirely within the sphere of soothing, gentle influence. It was unfortunate, too, that the Mozart Concerto came immediately after the Mozart Symphony; yet the component elements of the programme hardly allowed another order. The two Overtures, both romantic, picturesque and interesting as provoking a comparison, had to be placed far apart to avoid monotony.

The G-minor Symphony (which led off in the very first of these concerts five years ago), is one of the perfect creations of its kind, so recognized by all musicians. We wonder not a little therefore, when we read in one of the Dailies that it is "by no means one of the greatest of the great composer's Symphonies!" Which among them, then, is greater—with the one exception of the "Jupiter"? For, leaving that out, none of Mozart's Symphonies are great in the sense in which the term as quoted seems to have been used. Their greatness is in the perfection of their art, their pure imaginative beauty, their unity of form pervaded by one warm, spontaneous life, as it they grew and were not made. And in these attributes the G-minor stands at the head of all the Symphonies. The rendering this time was delicate, the fine vitality of outline well preserved, and in the main the lovely, luscious coloring as well.

Mr. DAUM is a devoted, conscientious student of the masters of piano writing, who does not seem by temperament or strength of physique to find his forte in tasks with orchestra before great audiences. He plays too much as if he were alone in his own quiet room, a reverent reader of his master, rather than a self-forgetting, strong interpreter: The listener waits in vain to feel the sparks struck out. Yet all is rendered smoothly, cleanly for the most part,—bating a too frequent blurring intervention of the pedal. Nor did this one in D major, although wearing the unmistakable family features, prove to be one of the most interesting of Mozart's Concertos; the more famous one in D minor, or another in E flat, considering that so far we had heard none of them here, would have been a happier choice. We are certainly thankful to Mr. Daum for letting us hear a Mozart Concerto at all; the choice of author, at all events, was creditable in a time when all our artists seem reluctant to produce themselves in any but the more brilliant and electrifying works in this form by great composers since Mozart,—the two greatest ones of his immediate successor, Beethoven, being the greatest of any yet. The first movement in the one under consideration is of most account, though evidently the Larghetto, with its simple, quaint, idyllic melody, its pretty motive prettily imitating itself—gracefully and feelingly played too—gave most general pleasure. The Finale, one of the slightest of Mozart's commonplace, sounds too much like a pupil's exercise in Hüntten or some "Modern School" of the past generation. The elaborate Cadenzas, introduced in the two quick movements, very good ones, were written by Carl Reinecke. (And here we must remark that we had been misinformed, when we attributed to Reinecke the Cadenzas used by Miss Dutton in the Beethoven Concerto; they were by Moscheles). Mr. Daum won the respect and sympathy of his audience, and was quite warmly applauded, especially after the slow movement.

The two movements of the Unfinished Symphony mark neither "the highest" nor "the latest wave" of Schubert's genius, as the authority above cited would have us believe. They were written some time before the great, crowning work, the Symphony in C. Full of beauties, and of originality, of course, they are, and only genius great as Schubert's could account for them. Plainly they have become very popular, and many, even of the most experienced music-lovers, hear them for the first time with a delightful surprise. There is no denying the charm of the melodic theme pervading the first movement, nor the tragic pathos and delicacy of both movements, nor the occasional passages of grandeur. It is a fragmentary effort of strange fascination, but not a triumphant work. It has at least two defects. In the first place it is not positively Symphonic; during the greater part of the Allegro you are in doubt whether you are listening to a Symphony, or to a tragic Overture, the restless tremolo is so dramatic; the overmastering mood is more than the artistic genial mastery. And then, taking the Andante and Allegro together, the entire tone is one of utter melancholy and depression; Music fails to work out its spiritual victory here and win great Joy, as it does in all the Symphonies of Beethoven, and in the great one of Schubert. The Allegro seems to describe a feverish brain haunted by one lovely, hopeful melody, which it in vain pursues, rising near the end to a great climax of despair which is indeed sublime and in the grandest vein of Symphony, but only momentary. Another of these great suggestions occurs near the beginning of the Andante; but on the whole we have the glorious brain here in a comparatively impotent and sickly state. Wonderfully lovely and strange themes are no wonder ever in a man like Schubert; his pianoforte Sonatas are full of them, and yet these, with two or three exceptions, cannot as artistic wholes be counted among his great successes. Can we wonder that Schubert put this work aside unfinished?

The little Quartet piece from Haydn, played by all the strings (after a manner much in vogue in Paris, and recently exemplified to us in this very morceau by Thomas's Orchestra), was a charming bit of pianissimo effect, in itself very much enjoyed; though, considering all that had preceded, some bracing, vigorous fortissimos might have been better for us. And we must own that there is justice in the following remarks in the Transcript:

It might well be questioned whether the Haydn "Serenade" by all the strings—however grateful the piece—rightly found its place on the programme; serving, as its primarily did, to illustrate in imitation a mere instrumental effect. It was given with muted strings, and was not a success in comparison with the Thomas rendering. Shut one's eyes, and the sound seemed to come at most from a double quartet of strings; the prime achievement—that of fulness and volume even under the restraint of an absolute pianissimo, was not attained.

Bennett's romantic Overture loses nothing by repetition; yet this Wood Nymph, though charming, need cause no jealousy in the fair Melusina.

The next programme (ninth and last but one of the Concerts, March 3) will not be open to any of the above complaints; while the first appearance of the young German Pianist, Miss ANNA MEHLIG, who has made so fine an impression on the most musical people in New York as well in Europe, will be a marked event in our musical year. It is this:

PART I. Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann; Recit. and Aria: "Addio, O miei sospiri," from Gluck's "Orfeo," (first time), sung by Mrs. C. A. Barry; Piano Concerto in F minor, Chopin, played by Miss Anna Mehlig, (her first appearance in Boston.)

PART II. Alto Arias, from Handel's Italian Operas, arranged by Robert Franz, (first time in any concert), sung by Mrs. Barry; Beethoven's Heroic Symphony.

CHAMBER CONCERTS. Notwithstanding the absence of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, classical entertainments of this class have abounded with us, beyond all precedent, this winter. The LISTEMANN Quartet Matinees are over; PERABO has completed two sets of Piano Matinees, of four each, and soon begins with Evening Concerts; Mr. PETERSILEA has given two of his four Musical Recitals; Mr. PARKER finishes to-night his Trio Soirees, four in number, given weekly. And still we have in prospect four "Pianoforte Recitals" (beginning Tuesday, March 1.) by Mr. JAMES M. TRACY, assisted by Mr. H. WILDE, vocalist; and, probably, most welcome news, a series by HUGO LEONHARD. To these must be added, but that they are countless, the Matinees, &c., of the two Conservatories.

Of all these the scene has been and will be Chickering Hall, and after these are over we shall know that pleasant place no more save as a remembered blessing. The greedy mouth of Business, Dry Goods, gapes wide to swallow up the building, and the Messrs. Chickering will remove a few blocks southward on the same street, where they will soon have another and a larger Hall, and Music will not cease to be under the constant obligations to them that it always has been.

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER's Second Trio Soirée, Saturday evening, Feb. 12, was made up of choice elements:

Trio in E flat, op. 1.....Beethoven.
Allegro. Adagio. Scherzo. Presto.
Aria, from "Die Entführung".....Mozart.
Piano Solos:
Prelude in E major.....Bach.
Scherzo in E minor.....Mendelssohn.
Songs:
Night Song.....Schumann.
The Violet.....Mozart.
Trio in F major.....Schumann.
Allegro molto. Adagio Espressivo. Moderato. Allegro non troppo.

Both the Trios were rendered in good style and with true artistic feeling, Messrs. LISTEMANN and HEINDL taking the violin and 'cello parts. The early one by Beethoven does not lose its freshness, nor seem less original after the very interesting one by Schumann, which was new to us, and too good to be dismissed with a single hearing. The whole work is full of power and beauty, particularly the third movement, which has a peculiar rhythm, and in the second part of which the melody in the piano is accompanied by a charming variation on itself begun by the violin and passed on to the 'cello. Mr. Parker played the smaller pieces in a clear and finished manner, with fine taste and feeling. The singer, Mrs. A. P. BROWN, who has a bright and fresh soprano, not particularly sympathetic, with fair execution, made quite an agreeable impression, especially in the two smaller songs.

The programme of the third Soirée was this:

Trio in G major.....Mozart.
Allegro. Andante. Allegretto.
Aria, from "St. Paul," "Be thou faithful" Mendelssohn.
[Violoncello obbligato].
Piano Solo: Ballad in A flat.....Chopin.
Song: Suleika.....Schubert.
Trio in D minor.....Mendelssohn.

The Mozart Trio, — the first by him which we remember to have heard in any of our concert rooms—was most enjoyable. An easy task for the performers, compared with the more modern works of that kind, but yet requiring a mature artistic feeling, a fine, vital touch and finish, which it had in this case. Familiar as the Mozart features were, they had the charm of novelty and freshness presented in this for him (to us) unwonted form. It is unaffected, happy music, full of grace and geniality; light-hearted, but not trivial. The variations of the piquant Allegretto theme sparkle with charming pleasantness, and Mr. Parker's happy rendering of one or two of them called forth much applause. The D-minor Trio of Mendelssohn, of course, is always acceptable, nor did the artists fail to make its beauty felt. We do not think that Mr. Parker's forte lies in Chopin; yet the Ballade, but for a little coldness, was on the whole nicely played.

It was a real pleasure to hear the sympathetic tenor voice of Dr. S. W. LANGMAD, improved by careful culture as it is, and always used expressively, in songs of such rare beauty and significance as these two. He entered truly into the spirit of each style of music, and brought out their beauty and deep feeling. Mr. Heindl comes in for a good share of the credit for his expressive violoncello accompaniment of the sacred Aria. Schubert's "Suleika" is one of the most exquisite of all the songs which that marvellous song writer produced so easily.

Mr. ERNEST PERABO concluded his second series of four Matinees, on Friday, Feb. 18. A large audience, as usual, were delighted with his rendering of a unique, and for the most part novel programme:

Sonata, (A minor, No. 7, Edition Peters, Leipzig.) Mozart.
a) Allegro maestoso. b) Andante cantabile con espressione.
c) Presto.
"Nachtstücke," op. 23.....Robert Schumann.
No. 1. Mehr langsam, oft zurückhaltend.
No. 2. Markirt und lebhaft.
No. 3. Mit grosser Lebhaftigkeit.
No. 4. Einfach.
{ a) Etude, op. 10 No. 4, [C sharp minor.] Chopin.
b) Tarantella, op. 43, [A flat major.]
Sonata, op. 111, [C Minor].....Beethoven.
a) Maestoso. Allegro con brio ed appassionato.
b) Arietta, Adagio.

The Mozart Sonata, one of the strongest and richest of the set, (No. 5, in the Ditson edition), was played once before by Mr. Perabo, some two years ago, and was worthy of revival. The "Night Pieces," by Schumann, are strangely characteristic specimens of his moody and peculiar genius. The first (in a "rather slow, and often reluctant" tempo), is sombre in tone, and would seem monotonous and dull, not fairly mastered. The second ("marked and lively") the third (vivacissimo), and the fourth, ("simple," as it is marked and already familiar to not a few here), went on increasing in interest, for they were finely interpreted.

Of Perabo, also, we should say that Chopin's sphere was not particularly his sphere. His selections showed the more brilliant side of the composer, and quite felicitously. But the great feature of the concert, as of an earlier one, and which everybody wished to hear repeated more than anything in the young artist's whole rich series of interpretations, was the last of Beethoven's Sonatas, in C minor. Schindler is the authority for Mr. Perabo's statement in a note, that "Beethoven wrote this Sonata, also, op. 109 and 110, in the autumn of 1821, at one sitting, (in einer Züge), in order to convince an anxious friend, Count Brunswick, that his intellect was unimpaired." But Schindler's expression is schrieb nieder, "wrote them down," which may imply that the work of composition had been already done. Otherwise the thing would seem miraculous. Perabo played it magnificently, and the great features of the work, so full of fire, depth of feeling, and rich imagination, stamped themselves upon more than one mind wont to feel itself astray and overtasked and weary amid the bewildering flashes of Beethoven's later genius. It was a grand finale to the series of concerts.

Mr. Perabo announces his first Evening Concert for March 22, when he will play two of the Schubert Sonatas, and Beethoven's Six Variations, op. 34; and when Mr. KREISSMANN, too, will sing Löwe's setting of Goethe's droll, fantastic "Hochzeitslied" (Wedding Song). We may also state that Mr. LEONHARD will join him, on a similar occasion, in the performance of what perhaps is Schubert's most grandly conceived work, next to the Symphony in C, itself symphonic in suggestion, and made into a Symphony by Joachim,—the Fantasia for four hands.

Mozart's Marriage of Figaro.

[Concluding remarks on the performance by the English troupe, which were crowded out in our last number.]

The concert pieces went well, and the Orchestra under CARL ROSA's sure direction, though it needed more strings, did fair justice to Mozart's exquisite instrumentation. It is easy to single out airs, scenes, special parts for admiration; and it is for these that most listeners seek the Opera. But to the real music-lover, what even more than these, in an imaginative, unique, and whole creation, like this happy production of young Mozart's brain, enchants, absorbs, and fills with delicious after-vibrations in the chambers of the soul, is the lavish and spontaneous springing up of flowers of beauty in all the unpretending little, what seem mere connecting passages—what may be caught by listening, especially at any passing moment to the orchestra,—in short the beauty of the composition as a whole. Most people do not notice this, and thereby they lose as much, as commonplace mortals, all preoccupied with worldly cares, lose of the daily beauty of the sky and light, or of those wondrous visitations of the divine artist, Nature, when she transforms our parks and streets, and dingy houses into such unimaginable fairy world, as she has done in last night's snow storm.

"Figaro" is a rare work of genius, and it is well that our people so appreciate it. But let us not admit what some say, that it is even greater than Don Giovanni. The latter, to all the melody and grace of "Figaro," adds another element, of the sublimest grandeur, wholly absent here,—or rather interblends the two—to wit, the supernatural; and that not only where it takes supreme possession in the tremendous last scene, but, (what is more to the purpose of our argument) where, as in the scene where Leporello is forced to invite the statue to supper, the terror of the supernatural creeps into, without silencing the comic and grotesque; and, all the while, the orchestra singing and breathing balmy summer night over it all, and over us!

MORE ORCHESTRAL MUSIC. The Harvard Musical Association will give two extra Symphony Concerts, on the two Thursdays following their subscription series. The first, March 24, will be in aid of the noble patriotic project of a Boston Art Museum (particularly for that department of it which is most important and stands most in need, that of Casts of the great Sculpture of the world). The programme will consist largely of the works of Beethoven, and Mr. LEONHARD will then redeem his promise of playing the Schumann Concerto. The second, March 31, will be in compliment to the Conductor, CARL ZENKHAUS, and will also offer great attractions. The members of the Harvard will claim no priority in the choice of seats. Further particulars shortly.

GENOA.—The great event of the musical season here this winter has been the opening of a new Concert room built for Professor Bossola and named by him "Sala Sivi," in honor of the illustrious violinist, Camillo Sivi, who is by birth a Genoese, and who gave his services on the present inaugural occasion. Two distinguished amateur vocalists, Signor Diaz de Soria and Signora Designore, lent their talent; and the Marchese d'Arcais delivered an introductory discourse on the cultivation of musical art. The programme selected by Maestro Bossola included Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor for violin and orchestra, admirably executed by Sivi and his instrumental assistants. The care with which this piece had been studied, and the delight with which its performance was received on the present occasion, may serve to prove that when classical pieces are chosen and well produced they give infinitely more pleasure than the trashy so-called music which is generally supposed to be more popular and attractive. The public taste is of a higher and more discriminating kind than is usually attributed to it; and we think that the attention with which this Concerto was listened to by a Genoese audience, and the applause it received from them, form marked evidences of the fact. The Marchese d'Arcais, in his discourse, took occasion to allude to the improvement visible in Genoese taste for sterling music; gracefully and graciously tracing one source of this improvement to the four years' series of classical concerts given at the house of a musical non-Italian resident in this beautiful city.

The fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh of Maestro Lavagnino's Classical Concerts, at the Villa Novello, took place on the 22nd and 29th of December, and the 5th and 12th of January; the sixth concert consisted of a second historical selection of compositions from ancient and modern Italian masters. The programme included Leonardo Leo's choral fugue "Kyrie eleison;" Alessandro Scarlatti's Arietta, "Deh! cessati;" Carissimi's Motet, "Gaudeamus;" Marcello's Psalm, "Qual anelante;" Lulli's air from "Alceste" (for Chæron), "Il faut passer dans ma barque;" duet and fugue from Pergolesi's Stabat Mater, "Vidit suum" and "Amen;" Guglielmi's Aria sancta, with clarinet obbligato, "Gratias agimus;" a jig and minuet, by Corelli and Geminiani, for violin and piano-forte; Cherubini's round for women's voices, "Perfida Clori;" Paisiello's terzetto buffo, from his "Barbiere di Siviglia," "Ma, dov'eri tu;" and Giordani's brindisi "Vivan tutte le Vezzose."—Lond. Mus. Times.

JENA.—The 13th ult. was the hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the Academic Concerts, which have succeeded each other uninterruptedly longer than any other concerts in Germany, always excepting the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipzig, the first of which was given one hundred and twenty-six years ago! In honor of the occasion, the Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach forwarded the Cross of the Order of the White Falcon, first class, to Dr. Carl Gille, managing director of the concerts, and the University presented him with the honorary diploma of Doctor of Philosophy. From Queen Augusta of Prussia Dr. Gille received the following letter:—"Taking, as I do take, so great an interest in everything that goes on in my country, I cannot refrain from expressing the sincere sympathy excited in my breast by the hundredth anniversary of the Academic Concerts in Jena, and, at the same time, from adding how much I appreciate the services which you, both as director for many years, of these concerts, and as chairman for the General Musical Association of Germany, have rendered to the cause of our national art. May you long be spared to labor for it as successfully as hitherto, and to receive the thanks of all those who are interested in its development. Berlin, 17th January, 1870. Augusta." Herr Neumann, who, for the last ten years, has acted most efficiently as the musical director of the concerts, received the gold Medal for Civil Merit, from the Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach. The programme of the hundredth concert comprised:—Symphony in A major, Ståde; Prologue, C. Dohm; "An die Künstler" (solos, chorus for male voices, and orchestra), Liszt; "Festival Overture," C. Lassen; Cantata, solos, chorus, and orchestra, C. Lassen; "Gaudeamus igitur," humorous piece, solos, chorus, and orchestra, Franz Liszt. The last three pieces were composed expressly for the anniversary. Some of the regulations laid down for the students taking part in the concerts a century ago are highly amusing, and served to give us an insight into what the student-life of the period must have been. One of the regulations, for instance, is, that no student shall appear in his dressing-gown or with curl papers in his hair, but in clean clothing and linen, and with his hair properly arranged, or with a wig. Another regulation requires the students "to be quiet and act in a becoming manner at the concert, and not make a noise, or get into disputes; the virī academici are prohibited from seeing any females home."

BORN.—The Musical library of the late Professor Otto Jahn is offered for sale. The price is fixed at ten thousand thalers.—Great preparations are being made to celebrate, becomingly, Beethoven's centenary, in August.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE. The programme for the Forty-Seventh Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine, which, as announced in last week's number of the Musical World, will take place here at Whitsuntide, under the direction of Herr Franz Lachner, is, at length, definitely settled. It will comprise, on the first day, Beethoven's Missa solennis and Sinfonia Eroica; on the second day, the same composer's grand "Leonore Overture," and Handel's Deborah; and, on the third day, a miscellaneous selection, vocal and instrumental.

ST. PETERSBURG. Herr Ferdinand Hiller conducted at the fifth concert of the Russian Musical Society. The following was the programme on the occasion: "Fingal's Cave Overture," Mendelssohn; Violin Concerto, Max Bruch (Herr Auber); Ferdinand Hiller's Overture to Schiller's tragedy of Demetrius; Adagio for Violin, Hiller; "Perpetuum mobile," Paganini (Herr F. Hiller and Auber); and Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, Beethoven. Herr Ferdinand Hiller was most warmly received and enthusiastically applauded.—Meyerbeer's Prophète was lately produced at the Russian Operahouse, Mlle. Lawrojsky particularly distinguishing herself as Fides.

EDINBURG. At the organ recital in the Music Class Room in Park Place, on Thursday, Professor Oakeley made the following remarks with reference to the performance of Bach's Instrumental compositions in England: "At the last organ performance here, said the Professor, allusion was made to the transcendent genius of Johann Sebastian Bach, as a choral composer, and to the neglect in England of his cantatas, oratorios, masses, and other vocal works, of which he has left so rich and rare a legacy. As an instrumental composer Bach is better known, but not really widely so, and chiefly by his great fugues for organ and harpsichord, or clavicord, instruments now represented by the modern pianoforte, and for his Suites de pieces pour Clavecin, compositions superseded by the sonata of modern times, consisting of a series of movements in the same key, entitled Sarabandes, Gavottes, Allemandes, Bourées, Courantes, and so on. His orchestral suites are very rarely performed, for the obvious reason that they were composed before the introduction of several instruments now in use, indeed before the true and manifold beauties of "orchestration" were discovered, or at all events developed. And it is to be regretted that some great modern master, Mendelssohn for instance, has not done for Bach what Mozart did for Handel in the way of additional instrumentation. Something, indeed, has been lately attempted in this way with regard to the accompaniments to a few of Bach's choral works, by one of Schumann's disciples, Robert Franz, whose labors have been successful, if we may judge from the fact of his added orchestral parts having been used at the two last Rhenish festivals—at Cologne, in 1868, when the superb Whitsuntide cantata was given, and at Düsseldorf last year, when the great "Magnificat" in D was performed, from which work excerpts shall be introduced here on some future occasion. Some of Bach's organ music has also been transcribed for orchestra by Esser, of Vienna, who has scored the Toccata and Fugue in F major, and the "Passacaglia," which I have heard at a garden-concert at Prague, to which the charge for admission was about threepence. And Franz Lachner, late Kapellmeister at Munich, introduced at the festival there in 1863 one of the Preludes and Fugues thus enriched by him, when the reception accorded to it was striking and memorable. It is, said the Professor, my intention to give one of these organ works, thus transcribed, at the Reid Concert next year. But the original orchestral score of Bach not only requires addition, but also alteration, as several instruments of his time are now out of use; for instance, the "violoncello piccolo," and the horns and oboes "di caccia," and indeed his obbligato employment of the trumpets presents much difficulty without modification. Thus then, the unfrequent performance of Bach's instrumental scores is accounted for, and has been already noticed; the chief obstacle in his vocal scores, besides their intrinsic difficulty, is the absence of a good or indeed any English text.—Choir.

Herr Bauernfeld's Reminiscences of Franz Schubert.*

The next morning I ran off to see how Schubert was, as the state in which I had left him occasioned me anxiety. I found him in bed, fast asleep, with his glasses on his head, as usual. Scattered about the room in wild confusion lay the clothes he had taken off the night before. On the writing table was a sheet of paper half covered with writing, and on it an ocean of ink from the inkstand that had been overturned. On the paper was written: "Two o'clock, p.m." Then came a few confused aphorisms, and bursts of excited feeling. There could be no doubt that he had penned them after the angry scene of the previous night. I noted down the astounding passage: "Oh, Nero, you are to be envied, because you were powerful enough to destroy disgusting people in the midst of song and melody."

I waited till he woke up. "Is that you?" he enquired, when he recognized me. Then pushing his glasses into their right place, he held out his hand with a friendly but almost confused smile. "Have you slept off your fit?" I said with a certain emphasis. "Pooh! nonsense!" he exclaimed, jumping out of bed with a loud laugh. I could not help referring to the scene. "What will people think of you," I asked with somewhat of a reproving air.

"The blackguards," he replied quietly and good-naturedly. "Don't you know that they are the most intriguing humbugs on the face of the earth? They are just the same with me as with others. They got what they deserved! I am sorry for it though, all the same. But I will write them the solos they want, and they will yet kiss my hand for it. I know their sort."—There is a bit of Schubert.

If, when he was excited by discussions on art, and by intoxicating drinks, the feeling of his own worth, compared to commonplace individuals, obtruded itself upon him more forcibly than would have been pleasing even to himself when sober, this only happened now and then, when he was in an exceptional mood. On other occasions, we never found poor Franz aught but amiable and retiring, most warmly devoted to his friends, as proved by the letters I have quoted, and willingly acknowledging any thing that others did, going for instance into ecstasies at every fresh specimen, however small, of the talent of our genial friend Schwind. For what was bad and preposterous, on the other hand, he entertained a feeling of downright hatred.

Schubert's mode of life was simple like himself. Every morning at nine o'clock, the Muse sought him, seldom leaving before two o'clock, and not till after presenting him with something valuable. When he had hit upon anything particularly excellent, he became more than usually good humored, and was the life and soul of all his set in the evening. But a man is not always merry! Though in certain things tolerably realistic, Schubert was not free from a touch of romantic exaltation. He fell, for instance, madly in love with one of his pupils, a young Countess Esterhazy, to whom he dedicated one of the most beautiful things he wrote for the piano, the Four-handed Fantasia in F minor. Besides visiting the house of the young lady's father to give lessons, he sometimes went there under the protection of his patron, Vogl, the singer, who associated with princes and counts as with his equals, always talked very grandly and, when he had the genial composer under his wings, behaved like the keeper of a menagerie, with some peculiar farity from the animal kingdom to exhibit.

* From the "Presse" (Vienna). Translated for the "London Musical World."

Schubert was not averse, on such occasions, to be left in the background, for he could then devote all his attention to his adored pupil, and drive Love's dart still deeper in his heart. For a lyric poet as well as for a composer, an unhappy passion, if not too unhappy, is, perhaps, an advantage, since it increases a subjective sentiment, and imparts to the poems and songs springing from it, a color and tone of the most beautiful reality. Productions such as the "Beiden Suleika," the "Zürnende Diana," a great deal of the "Müllerlieder," and the "Winterreise," all musical confessions, steeped in fervor of true and profound passion, are purified and refined as genuine artistic works in the most beautiful form, proceeding from the gentle heart of the enamored writer. In Schubert, however, there slumbered a double nature. The Austrian element, coarse and sensual, was evident in it as well as art. New and fresh melodies, together with harmonies and rhythms gushed in endless abundance from his richly gifted mind, but they not unfrequently bore signs of having emanated from the soil so rich in tradition from which the composer himself had sprung—though this is far from being meant as a reproach! Just as the folk's song generally is the foundation of opera, so must also both the songs and operas of a nation be formed and developed in accordance with its peculiar musical susceptibility. I need only mention Rossini, Auber, and Weber, and refer to the widely different course pursued by the operas of various nationalities. The Italian barcarole, and the French song and romance have retained as a rule their stereotype form; the German Lied, however, appears capable of endless extension. At first, it was a simple song with strophes, as with Reichardt and Zelter. Zumsteeg, subsequently brought the carefully composed ballad into vogue and this lasted till Schubert created his short lyric dramas of the soul. It is true that since that time the German Lied has made no further progress of importance, [?] for, though we cannot think lightly of the purely artistic, noble, and poetic form, with which Mendelssohn invested it, yet with this master, invention, the original and creative element, does not go hand in hand with acquirements and artistic development. With Schubert, on the contrary, there is much to blame in the form, and in the musical treatment, as well as in the fresh melodies themselves. The last are sometimes too national, too Austrian, and remind us of folk's tunes, the somewhat low handling and disagreeable rhythm of which do not quite justify their forcing themselves into a poetical Lied. On this subject we had occasionally discussions with Master Franz, as for instance, when we attempted to prove to him that certain passages in the "Müllerlieder" reminded the hearer of an old Austrian Grenadier-march and tattle, or of Wenzel Müllers: "Wer niemals einen Rausch hat g'habt."—He either grew seriously angry at such petty irritating criticism, or laughed at us and said: "What do you fellows know about it? So it is and so it should be!"—But so it should not be; that is to say: he was bound not to write simply as gushing high spirit and undeveloped youth dictated, and in his later and more mature productions there are none of the student-like, trivial motives to which we objected.

But if, in social intercourse as well as in art, the Austrian character was sometimes rather too uproariously manifested in Schubert, as a young fellow full of life and high spirits, on other occasions the demon of melancholy and sorrow overshadowed him with its dark wings—though it was certainly not altogether a bad spirit, since in the sombre hours of its visitations it frequently suggested to him some of his most painfully beautiful songs. But the combat between a wild roistering life and incessant mental activity is always exhausting, if there is no proper equilibrium in the soul. In our friend's case, there was, however, an ideal passion at work, refining, restraining, and compensating, and we may regard the Countess Caroline as his visible and beneficent Muse; as the Leonora of this musical Tasso.

The same thing happened to Master Franz that happens to all other German composers: as long as he lived he was sighing for a really good libretto. It is true he had completed some operas, such as Alphons und Estrella, and Fierrabras, as well as the operetta, Der häusliche Krieg, which, some thirty years later was produced and created a furore, but, in consequence of the indifference of managers for what is poetical and really beautiful, soon disappeared from the bills, because it—did not suit manager's pockets to employ first-rate artists in such a trifle. Schubert had long begged me among the rest to write him a libretto. I passed the spring and summer of 1826 with a friend in the Carinthian mountains. On cold and rainy days I arranged the legend of the Count of Gleichen as the subject for an opera, and wrote to apprise Schubert of the fact. He was not long answering. The letter addressed to both friends, though strange to say I alone am apostrophized throughout,* runs as follows:—

"My dear Bauernfeld,

"My dear Mayerhofer,

"That you should write the opera was a very sensible proceeding on your part, but I wish I saw it before me. I have been asked for my opera books, to see what could be done with them. If your libretto were quite ready I might show the people that, and, when it was approved, for I have no doubts as to its value, I might begin on it in Heaven's name, or send it to the Milder at Berlin. Mlle. Schechner has appeared here in Die Schweizer Familie, and been extraordinarily successful. As there is great similarity between her and the Milder, she may do for us.

"Do not remain away too long; it is very melancholy and miserable here. The spirit of weariness has made too much progress. From Schober and Schwind one hears nothing but lamentations, which are far more heart-rending than those we heard in Passion Week.—I have scarcely been to Grinzing once since you left, and with Schwind not at all." (Here follow one or two allusions of a private nature, and not suited for publication). "Out of all this you may do a nice little division-sum in jollity. Die Zauberflöte has been performed very well at the Theater an der Wien. Der Freischütz, at the Imperial Kärnthner-Theater, very badly. Herr Jacob and Mad. Babers in the Leopoldstadt, unsurpassable. Your poetry published in the Modezeitung (I do not know to what poetry he refers) "is very beautiful, but that in your last letter is more so. The elevated jollity and comic sublimity, and the particularly tender outcry of pain at the end, where you bring in the good town of Willach—ah—ah—in a masterly manner, place it among the finest specimens of this kind of composition" (I had written a kind of parody: Die Lustigen in Willach, describing our bucolic life among country people, stewards, gamekeepers, clergymen, and their fair cooks). "I am not working at all.—The weather here is really fearful; the Almighty appears to have deserted us entirely; the sun will never shine even for a moment. It is May, and you cannot sit out in a garden. Fearful! Terrible! Horrible! For me it is the most cruel state of things possible. Schwind and I want to go in June with "Spaun" (afterwards Hofrath, and my official superior) "to Linz. We can meet there or in Gmunden, only let us know for certain—as soon as possible. Don't wait two months first. Farewell!"

* This has reference to the use of the second person singular in the original, a nicety, to be rendered in English only by an equivalent, and not by "Thou," "Thee," etc., which, thus employed, are un-English, a fact that has not appeared to strike a great many very estimable individuals who—with the help of a dictionary—are in the habit of translating from French and other foreign tongues. These worthy persons do not seem aware that what is an "idiotism," as the French say, in one language, may, in another, become an idiotism, which is a very different thing.—J. V. B.

Thus ends the epistle. He was so absent he had forgotten to sign it. It is, by the way, the only letter I possess from Schubert to myself. The rest, as well as letters from Raupach, Zimmermann, Tieck, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, and other deceased celebrities, have fallen into the hands of the confounded autograph-collectors, who are never tired of asking for a specimen.

Amateur Musical Societies in Philadelphia.

It is now thirty-five years since the Maennerchor, the oldest German singing society in the United States, was founded in Philadelphia, by Philip Wolsieffer. The germ then planted has borne rich fruit. The little chorus consisted of about a dozen gentlemen. There are now some twenty societies, with 750 members, without including the passive members, who far outnumber the singers.

With the growth of the German population, and its constant craving for social enjoyment, such a result was inevitable. In the Quaker City, as elsewhere, the meeting-places of these societies are, in effect, club-rooms. The larger and more wealthy organizations give an annual ball, the preparations for which absorb much of their energy. They do but little singing outside of their club-rooms; rarely give a concert, unless in aid of some charity, and are never very much in earnest, in a musical sense, except when preparing for the prize concert at some Saengerfest. Festive gatherings at which jollity is always the chief aim, whether the music be excellent or otherwise, may contribute to the pleasures of those who participate in them, but it is not so clear that they accomplish much in the service of art. It is, perhaps, owing to the frequent sacrifice of Orpheus to Gambrinus that the German singers of Philadelphia have achieved less than they might have done. With a few honorable exceptions, the societies show but little evidence of a desire to improve.

Another circumstance unfavorable to their progress is that most of them possess no female members, and are thus debarred from attempting the larger compositions which are written for a mixed chorus. In spite of these drawbacks, the Junger-Maennerchor (an offshoot of the Maennerchor) and the Saengerbund have been so well trained as to prove very formidable competitors of the New York Liederkrantz, as the prize concert during the Baltimore Saengerfest fully proved.

Of the American societies, the first in order, as regards age or numbers, is the Handel and Haydn. It is under the leadership of Mr. L. Engelke, and gives some three or four concerts during the season. Whether it be owing to a lack of interest on the part of the public, or carelessness on the part of its members, it seems to have lost prestige. Even in its best days it never did anything very creditable, except in affording its audiences an opportunity to hear Parepa, and various other artists of acknowledged ability, in oratorio.

Their concerts might have been made more interesting if Philadelphia only had a good, or even a tolerable orchestra. With numerous clever instrumental performers, there is no permanent orchestral organization capable of giving a satisfactory recital of a symphony. The Philharmonic of New York has attained a degree of proficiency which it were unreasonable to seek here, and the playing of Theodore Thomas's orchestra came as a revelation, since which Philadelphians are painfully alive to their want of a good band.

The Mendelssohn Society, of which Mr. Jean Louis is conductor, is a younger organization, and, at one time, enjoyed great esteem. Why it, as failed of success can be best answered by its own members. Even a good leader can accomplish but little when singers neglect rehearsals. Mr. Ritter's wail has been heard throughout the land, and there are many chorus-directors who sympathize with him.

Perhaps the most successful of all is the West Philadelphia Choral Society. It numbers about 120 ladies and gentlemen, and is directed by Mr. Peirson, an amateur of decided ability. It has given but one concert, to an invited audience, and, for its numbers, is acknowledged to be the best chorus in the city.

The Abt Society, of which Mr. A. R. Taylor is leader, numbers twenty-six gentlemen, who, it is presumed, are in earnest, since they resolutely enforce the rule that all who neglect rehearsals must be dropped. As a result this little society offers the best male chorus in Philadelphia. It gives monthly concerts to its subscribers and invited guests.

The youngest of the sisterhood is the Beethoven Society, with Mr. Carl Wolfsohn as its conductor. It is a mixed chorus, numbering some eighty members. Aside from the study of chorus singing, the society aims at the creation of a Beethoven Stipendium, with the object of defraying the expense of a musical education for students who have talent and yet cannot afford to pay for instruction—a noble aim, truly, and one in which it deserves to succeed. Whether it is intended to give concerts we are as yet unable to say.

The Vocal Union, led by Mr. Wolsieffer, is a male chorus, numbering about as many members as the Abt Society.

Finally, there is the Amphion Club, which, although a social organization, devotes one or two evenings of every week to music. It also gives concerts with light, pleasing programmes. At these performances, which are always delightful reunions, there are very considerable re-enforcements of outsiders, without whose aid the concerts would be noticeable rather as social than artistic successes.

Among Philadelphia amateurs, there are many of great proficiency who cheerfully contribute to the success of the societies already established. Musical life is active enough, and musical circles are, in this country at least, nowhere more charming. The great need, however, is the presence of some one possessing the musical knowledge and the administrative ability required to combine forces, which are, at present, too much divided to accomplish anything very remarkable.

To the Editor of the Nation:

SIR:—Allow me to add to your list of musical enterprises in Philadelphia a mention of the series of "Parlor Concerts," for the performance of strictly classical music, by a string quartet club, under the direction of Miss Jackson, pianiste.

Begun twenty years ago, as private entertainments at the residences of twenty subscribers, the receipts all devoted to the improvement of the performances, these concerts (still under the same rule) have for the last two seasons been given in a public hall to growing audiences. Through Mme. Seiler (known in musical circles from her work on "The Voice in Singing") and the composer David, Miss Jackson was enabled to secure in Germany, in 1868, the services of Mr. G. Guhlfemann, a graduate of the Leipzig Conservatory, as conductor.

We are modest, you know, in the presence of New York, but the degree of proficiency to which he has brought the quintet is said by competent judges to be such that even Mr. Thomas's orchestra surpasses it in numbers only. And in the interest of musical art everywhere, it may not be unpleasant to add that it is planned that equality in this particular, also, shall be duly reached.

Philadelphia, February 14, 1870.

"Chilperic."

We have all heard of the man whose last state, owing to an increase in the number and wickedness of the evil spirits within him, was worse than his first. At the beginning that miserable person was tenanted by only one devil; but the one, being gregarious and liking the quarters, took seven others of a worse class, and made an infernal party. The narrative illustrates much. It has even a musical application, and to this we turn at once, foregoing all the obvious moralizing upon the easy descent of Avernus, &c., which the general subject invites.

There was a time when the man aforesaid had no devil; and there was, also, a time when society knew not Offenbach. Society may have been, even then, far from musically pure, but—it knew not Offenbach. That is to say, it was free from the influence of one who, by uniting a certain form of art with positive absurdity and comparative indecency, not only degrades art in all its forms, but makes it attractive in its degradation. So far the past had the advantage of the present. M. Offenbach is with us; his music is heard in all our public places (streets included), and Schneider is his prophetic. If the mischief were sure to end, as it began, with M. Offenbach, there would be less cause for crying out, "Life is short and art is long;" and the art of music may survive the life of M. Offenbach. But mischief has always extraordinary vitality. When one devil gains an entrance, seven others are pretty sure to follow. It was a foregone conclusion, therefore, that Offenbach, in possession and flourishing, would attract others more or less unto himself. The result has borne out the conclusion. We have at all events, M. Hervé.

The question arises here, in what respect M. Hervé resembles his prototype. We answer,—In so far as he is unlike Offenbach, he is worse than Offenbach. The latter must be considered a genius in his way. At any rate he possesses the uncommon faculty of knowing what he can do, and sticking to it. There are rumors that, just as Mr. Buckstone is said to consider himself a great tragic actor spoiled by an erratic Fate, so M. Offenbach longs to appear in the character of a serious composer. We shall believe these rumors when they are verified, and not before. There is nothing in the man's works to show that he is in danger of mistaking his role, and of producing music worthy a musician's serious consideration. M. Offenbach will, doubtless, remain content to pipe that Folly may dance; and to derive his chief inspiration from Eros. So far, we have a certain respect for him. Moreover—and this increases our respect—he mixes only a low form of art with the other ingredients of an Offenbachian cup. He wears his colors (motley) on his sleeve, without seeking to hide them underneath the classic toga. Now let us turn to M. Hervé. This gentleman also comes to us hand-in-hand with Folly; but, judging from some portions of Chilperic, he is not content simply to make folks laugh with (and at) him. He would ape the grand seigneur of music. He would take flight now and then, heedless of Icarus, into the pure atmosphere of high art. Hence there are passages in his music, the intention of which is obvious, and which jar strangely with the buffoonery of their surroundings. Against this development of Offenbachism it is needful to protest, because the precedent may be followed; and there may arise a man both willing and able—which M. Hervé is not—to command the union of high art and folly. Heaven forefend this issue. We have no objection to Pan's pipes when the show is Punch and Judy; but it would be an incongruous thing for the hero of our peripatetic drama, to thrash his wife to the strains of Beethoven. Here, then, is something to be done: When M. Hervé or anybody else, lifts his hand to drag real art down to the level of opera-bouffe, rap his knuckles.

Against opera-bouffe, pure and simple, we shall not preach, any more than we shall criticize its music. When M. Hervé, in Chilperic, is not ambitious, his lively strains help to laughter; and after all nonsense has its use. Nonsense has, also, its sphere—to which it should be kept.—London Mus. World.

Position of Instruments in the Orchestra.

Another attempt to solve that difficult question, the best position of the various orchestral forces in the concert-room orchestra, has been recently made at the Crystal Palace by Mr. Manns, whose new arrangement displays so much artistic forethought as to merit in this place a short description. The prime idea seems to have been the collection of all the bass instruments, with the exception of the bass trombone and ophicleide, in a compact central mass, so as to form a solid pivot of foundation tone, and to secure in the slowly vibrating, deep-toned instruments greater readiness of attack, by bringing the whole of the bass masses directly under the conductor's baton.—The wind instruments Mr. Manns places on his left, with the exception of the trombones and euphonium; a feature which may be commended as enabling the director with his disengaged hand to indicate the points of entrance to this section of his forces.

The reeds are placed in fours, with the lowest toned instruments towards the centre, in accordance with the prime idea of the scheme, that of centralizing the bass tone. The grouping of this department is thoughtful, and in accordance with the general scoring principals of the great masters. The flutes and clarinets are in the front line of the wind; the double-reed instruments, the oboes and bassoons, come next and to the rear of these are stationed the four horns, at the back of which, lastly, but verging towards the centre, are the trumpets or cornets. To our fancy a slight defect in the scheme is the isolated position of the trombones and euphonium, which, placed at the back of the orchestra to the conductor's right, retain their old and usual position in the concert-room. The result occasionally is that the trombone tone passes through the mass of strings in front in raw gusts of sound, in consequence of being too far from the modifying influence of the horn tone. Another disadvantage in this disposition of the orchestral force is the spreading out of the mass of violins to the extreme edges of the orchestra, the first to the left of the conductor, and the second to his right. In passages in which the violins work together in thirds or sixths, as in the accompaniments to Handel's "For unto us a Child is born," this arrangement must result in a direct loss of sympathy. There is also an important feature in modern orchestral music, the employment of the mass of violoncellos in broad melodies, which Mr. Mann's plan does not appear to have taken account of. In some of the Continental orchestras the violoncellos are massed together, and all the contrabasses are placed in close proximity; by this arrangement the old method of setting one violoncello and a contrabass to play from the same copy is avoided, and the violoncellos, gaining greater unanimity of attack and solidarity of tone, produce a more passionate and penetrating effect. In the performances of one of Handel's oratorios we should, of course, advocate the old method of placing the basses two and two. The best position for the different orchestral masses has probably still to be found; and as the instrumentalists cannot, like the companies of a regiment, be ordered to the front by turns as required, there will always be drawbacks to set against any gains which may be obtained by change.—Musican, for February.

Mr. Fechter at the Boston Theatre.

(Transcript, March 23.)

MR. FECHTER'S HAMLET has more vitality than any seen in Boston since the elder Booth's. He labors under the disadvantage of a French accent. He is not always correct in the text. He is not sensitive to the rhythm of Shakespeare's blank verse. We doubt whether his characterization of Hamlet is not rather passionate realism than the highest impassioned and imaginative identification. In all the relations of the character to the unreal and supernatural, where the elder Booth's conception had the imaginative lift and infinite suggestiveness of one of Turner's greatest landscapes, Mr. Fechter's has a sharply-defined and narrow horizon. Booth's had more breadth and subtlety, while he was also profoundly in earnest.

But Mr. Fechter has what neither the scholarly Macready nor the fascinating younger Booth has had—a vital, central conception of the character. It may be right, or it may be wrong, but it is so thoroughly realized that his individuality is lost in Hamlet's, and that all details of representation take vital relations to his essential nature. Mr. Macready's Hamlet was an admirable collection of thoughtful readings. Edwin Booth's is another collection, less thoughtful and less valuable, but with all the charms of youth, of beauty, and of fine declamatory elocution. Each has lacked central grasp and imaginative embodiment of character. They studied Hamlet externally and "played the inference." The consequence is that they have thrown new light on particular passages, and that we are indebted to both for their conscientious study of all the stage accessories of the play and for a certain even excellence of representation. But the studied and artificial have been apparent in walk, look, speech and action. Each played the part, instead of being the man.

An intelligent person would not know, after hearing Edwin Booth, whether he thought Hamlet sane or insane, or on the border land between. Mr. Fechter leaves no room for doubt. He believes the madness entirely feigned. He knows that melancholy affects different temperaments differently. He believes that Hamlet's was active, alert, energetic, varying. He can infer nothing else from the play. He therefore sees nothing inconsistent with a deep melancholy in all the natural variety of manifestation of such a temperament. And there is none.

But we imagine that Mr. Fechter's idea of Hamlet strikes deeper. It had always seemed to us that though a Richard would not in Hamlet's place have hesitated, no man of great executive faculty, who had a conscience, placed in those circumstances, could have failed to doubt what was his duty. Hamlet was asked by a mere ghost, with additional shadowy and doubtful circumstantial evidence, to commit a murder. His justification would have been insufficient before any human court, or before heaven. And the very ghost who urges him to revenge, still has such affection for his late faithless and wretched wife that he checks the execution of revenge itself by his tender care for her. It is a wide open question, but it has always seemed to us that if Hamlet had had a clear, simple and sufficient duty, and a work to be done vast and complex, he would have shown more executive faculty than Richard, from the very fact that he was his superior in intellect and had a conscience.

Whether Mr Fechter is right or wrong, he is thoroughly in earnest. He so realizes the character that the details and externals of his acting are to be interpreted in the light of his conception. Little things take care of themselves. He strikes through forms and conventionalities to the fact and the thing. He magnetizes all he touches. His Hamlet should be heard two or three times, that it may have justice, and then, the relation between himself and his hearer being once established, he triumphs over accent, over the occasional sing-song of French verse, over occasional wrong to English rhythm, over all stage traditions, and electrifies his audience by overwhelming earnestness and reality. His action is more vitally graceful and picturesque than that of any English or American tragedian. It seems "the unbought grace of nature."

Because he plays in melodrama, we expected melodramatic action in his Hamlet, but we did not find it. He plays Macbeth, Othello and Iago as well as Ruy Blas. His Othello, though a wider departure from English tradition than any of his characters, was a success in London, and his Iago was played there to crowded houses for some fifty nights....

Mr. Fechter's father was a German sculptor. His mother was French. He was born in England, whence he left with his father for Paris when twelve years old. He had the early training of a sculptor before he was an actor. Before he had played three times at the Theatre Français, Rachel detected his talent, and he very soon was selected by her as her leading supporter. Ten years ago he went to England for his health, with no thought of acting, was induced to recover the language, played first in "Ruy Blas" and then in "Hamlet," of which he had long been a student, and at once took the high place which he has easily maintained to this day.

Of MR. FECHTER'S RUY BLAS there is no occasion to say much, unless we indulge in reiterations of admiring praise; for after commenting at length on his genius, fine qualities and peculiarities as an artist, it is only of the application of these to a new character that we have left ourselves anything to say. The justifiable anticipations, from all we had heard and seen of him, of a performance of finished beauty, subtle delineation of changeable feelings, intense passion, startling magnetic force, and that indescribable softening and blending something which, for want of a more definite term, we call picturesqueness, were in no whit disappointed.

In quiet dignity and ease of bearing at the outset; in the conflict of pride and self-respect with shame and contempt for his menial condition; in the warmth of friendship; in the transfiguration wrought by a pure, ennobling, but hopeless love; in integrity of soul as he was exalted to office; in the grand self-abnegation and self-sacrifice, wherein his worshipping affection found its reward; and in his vehement scorn and retributory vengeance and tragic death—in all this, and by all this, was shown the conceiving, creating and executive power of a mind, a heart and an imagination equal to the highest demands upon dramatic ability.

Passing by the thoroughly artistic use made of inviting "situations"; the special scenes of struggles with contending emotions; the exquisite tenderness, delicacy and warmth of the confession in look and act of a reverent love; and the terrific outbursts of judicial scorn and anger, nothing strained, nothing overdone—passing by these details, most impressive was the progress and keeping of the whole; the growth that developed character rather than plot, until the climax of heart-broken misery was reached, to be mercifully shadowed and ended by heroic death. Out of the poverty or the mere suggestive hints of a meagre and unnatural romantic drama, Mr. Fechter, as Ruy Blas, incarnated a great nature, and gave to that nature a fulness of utterance and a triumphant expression; thus making it for all who saw him a living and individualized reality.

Of Marianne, it may be said that Miss Leclercq added to the repute she won last week by her Ophelia, and gave evidence of painstaking correctness, graceful bearing and capacity for quite thrilling expression of strong emotions, and maiden delicacy whilst yielding unconsciously to the irresistible impulses of the heart, asserting their rightful superiority to artificial restraints. Mr. Bangs as Don Salluste gave more than a fair support to the principals, and in the earlier portions of the play was quite up to the cool, intriguing and vindictive villany.—Ibid.

MR. FECHTER'S CLAUDE MELNOTTE. We have heretofore expressed such sincere respect and admiration for Mr. Fechter's genius, that we shall be rightly understood when we indulge the hope that Saturday will give us his last performance of Claude Melnotte in Boston. Though he is still in the prime of manhood, he is twenty years too old for the part. The first three acts have been better played in Boston by actors with but a tithe of his talent. And it is only because the last two acts give him a few opportunities for that intensity of realization in which he stands alone upon the English stage, that this sentimental boys' and girls' play did not drop dead at his feet. As it was, they electrified the audience into forgetfulness that an actor who can illumine Hamlet, Iago and Othello, only inadequately interpreted the "Lady of Lyons."

"Ruy Blas" is, to be sure, a melodrama. His treatment of that is occasionally a little too "continental" for English and American taste. But it is all alive with language and situations for his special genius for passionate realism and intensity, and in it he is all aglow and radiant with a love respectful, delicate, chivalrous, manly, intense. Every word of Ruy Blas leaps naturally from his own lips and nature. Not half of the language of his part last night was worthy of him, and he, for just that reason, was unfit for it. A man who has no superior in Hamlet, Iago and Ruy Blas should not in justice to his own genius and its admirers place himself in doubtful competition with the sentimental boy lovers of the stage.

We should not speak thus plainly did we not regard this part as one for which he is not only in a great degree fortunately unfitted, but as one which is utterly unworthy of his talents. Whether he plays tragedy or melodrama, we have a right to ask for his own sake as well as ours, that it shall be a play which shall give some scope to the variety and intensity of his nature.

These words will not lessen his Saturday's audience, which is sure to be great, and to be electrified by those touches of nature and bursts of power for which the play gives him some opportunities.—Ibid.

(From the Advertiser, March 3.)

We cannot see that Mr. Fechter fails in any particular to realize the best and the noblest conception of Claude. He is admirable in the sensitive and frank manliness of his peasant life; in his easy refinement and delicate humor, when he counterfeits the Italian Prince, he far surpasses other representatives of the character; and in the beautiful courtesy and chivalrous bearing which mark his intercourse and encounter with Colonel Damas, his acting is beyond praise. In delineating the passion of love, the quality of his performance here, as in "Ruy Blas," can be judged only by comparing its different parts with each other; for he has neither equal nor rival in this field where the last and highest test of histrionic skill is applied. Whether it be in the time of his expectancy, in the period of his complete but self-loathed triumph, in the hour of his humiliation and shame, or in the day of final anxiety and triumph, this wonderful love burns with flaming, almost with awful, intensity, proving its reality in its hope, in its despair, in its abnegation of self, and in its constancy; and its aspiration, its tenderness, its self-sacrifice and its trust, have always the same vividness and fire and the same almost sacramental purity and solemnity. In the stronger and fiercer aspects of the character his power is as great and magnetic as ever, and, as always, is pervaded by the suggestion of a reserve of force which is not used; and, as a consequence, it never falls into the feebleness of frenzy when it means to be only intense. The scene which was, perhaps, the best and most thrilling feature of the whole performance illustrated this idea admirably. It is in the third act, where he turns upon Beausant and Glavis and warns them on their peril not to insult his unhappy wife or his own wretchedness any further. We scarcely remember a more thrilling effect upon the stage, than that produced last night by his utterance of the words, "Away with you," when he first turns upon his tormentors. It was like a sudden flash of lightning, full of terrible warning and danger; but it had the same mark of reserved power. And in the fierce denunciation which follows, even when, with an action new to our stage, he forced Beausant to kneel and pick up the rejected purse of gold, in the very torrent, tempest and whirlwind of his passion he never lost this imposing self control.

Miss Leclercq's Pauline was magnificent in parts, and, as a whole, was unexceptionable in its excellence. We cannot give it higher praise than to say that in many scenes she fairly divided the honors with Mr. Fechter. . . .

The impression made upon the very large and cultivated audience was, for Boston, and in view of the character of the assemblage, entirely unprecedented. Mr. Fechter and Miss Leclercq were four times called before the curtain and were greeted with excited cheers. We have seldom seen such an audience so thrown out of its usual state of calmness and self-possession. The wildest and most demonstrative enthusiasm, however, may well be pardoned in the presence of such an actor, and of an impersonation so real, so vivid, so beautiful and so expressive.

(From the Springfield Republican, March 5.)

Boston gave the severest test of Fechter that he is likely to meet with in America. A Boston audience is proverbially critical; and in that city Edwin Booth is a favorite with everybody, from the arctic heights of Beacon hill, and the Elysian fields along the Milldam and beyond the Public garden, to the dwellers in Mesopotamian Dorchester and beside the suburban waters of Roxbury Ditch. Fechter did not come to a vacant throne, not to the perpetual anarchy of New York, but to a loyal Bostonian vassalage, who gloried in Booth as Evan Dhu did in Vich Ian Vohr. For all that, Fechter came, was seen and conquered; a few of the connoisseurs, like Mrs. Howe, who is committed in lyric verse to the praises of Booth, still hold out; but even these are too just to deny that Fechter is a great realistic artist. Mrs. Howe says indeed, and with truth, that he is not an ideal actor, as Rachel was, but stands, rather, on the lower level of Ristori. And the grizzled connoisseurs who cherish the memory of the elder Booth, add that he, too, rose above Fechter in the power of idealizing his characters; and this, whether true or not, cannot be disputed, for who can compare what now is, with what is only a thrilling and gracious reminiscence? which is all that remains.

After a well-graded actor leaves the stage.

Fechter has now played in Boston his Hamlet repeatedly, his Ruy Blas more than once, and has even placed his burly and grand personation behind the thin frame of Bulwer's melo-dramatic Claude Melnotte. Of his Hamlet our correspondent has sufficiently spoken: it was a revelation to Boston as it is to all audiences who see it for the first time, even if prepared by the descriptions of Dickens and the diluted critiques of the New York newspapers. His Ruy Blas is entirely different—the impersonation of passion and the sentiment of love, combined in their highest expression. His Claude Melnotte is a personage heroic and human, in spite of all that Bulwer could do, in the most superficial period of his intellectual career, to make the character false and insipid. Of his other parts we need not speak, for these alone would have been sufficient to demonstrate his genius.

It must not be forgotten, however that Fechter comes here with a whole suite of characters, distinct and different from those which he has yet played in America. Born in England of a German father and a French mother, he was educated in Paris, where his father was an artist, and took lessons and prizes in drawing, while he was practicing in the classes at the Theatre Français and winning his first glories of an actor in the sight of Rachel. This was twenty years ago and more; and, as is well known, he became the choice of Rachel to support her in her leading parts. In this way he held the stage of the greatest theatre in the world, and was the favorite of Paris in many comic and tragic and melo-dramatic characters before he visited England, and gradually gained the same or greater renown in London. His declamation shows the traces of this mixed descent and familiarity with several spoken languages. It is said that he does not speak German, though it was his father's native tongue; but a German broadness mingles with the French intonation of his English. Claude Melnotte calls his love "Poh-line," speaks of "dorchees" to light her way, the "glaim" of another to her hand, and he wails the destruction of his own "choys." These are German blemishes in his recitation, not French ones; while the light and even accentuation of his periods and lines of verse is pure Parisian, and as remote as possible from the marked emphasis of English declamation. One needs to get accustomed to this: then he finds in it the sort of charm that we notice in Agassiz's pronunciation; though, of course, Fechter's voice is much more trained than Agassiz's. The advantage this French elocution gives him is to free him at once from the detestable rant and mouthiness of the English and American stage; and in this respect his playing will be a lesson to our actors. They may also take a hint from the care with which he has himself supported; insisting that the subordinate parts shall be well played, and that every actor shall deal conscientiously with the audience.

Everybody who can should see Fechter, and more than once too. Although Emerson, in his new volume of essays, omits acting from his list of the fine arts, it is one of them, and in its perfection one of the highest. Its pleasures are transitory as compared with poetry or painting or even music, but they are the result of grand powers, gracefully exercised for the illustration of human life. So long as men and women continue to take an interest in human nature and in human history, the stage will continue to attract them, and, when filled by such artists as Fechter, it teaches grandly, while giving a pleasure which is neither trivial nor ignoble. Johnson said of Garrick that his death had "eclipsed the gaiety of nations." The continued career of Fechter brightens and instructs audiences to which Garrick's were but as village assemblies.

A German on the Social Position of Musicians.*

The most varied opinions prevail regarding the position musicians occupy in society, what position they are justified in occupying, and in what way they should strive to achieve, and maintain it; every opinion is founded upon a different view of the subject; each claims to be the correct one; and each contains as great an amount of truth as of error. Good society affirms that it welcomes most cordially every musician worth anything; that it receives him on a footing of perfect equality, and that, even though he may not be very celebrated or particularly gifted, still, as an artist honorably striving to do his best, he may reckon upon a most friendly reception; that, among leading musicians, only the presumptuous and arrogant, and also, such as combine insignificant productions with grand pretensions, find themselves slighted and humbled; but that their dissatisfaction is not the result of the treatment with which they meet, but of the too high opinion they entertain of themselves, an opinion which prevents them from obtaining a clear idea of their positions and their rights. We hear, on the other hand, reproaches against good society and its caprices; it is charged with patronizing only artists of great talent who have already attained a reputation with the public, and no longer require the patronage of individuals, or the marks of honor bestowed by them; that, among second-rate artists, the most friendly reception is by no means accorded to those striving honorably to achieve great things, but to those who understand how to gain the favor of the leading or the rich members of society, and that it is utterly incomprehensible how many who have never been known to produce aught of importance meet with so much favor, and are admitted into the best circles, while others, who enjoy a higher reputation, are left unnoticed. These opinions find an echo among artists themselves, according to their respective positions and circumstances. Among the great and celebrated who are honored and esteemed, some entertain the honorable and sound belief, that they owe exclusively to sincere and general enthusiasm for art the marks of distinction which they receive; others are pleased that they, as individuals, should mix in high society and be made the object of its attentions; that is sufficient for their ambition, and all other questions are a matter of indifference to them. Second-rate musicians, of course, judge general social relations according to the places assigned in those relations to themselves. The composer or virtuoso who is often invited to dinner or to an evening party, by her Excellence the Countess of So-and-So, or by Mme. la Comtesse merzienrath Three-Stars, and introduced to their acquaintances, feels perfectly charmed by the amiability of such society, and cannot, or will not, comprehend how any one can doubt the sincere love of art entertained by its members, and their profound intelligence; but the artist, on the other hand, whom they do not invite and recommend, is filled with resentment, and allows himself not unfrequently to indulge in lamentations and tirades, which might subject him to the suspicion of calling the grapes sour, because they hang beyond his reach. Yet, both praise and complaint are justifiable, only they are not properly meted out and applied; they are founded partially upon false assumptions, and these give rise to the incorrect conclusions and opinions formed.

If we consider carefully the relations of musicians to Society, and their respective influence upon each other, we shall find that, on the one hand, Society is far from deserving the reproaches directed against it by those musicians who feel themselves aggrieved, but that, on the other hand, it ought to be the mission of artists of eminence to assist and maintain the freedom and independence of their position more than they hitherto have done, because they are the only persons who can do so.

In former times, the patronage and encouragement accorded to art proceeded—and in the case of music, exclusively—from the higher classes. The nobility of South Germany cultivated music with assiduity, and many families maintained private musical establishments (Kapellen) of their own; it was the members of this aristocracy that subscribed to concerts, which were never got up unless a subscription had been previously opened. The history of the greatest composers shows that the patronage of the nobility exercised the greatest influence upon their career—it proves to any one who considers the question attentively that Haydn, who conformed cheerfully to every turn of fate, and was so modest and amiable, enjoyed in a high degree the patronage of the aristocracy, while the independent Mozart, who looked the world more boldly in the face, is always complaining, in his letters, that he has to worry himself to no purpose. Beethoven was the first who ventured to place himself on an equality with the aristocracy; he succeeded, because a man so grandly endowed by nature could not fail to take the upper hand; how far the little word "van," which, before the decision of the Landesgericht,† was regarded as a predicate of nobility, contributed to the fact that the highest aristocracy treated him with such great consideration, and even put up with his outbursts of temper, is something to which we may here cursorily refer—that many members of this same aristocracy were sincere admirers and thorough judges of music; and that they would have recognized Beethoven as a great genius, even had he not come before them as "van Beethoven," are facts that cannot be contested; but it is equally impossible to deny that in a country where there existed a separate tribunal for cases affecting persons of noble birth, the fact that the great musical genius was of (supposed) noble descent, must have exercised at first a very great influence upon his social relations.

In North Germany, matters always were a very different aspect. The higher classes there had far less influence upon the intellectual development of the nation, and scarcely troubled themselves about music at all. Even the example of the great Frederick, who cultivated music—in his own way it is true—honoring art and artists, found no imitators among the aristocracy. The middle classes have been from the middle of the last century, the patrons of music; in every town of any importance there have been well-attended subscription concerts, and it was not in the capitals of the princes of North Germany, but in Leipzig and Hamburg that the greatest musicians and teachers resided; it was to the latter city that Ph. Em. Bach, among others, removed, though he held in Berlin the post of cembalista to the great monarch.

This short retrospective view of the matter is instructive for the present age, inasmuch as the latter exhibits a continuation of the relations formerly subsisting between musicians and the upper classes. Although the South German nobility no longer occupies the politico-social position, in which it gave the tone to all artistic relations, it still exhibits a lively and active interest in any one or any thing of importance; and though, on the other hand, the higher classes in the North of Germany manifest a far greater sympathy for art than they manifested in former times, the centre of gravity of art-life is still situated in the towns inhabited by the middle classes more exclusively; it was not in the capitals that Hiller, Mendelssohn, and Schumann worked and labored. The musical festivals for which St. Paul was composed, were founded by commercial and manufacturing towns, and while, even at the present day, the incentive to a good portion of the artistic successes achieved in the South still proceeds from the higher classes, causing those successes to extend still further, there are good reasons for asserting that most successes in the North have forced their way from the towns to the capitals, and that it is the great reputation first achieved by composers at musical festivals and at subscription concerts that has served to guide the elegant concert-public at the residences of the different courts. The cases of very great virtuosos, who have played in empty or only half-filled rooms, but who after immense successes elsewhere (Leipzig, etc.), reported here (in Berlin), have given concerts, when the rooms have been crammed to suffocation, and still continue to be so, are so well-known, that it is immaterial to mention particular instances or to cite names.

What are we to conclude from this? Simply, thus much: that musicians will never obtain an independent social position until those who are not celebrated no longer endeavor to gain what is to be obtained only by great reputations, or especial tact, in no way connected with any artistic excellence; until great and famous artists accurately gauge how much of the homage paid to them is to be attributed to genuine enthusiasm for art, and how much to be put to the account of ostentation. They alone stand so high that they can, without the slightest presumption, obtain for every class of musicians a higher position, by strictly preserving their own place, as representatives of the highest order of art, and by not allowing themselves to be led by the homage of Society into making concessions, from which musicians occupying a less eminent position suffer, though they themselves do not. The latter are often told that they must be contented with being simply received, and must not expect the treatment accorded only to the most celebrated members of their profession; whoever will not conform to this state of things is accused of overmuch self-esteem—and if he ever truly perceives his own position and rights, he cannot say that the charge was altogether unfounded. He must look for his place, where it is ungrudgingly accorded, in middle-class society. If he succeeds in making a great reputation, certain circles will be open to him the more readily that he has not sought to penetrate into them, and then—it is his duty not to be presumptuous. Generally speaking, let him follow the rule of conduct which Horace, the poet and philosopher, laid down for himself: It is enough to pray to the Gods for what they give, and what they can take away. Let them accord me life and what I require to maintain it; I will myself provide evenness of mind.

"Sed sat in ore Jovis quæ donat et aufert; Det vitam, det opus, æquum mihi animum ipse paro."

Musical Correspondence.

(Extracts from a Private Letter.)

BERLIN, JAN. 31.—I have at last heard the two great pianists. I went Wednesday evening to hear Rubinstein at the Singakademie rooms. The hall was full and the audience enthusiastic. Rubinstein began with the Hummel Septet. Rubinstein, as well as the other six men, played as nearly to perfection as mortals need come; with just the amount of expression the composition demanded. The horn in the Scherzo was delicious. Then followed songs by Mendelssohn and Schumann, charmingly sung by a Fräulein something, I forget her name, and accompanied by Rubinstein. Then Rubinstein played the Beethoven Sonata in E, Op. 109. The first movement of the Sonata is rather more than an ordinary mind can take in at only one hearing, even with Rubinstein's playing, but the slow movement was a thing to listen to on one's knees. I have never heard either singer or player give so much expression to music. Rubinstein's playing was perfectly simple and unaffected, even in the most intense portions of the movement, but it went to the soul as no one's else that I have ever heard. The movement is very long and the audience grew somewhat restless towards the last part, but I enjoyed every note of it.

After the Sonata, the Fräulein, whose name I forget, sang two songs by Rubinstein, which seemed to me to be rather dull, and a most bewitching "Kindertlied" by Taubert. Then Rubinstein played Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses," which I should have enjoyed more if I had not got a piece of my programme stuck in my throat, which kept me in an exceedingly explosive state all through the piece. Indeed, Mme. Joachim, who sat immediately in front of me, gave such unmistakable signs of rage, that I left the concert and had a comfortable set to outside and got the obnoxious bit of paper out.

Saturday I heard Tausig and was carried away as never before; this time by the all-subduing magnetism and animal spirits of the man. The programme was: Sonata, Op. 53, Beethoven; Bourrée, Bach; Presto Scherzando, Mendelssohn; Barcarolle, Ballade and 2 Mazurkas, Op. 59 and 33, Chopin; "Aufforderung zum Tanze," Weber; the whole of Kriesleriana, Schumann; Ständchen von Shakespeare, nach Schubert, and Ungarische Rhapsodie, Liszt. He played the Beethoven Sonata in perfect taste and refinement, and as much depth of feeling as the composition called for. He took the Bach Bourrée very fast, but the effect was electric, bubbling over with good nature and fun. His playing of the Mendelssohn piece was, I don't hesitate to say, the most perfect thing I have ever heard. The "Aufforderung" of Weber was a very brilliant and taking display, in which there were perhaps seven notes of Tausig to every one of Weber. His playing of the Hungarian Rhapsody was entraining to the last degree. To see the man sit at the piano as quietly as J. C. D. Parker does, his handsome face glowing with good-nature and animal spirits of the best kind, and hear him throw out octaves and arpeggios by the handful, in the rapid finale, beginning pianissimo, and then gradually crescendo, crescendo, a sempre crescendo, until he gets to a pitch of fortissimo that I have never heard equalled, and all without any apparent exertion and, above all, without any "noisiness," is an experience that I would not have missed for the world. He is one of the few pianists who make you feel how easy pianoforte playing is. And what is more wonderful is the way in which he keeps his whole team, so to speak, in the traces and never becomes anything approaching to what Prof. S. calls "outrageous." He has Liszt's way of looking up, just as Alide Topp has, but his whole expression of face is so unsentimental (that is sentimental in a bad sense) that at first it looks like looking round the room, and gives the impression of carelessness, but you soon get used to it.

Sunday afternoon H. and I went to Villa Colonna and heard the two movements of Schubert's "Unfinished" in B minor; played as Schubert himself might wish to hear it, the horns beautifully clear and liquid toned. We had just time to stop and hear the first movement of the Beethoven in D minor, (No. 9), which was well played, though the orchestra is too small to give it the effect it ought to have.

Tuesday evening H. and I went to an extra concert (that is one with two soloists and 10 Sgr. added and beer, supper, and cigars subtracted) at Bille's. A Mlle. Krebs, from Dresden, played Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto very well; a little sentimental in the cantabile theme of the first movement, but very firm and even entrainante in the finale. A Herr Lotto played a not entirely beastly Concerto of his own for violin. His playing would have been a greater success, musically, if it had not seemed so much like trying how near he could come to a note without hitting it; his intonation was painfully near the note without ever being true. The orchestra played Schumann's grand D-minor, and the Scherzo "Fée Mab" from H. Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliette" Symphony. The Germans evidently don't enter into the spirit of Berlioz's music; their performance of the really spirituelle and captivating movement was wholly without ressort.

LOWELL, FEB. 23.—The new musical Association of this city, called "The Lowell Choral Society," gave at Huntington Hall last night a performance of Haydn's "Creation" which deserves a brief notice, both on account of its merits and of its faults. As I write my first sentence I fancy I can hear you, Mr. Editor, expressing your regret that all the out-of-town societies will persist in doing nothing but "The Creation" and "The Messiah," and in a general way I must say that I sympathized with your feeling in the matter. But in this instance, as the organization was put upon its first public trial, and that, too, in a very short time after its birth, the selection was undoubtedly judicious, for a majority of the members had become quite familiar with the choral parts of "The Creation," and the comparative simplicity of much of its music made the work suitable for a first essay. In view of the policy adopted for the first concert, this statement needs some qualification, however; for the Choral Society, for some unexplained reason, did not choose to engage the services of an orchestra, and the instrumental score was delivered over to a single pianist, Mr. George B. Allen. That gentleman is an admirable performer and did as much, perhaps, as mortal man could do under the circumstances; and the programme gave the soothing information that the instrument was an "Orchestral Grand," which it certainly was, and a very good one. But all these things together did not compensate, I hardly need say, for the terrible thinness, dryness, and inadequacy of one piano in the interpretation of Haydn's instrumental music. It was bad enough in the choruses, where the firm support of the orchestra was sadly missed; but in the elaborate descriptive passages, where the brilliant fancy of the cheerful old master runs riot in a thousand delicately wrought and highly involved instrumental conceits, the need of the violin was most painfully felt.

Of the work of the Society, considered as a Choral Society, I can speak with not a little satisfaction and enthusiasm. The choruses were as a rule rendered with great evenness, precision and taste. The whole number of singers was about two hundred, and the volume of sound was impressive. The first chorus, "And the Spirit of God," was finely given, the fortissimo on the last "light" being brought out with great body and purity of sound. The beautiful chorus "Awake the harp" was somewhat unsteady and rough in places, but the first part of the oratorio was nobly concluded with a grand and stirring performance of "The Heavens are telling," which was sung with well directed enthusiasm, with earnestness, skill, and splendid fervor. "Achieved is the glorious work" and the final chorus, "Sing the Lord, ye voices all," were also rendered in excellent fashion. Altogether the Society is to be much praised for attaining such a great degree of skill and success so early in its existence; and Mr. S. W. Stevens, the accomplished conductor under whose supervision the work was carried on, deserves to be commended for the high qualities of mind and temper which contributed in a large measure to the successful consummation.

The great fault of the occasion remains to be stated, and the interests of sound criticism require that it should neither be concealed nor extenuated. Instead of engaging competent singers from Boston for the difficult solo music, the solos were entrusted to the native talent of the city of Lowell, and the great airs, recitatives, and concerted pieces were, as a rule, mangled in the most fearful way. I cannot pause at this moment to verify my figures, but I believe that six or seven sopranos, one contralto, three tenors, and four basses alternated in experiments upon Haydn's great airs. Of course all unity of vocal effect was lost in the solo music. Even arch-angels lost their identity, and our first father found himself two "gentlemen at once," like a sort of reduced Cerberus. The airs and recitatives were generally bad enough, but the concerted pieces, with the exception of some duets in the third part, were calculated to set the teeth of the least sensitive on a keen edge. Of these the trio, "The Lord is great," was particularly and exceptionally trying. The great airs were performed as they are pretty sure to be under such circumstances. Faults of execution were, of course, very great, and too numerous to be separately mentioned, but the defects in expression were simply legion. What, indeed, can be expected of a vocalist of ordinary power of voice, and of very ordinary musical culture, in the rendering of such airs as "Rolling in foaming billows," "With verdure clad," "On mighty pens," and "Now heaven in fullest glory shone?" Very little, of course, in the way of vocal effect; and next to nothing in the shape of expression, for the simple reason that the mind of the performer is entirely taken up with the effort to get through his notes without serious blundering. As a result we must have, and in this case we had, a series of performances where bad phrasing, indistinct enunciation, impurity of tone, and general roughness of execution were lost sight of in the presence of inadequate or false expression. It was to be noticed, also, that several of the performers, and particularly some of the ladies, took liberties with the score of Haydn of a nature so grave that they would have appalled the heart of the stoutest and most experienced singer of the oratorio in London or Dresden,—to say nothing of Boston. That the performers did their best it is needless to say, and the old proverb declares that the best can do no more; but we must regard this feature of the concert as a serious mistake. The presence of a very large company and the taking of a respectable admission fee entitled the audience to something more than being made the victims of experiments for the mere pleasure of the vocalists themselves. And the assignment of the solos to the Lowell singers could not have been properly regarded as a means of their future culture and attainment; the effect would be the very contrary indeed, for nothing can be more disastrous and dangerous to an undeveloped artist than a struggle in public with music which is too high for him. We augur the best things for the future of the Society, however, from the successful features of its first performance, and we have no doubt that they will profit by the faults as well as by the excellencies of their rendering of "The Creation."

Ninth Symphony Concert.

Expectation was on tiptoe to hear the new young German lady pianist, who has been making such an impression in New York; and this, added to the other great attractions of the programme, crowded the Music Hall even more than anytime before.

Overture to "Genoveva,".....Schumann.
 Recitative and Aria, "Addio, O miei sospiri," from "Orfeo." (First time).....Gluck.
 Mrs. C. A. Barry.
 Pianoforte Concerto, No. 2, in F minor, op. 21.....Chopin.
 Maestoso. Larghetto. Allegro vivace.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.

Alto Airs, arranged by Robert Franz, from the Italian Operas of.....Handel.
 a. "Giacchè morir non posso," from "Radamisto."
 b. "Son confusa pastorella," from "Poro."
 Mrs. C. A. Barry.
 Heroic Symphony, No. 8, in E flat.....Beethoven.

Schumann's Overture to his romantic Opera "Genoveva" has been keenly relished each successive season of these Concerts. This time it was better played than ever before, and its fine, delicate fancies, albeit of a mystical and brooding mood, freshened now and then by breezy horn passages, which bring the woods about us, found new appreciation. The Symphony, the great "Eroica," has no fault found with it except its length, the sense of which was aggravated this time by our indulging ourselves with an encore after the Concerto. The first two movements (Allegro con brio, and the "Funeral March on the death of a Hero") were admirably rendered, the wind instruments keeping in uncommonly good tune, and all moving with precision, nervous accent and good light and shade; and it was plain from the stillness and the intent, glowing faces that the hearts of the great audience moved with the music. The Scherzo also went not badly. At any rate we did not fail to catch the strange excitement of its multitudinous low murmur, as of a people on the eve of some momentous revolution, and the inspiring proclamation of the three horns in the Trio. The Finale, with its seemingly accidental, careless, but, as it proves, very pregnant theme, of a few detached notes, and its rich growth of wondrous variations (which we heard likened last year, when it was played under Mr. Eichberg's direction, to the dropping of a few seeds in the ground, and the springing up and spreading, in the variations, to a gigantic tree)—mingling with which comes in a haunting melody from the Prometheus music—was somewhat disturbed, at least the impression of it, by belated people hurrying home. We dare not say, under such circumstances, whether it had full justice done it in the orchestra or not; it certainly had not in the auditorium.

Mrs. BARRY has gained in power and telling quality of voice, and only lacks a certain elasticity of outwardly impassioned manner to carry the impression of her always intelligently conceived, carefully studied, and sincerely, finely felt delivery of noble music to the souls of all her audience. As it is, many still find it cold and (to them) without hearty freedom and abandon, while those who know her nearer regard the sentiment of her singing as its chief charm. She has doubtless something yet to learn as to the best bringing out of the voice, and we doubt not that she will learn it. The Recitative, which is by far the best part of the selection from Orfeo, was given with just feeling and expression. The Aria—by no means equal to the somewhat hacknied "Che farò"—is rather a monotonous composition, with scarcely any modulation, with good, honest passage work for the voice, and an interesting figure of quartet accompaniment, joined by the oboes only in the interludes, and would be effective with a great voice and a consummate singer. Mrs. B. executed her task well, though the piece rather gratified historical curiosity than produced any lively sensation. The two Arias from Handel's obsolete Italian operas—specimens of many fine, fresh flowers which Robert Franz has found still alive amid the rubbish, and tenderly and skilfully transplanted so that we may know their beauty and their fragrance—were well contrasted in character. In so large a hall, of course, and without orchestra, they could not on a single hearing tell their full significance; although Mr. LEONHARD'S masterly rendering of the admirable Franz piano accompaniment were a fine feature, in itself, of any concert. In the strong, impassioned and declamatory melody of the first Air the singer, though showing a right conception and feeling of the music, was not so successful with her audience as in the exquisite "Son confusa pastorella," which is one of the loveliest pastoral melodies that Handel or any one has written. This suited her peculiarly and made a very fine impression.

The last time that we heard the Heroic Symphony (in the first concert of last year) it was in the same programme with a piano-forte Concerto (Chopin in E minor) played by Miss Alide Topp; this time it was followed by the other Chopin Concerto, in F minor, played (for the first time in these Concerts, though by no means the first time in Boston), by Miss ANNA MEHLIG.

She is younger even than she looks, not more than twenty-two. At the age of sixteen, she left the Conservatorium of Stuttgart, her native city, to begin her concert career in the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig, where she gave decided proof both of her own remarkable talent and of the wisdom of her teacher, Prof. Lebert. That was in January, 1865. Thence she made the tour of the German cities, everywhere exciting admiration. She visited London during each of the four succeeding summers, playing the round of the Old and New Philharmonic, the Monday Popular, the Crystal Palace Concerts, besides giving each time a concert of her own. Meanwhile the Abbé Liszt had become interested in her, and when he left Rome to pass a few months in Weimar, he invited her to come to him,—an opportunity which the young artist of course eagerly accepted; and there for several months she played with him daily, going over her whole repertoire with him, and reading with him almost everything à quatre mains. We have not heard Liszt himself, but so far we have never been half so much interested in any of his compositions by any of his interpreters, as we have been by hearing some of them in private by this lady.

As Miss Mehlig came upon the stage, in dress and manner very modest, in figure tall and slightly awkward, without the slightest air of outward demonstration or egotism, her face beaming with a kindly, honest smile of real German and sincere good nature, a face intellectual enough and showing will and much experience for her years, she had already won the sympathy of her public and was welcomed with a warmth not common in the Music Hall. As she became absorbed in her task, those who sat near enough to see, were struck with the glowing musical expression of her countenance; the genuine artist nature revealed itself unconsciously there as plainly as it did in the thoroughly vital, clear, consistent, admirably finished rendering of the music by her fingers.

Those fingers in their action were like springs, faultless in their accuracy of play, crisp and elastic in the touch, trained to the perfection of technique, and with what seemed an absolute equality of power and of facility in the two hands. There was consummate taste in all the phrasing, the light and shade, the delicate fioriture, the heart-felt cantabile, the bold, impassioned recitativo declamation, and the full, broad, swelling crescendos, which alternate in Chopin, nowhere more remarkably, with a more unmistakable stamp of genius, than in this Concerto. In the beginning of the Larghetto, her touch and accent had more of the subtle nervous fire and fineness of that most sympathetic interpreter we ever heard of Chopin, Otto Dresel, than any other artist we remember, while she surpassed him in the power of carrying through the stronger passages with a triumphant evenness and firmness. She has remarkable power as well as delicacy. And, best of all, the soul and spirit of the music thoroughly possesses her. It was in the best sense interpretation, and not mere exhibition of the performer's virtuosity, using Chopin's fine creation for a medium. Every phrase and accent of that composition touched the right chord in the soul of every hearer, so that the music became life to them. Indeed we hardly dare to speak as strongly as we feel; for, if we did, we should only have to sum up all in a few words of Miss Mehlig's playing upon that occasion; as thus: There is no good thing that cannot heartily be said of it; it seems to unite all the qualities of good piano-playing; recalling all the good playing that it ever was our lot to hear—and we have heard Clara Schumann frequently for weeks, and Arabella Goddard, and most of the famous male pianists, with the exception of Liszt and those two latest sons of thunder, Rubinstein and Tausig,—we cannot feel sure that we ever did hear any better playing, if upon the whole as good. Of course in point of ripe, complete artistic character and culture, we will not compare so young an artist with the wife of Robert Schumann, or with many others. But this young German evidently is of a temper that implies continual improvement. The Leipzig critics on her debut there in '65 predicted the most genuine success for her, and no doubt she plays far better now than she did then. At any rate she has taken captive the best and largest Boston audience; and we recall no other instance of such unqualified unanimity about an artist. The orchestra seemed to take fire from the spark of such true genius, and accompanied with unwonted verve and delicacy. The enthusiasm of the crowd broke through its usual reserve, and, being imperatively recalled, Miss Mehlig played, without accompaniment, Liszt's transcription of the Campanella of Paganini in a manner more effective than we ever heard before.

Chamber Concerts.

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER's fourth and last Trio Soirée was well attended by the lovers of good music, who, all of them, in that sympathetic, quiet atmosphere, where the sincere Art spirit felt at home and undisturbed, heartily enjoyed the well selected programme.

Trio in G minor.....	Haydn.
Andante, with Variations. Adagio. Presto.
Serenade,
The Cheerful Wanderer.....	Mendelssohn.
Piano Solo: Adagio and Rondo.....	Dussek.
Serenade.....	Petachke.
Loyal Song.....	Kücken.
Trio in E flat.....	Schubert.
Allegro. Andante. Scherzo. Allegro moderato.

The part-songs were contributed by the Chickering Club, some dozen gentlemen of fine manly, well-trained voices, who have not escaped celebrity, although they cling so fondly to the shade. It is the best male part-singing to be heard hereabouts, to say the least; for a remarkable unity of spirit, as well as of voice, seems to have grown upon them. The Haydn Trio, simple, quaint, transparent, cheerful, full of unaffected grace, has the same sort of interest with all the others. We may thank Mr. Parker, and him almost alone in these times, for bringing out several specimens of these "treasures old" for our enjoyment. He plays them like an artist, one who knows how good they are, though to the pampered modern taste they may seem common.

Still more of the air of antiquity seemed to hang about the Adagio and Rondo from a Sonata by us sek, with its wealth of minute embellishment, but they were winning through their grace and delicacy, which the pianist tenderly preserved. The E-flat Schubert Trio, op. 100, the great Trio, has become a sure card in chamber concerts. From beginning to end, through all its four movements, it is a happy, glorious inspiration, and corresponds to his great Symphony in C, somewhat as the great Beethoven Trio in B flat does to the Fifth Symphony. It was interpreted by Messrs. PARKER, LISTEMANN, and HEINDL with all the verve and all the delicacy one could desire, and heard through with unflagging zest.

Mr. JAMES M. TRACY, late of Rochester, N.Y., gave the first of his series of four "Piano-Forte Recitals," at Chickering's, on Tuesday afternoon, March 1. Mr. Tracy's excellent programmes make us regret that we were not able to attend. This was the first, (the vocal selection being by Mr. H. WILDE):

Sonata. A flat, op. 26.....	Beethoven.
a. Waltz Brillante. E flat, op. 18.....	Chopin.
b. Andante Caprice, op. 14.....	Mendelssohn.
A Venezia.....	Alari.
Sonata. F minor, op. 2, No. 1.....	Beethoven.
Concerto, F minor, op. 79.....	Von Weber.

Mr. T.'s second Recital is now set down for the 24th inst.; but as the first Extra Symphony Concert comes that afternoon, we trust he will be able to change the time. The programme includes Sonata, C minor, op. 13, Beethoven; Ballade, A flat, op. 47, Chopin; "Adelaide," Beethoven; Sonata, D major, op. 10, Beethoven; Sonata, C major, op. 24, Von Weber.

MR. CARLYLE PETERSILEA's first "Reception" came on Friday, Feb. 11. The selections were these:

Second Symphony, (First Movement).....	Beethoven.
Concert Aria, "Per questo bella".....	Mozart.
Mr. M. W. Whitney.
Berceuse.....	Chopin.
Larghetto, from Concerto in F minor.....	Henselt.
I know that my Redeemer liveth.....	Handel.
Miss Lena Hastreiter.
Trümmel.....	Schumann.
The Fisher's Wife.....	Petersile.
Miss Lena Hastreiter.
Sonata Pathétique, (First Movement).....	Beethoven.
L'Addio.....	Donizetti.
Miss Hastreiter and Mr. Whitney.

The concert-giver's rendering of the Symphony movement (whose arrangement we know not) was brilliant, strong and clear, reproducing much of the orchestral impression vividly. Nor was there any technical short-coming in the Sonata Pathétique of which he generously gave the whole, though we have felt more of the pathos and the poetry thereof from feebler, less trained hands. It was well to let us hear Schumann's little Album piece in its original and simple form, after having had it used so much for a study of orchestral pianissimo. Miss LENA HASTREITER, a pupil in the N. E. Conservatory, is from the West, we understand. She has a soprano voice of noble quality, by no means evenly developed, and her execution, though considerable, is as yet crude. Moreover, Handel's great song of Faith was rather an incongruous element in such a programme. Mr. WHITNEY's rendering of the bass Aria by Mozart was of course acceptable, his voice and style are always noble and impressive.

We were unable to attend Mr. Petersile's second Reception, of which the programme was as follows:

Second Symphony.....	Beethoven.
Concerto in A minor, op. 85.....	Hummel.
Part-Songs, The Gay Pilgrim.....	Mangold.
"Serenade Polka".....	Rhodes.
Two Songs, "She Stood by the Altar".....	Petersile.
The Tempest. Transcriptions by C. Petersile.
Sonata in A minor.....	Mozart.
Part-Songs:
"Freedom dwells throughout our Land".....	Ruder.
"With Parting Ray".....	Abt.
Morte—Lamentation (by request).....	Gottschalk.
Played by the Composer at his last Concert.
Etude in C major, No. 3.....	Rubinstein.

We hear much praise of the part-singing by Messrs. FITZ, FESSENDEN, COOK and RYDER (him of the voluminous bass).

The Complimentary Concert to Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, last week, attracted to Chickering's Hall a host of his friends, who were desirous to make this Concert the substantial compliment which Mr. W.'s services in the concert room so richly deserve. The prominent feature of the programme was the singing of the Chickering Club, whose rendering of Four-part Songs seem to us by far the most perfect and delicate that we have heard from any organization for singing such music among us. Apart from the great excellencies of the voices (for this Club embraces many of the best known and best of our resident singers,) the light and shade and expression with which they give their songs is admirable. Mr. Whitney sang several songs with all the fine effect and success which his rare voice enable him to give to them, and was most warmly welcomed by the audience. Mrs. BARRY contributed several songs, among them "Che farò senza Eurydice," which she gave with great beauty and true feeling. Mr. J. C. D. PARKER played a Capriccio by Mendelssohn, with that careful and elegant rendering which characterizes all his public performances. Altogether the programme was one which in its composition and by the excellence of its performance, gave great pleasure to the large audience that filled the hall.

NEXT IN ORDER. March 17, (Thurs.) Tenth and last SYMPHONY CONCERT. Part I. Overture to "Iphigenia," Gluck; Tenor Aria, from the same, sung by Mr. KREISSMANN; Hummel's Septet, played Mr. PERABO and others. Part II. Symphony in C, No. 2, Schumann; Cycle of Songs: "Dichterliebe," Schumann; Overture to "Oberon," Weber.

Friday 18th. At Chickering's, 4 P.M., Complimentary Matinée to Miss MEHLIG, by the Harvard Musical Association. Messrs. KREISSMANN, LEONHARD and EICHBERG will assist, and there will be an opportunity to hear the distinguished young pianist in selections from Bach, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Liszt, &c. (Tickets, at $2.00, at Chickering's, Ditson's, and the Boston Music Hall).

Tuesday, 22nd, at Chickering's. First Evening Concert of ERNST PERABO, assisted by Mr. KREISSMANN.

Thursday Afternoon, 24th. First EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT of the Harvard Mus. Assoc., in aid of the noble project of a "Boston Art Museum," where in all the rare collections of sculpture, paintings, engravings, architectural models, &c., in this vicinity are to be brought together, for the free instruction and enjoyment of all. This institution is to give every child such privileges in Art, as the Public Library affords in Literature. The programme will include BEETHOVEN's FIFTH SYMPHONY and "Leonora" Overture; Schumann's Piano Concerto, played by HUGO LEONHARD, and other choice things yet to be named.

March 31. Second Extra Symphony Concert, in Compliment to the Conductor CARL ZERBAHN. Miss Mehlig will play Beethoven's E-flat Concerto. Seventh Symphony; Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille" Overture, &c.

April 2, Saturday Evening. Benefit Concert of Mrs. C. A. BARRY, assisted by Miss ANNA MEHLIG, and other distinguished artists, in the Music Hall.

ITALIAN OPERA, under the management of Signor BENCACANT, opens at the Boston Theatre next Monday evening, with Il Trovatore. First comes next, and then (for a wonder) William Tell! The principal singers are Miss KILGEO, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, Miss ANELIA JACKSON [new]; the famous tenor, LEFRANO [new]; HABERMANN and SUNINI.

FARMINGTON, CONN.—Mr. Klausner (through the medium of Messrs. F. von Inten, piano; Theo. Thomas, violin; and F. Bergner, cello), treated the young ladies under his musical charge at Miss Porter's School, to two more excellent programmes on the 23d and 24th ult. These were their forty-second and third concerts of this kind; the selections were as follows:

Trio in D, op. 70, No. 1.....	Beethoven.
Concerto, in the Italian style, for Piano.....	Bach.
Sonata, for Violin, in G.....	Porpora.
1. Grave sostenuto.—Allegro Fuga. 2. Aria. 3. Allegretto moderato.
Waldscenen. 9 Clavierstücke, op. 88.....	Schumann.
1. Eintritt. 2. Jäger auf der Lauer. 3. Einsame Blume. 4. Verfluchte Stelle. 5. Freundliche Landschaft. 6. Herberge. 7. Vogel als Prophet. 8. Jagdlied. 9. Abschied.
Adagio, from the 3d Concerto.....	Gottmann.

- Trio, for Piano, Violin and 'cello, in B, op. 52. Rubinstein.
 1. Allegro. 2. Presto. 3. Schumann.
 2. Adagio. 4. Allegro appassionato.
 Trio, G minor, op. 110. Schumann.
 1. Bewegt, doch nicht zu rasch. 2. Rasch.
 3. Ziemlich langsam. 4. Kräftig, mit Humor.
 Sonata, for Piano, in A flat, op. 110. Beethoven.
 Sonata, for Violin, in G minor. Liszt.
 Largo. Alhambra. Adagio. Allegretto.
 Polonaise, C sharp minor, op. 26. Chopin.
 Valse Caprice, op. 60. Raff.
 Trio, C minor, op. 66. Mendelssohn.

NEW YORK. The fourth Philharmonic concert took place on Saturday evening.

The chief pieces performed were the overture to the Magic Flute, unexceptionable doubtless, but familiar almost to wearisomeness; Schumann's Genoveva overture, an interesting but by no means a great work; the Great C Minor Beethoven Symphony, which can no more tire one with repetition than can the ocean by being forever blue, which only excites fresh wonder at every hearing and fresh reverence for the prodigious genius that conceived it. Besides these larger pieces, was the Russian National Hymn, arranged by Kummer, for a violoncello and orchestra, and prefaced by a noble introduction which Mr. Bergner played with his accustomed finish. This composition of Kummer's is like the mermaid. Its beginning is symmetrical, beautiful, and feminine, but it wiggles off toward the end in those snaky, formless convolutions called variations. The violoncello is an instrument of complaint; in its place in the orchestra, it takes up the burden of sorrow, or of entreating love, or of hopeless longing, and gives it soulful expression; set to work out rapid passages, dilating, varying, and ringing the changes upon an air in feeble imitation of its superior, the violin, it becomes trivial, and forfeits the listener's respect.

A quartet of flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn, the composition of Julius Rietz, was also played. These are all soft wind instruments, producing tones that, though of course they have individuality, still affect the air in the same way. Such a combination speedily becomes monotonous, and nothing but great art on the composer's part in relieving it with the other instruments of the orchestra used as accompaniment prevented its becoming very tame. What Rietz gained by this combination was a lovely unity and blending of soft, reedy notes and harmonies that soothed the ear with sensuous beauty like the murmuring of doves. Finally, it remains only to refer to Mrs. Davison's singing of the great scene and aria from the "Freischütz": "Wie nahe mir der Schlummer." The lady herself is from the West, and has been heard much of late in private musical parties, so that expectation has been kindled to hear her in public. Her personal graces won her at once the sympathy of the audience, and this was further assured by the very beautiful quality of her voice. So sweet and delicate and delicious a tone few singers that we have the good fortune to hear possess. There was no trace of hardness or harshness in it. If Mrs. Davison's ability to use her voice were as great as the beauty of the voice itself, we should have only unqualified praise to offer. But she has not yet learned to sing. Even those elementary but all-important parts of vocal method, such as when to take breath and how to hold it, she has not yet learned; and in the slow movement she marred the beauty of the song very much by this faultiness of method and finding her breath exhausted and insufficient to hold the tone out to its proper length. Mrs. Davison's voice is not powerful, but this is more than compensated for by the purity of tone. Her high tones are especially weak, but what the upper register loses the lower register gains; besides, practice will add a note or two and strengthen those she already has. She does not vocalize well, but on the other hand she can sing a cantabile passage delightfully, and that is what a singer as renowned even as Carlotta Patti is incapable of doing. In a word, Mrs. Davison does not possess the art of singing, but the soul and the understanding and the capacity are all here, and nothing is needed but well-directed application to make her an admirable artist.—Sun, 7th.

Miss ANNA MEHLIG gave a concert of unusual interest last Monday night at Steinway Hall—as may be judged from the following programme:—Trio, in E flat major (Miss Anna Mehlig, Messrs. Wenzel Kopta and Charles Werner), Franz Schubert; Grand aria, from Tancredi (Mlle. Clara Perl), Rossini; a. Fantasiestück; b. Preludium and Fugue; E minor (Miss Anna Mehlig), Schumann and Mendelssohn; Violoncello solo, "Aria and Gavotte," (Mr. C. Werner, organ accompaniment by Mr. J. P. Morgan); Bach; Spinneried, from "The Flying Dutchman" (Miss Anna Mehlig); Wagner; Violin solo, "Adagio from Concerto" (Mr. Wenzel Kopta), Mendelssohn; Arioso, from "La Prophete" (Mlle. Clara Perl); Meyerbeer; Hexameron, grande duo for two pianos (Miss Anna Mehlig and Mr. S. B. Mills); Liszt.

Second Concert of the Church Music Association. (New York.)

The second concert of this newly organized musical association was given on Tuesday evening. Socially speaking it was unqualified and brilliant in its success. Musically considered it was interesting and enjoyable, though imperfect in almost all its details. And this we say without the least desire to disparage, for as every one knows who has any musical experience, a good chorus is not a thing that can be gathered together on a day's notice, but is the result of long drilling and much patient labor on the part of conductor and singers. Dr. Pech has the elements of an admirable choral force, and if they will work and pay more attention to his beat and less to their books, and if the incompetent members, of whom we speak advisedly when we say there are many, are sternly weeded out, there may yet be a chorus of which New York may be proud. The basses seemed weak in numbers and in power—their voices lacked resonance, especially in the passages for basses alone. Some of them also constantly waited for others to begin, and in this way the points were not attacked vigorously. This was true, indeed, of the whole chorus. The short notes, too, were not usually sung short enough, but semi-quavers were dragged out to quavers, and a blurred effect thus given to the singing. What was lacking was boldness and promptitude in taking up the parts, courage to sing out, a more careful attention to the rests and the length of the notes, and an implicit following of the beat. If the members of the Church Music Association flatter themselves that they have resolved themselves at once into a chorus that is really of a high order of merit, they are thoroughly mistaken; but they certainly have it in their power to do noble work. There is, however, no royal road to that result but a constant drilling that will test their utmost patience. They have already greatly improved. So has their leader, Dr. Pech. A great deal of his extravagance of action was left off; the red box in which he had encased himself at the first concert was happily done away with; and although he still found it necessary very often to beat the time audibly upon his music stand, yet on the whole there was much more ease and calmness on his part than on the former occasion, and consequently more steadiness on the part of his singers. For nothing flusters a chorus so much as a flustered, nervous, and demonstrative leader, and nothing gives it so much confidence as a composed one. The machinery of leadership ought to be kept out of sight as much as possible. If the chorus could only sing without any conductor, the effect would be immeasurably better, but since it must needs be that conductors shall distract the eye, while the ear is the only organ that should be addressed, let them at least do it as little and as quietly as possible. Dr. Pech's prefatory comments on the programme upon Meyerbeer's Dinorah overture, Haydn's Sixteenth Mass and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, which were the pieces performed, were in excellent taste, instructive, temperate, wise and just, and doubtless added much to the pleasure with which those to whom the works were new listened to them. The Mass was much better sung than the Hymn of Praise. In fact in the latter, the singing of the well-known and supremely beautiful duet and chorus, "I waited for the Lord," was not only bad but positively painful; the chorus was all astray.

It was evident that the rehearsals had been too few to enable them to master the work laid out for them. Some of the solo singing was very good. Mrs. Davison whose name was on the programme, did not appear. Mme. Salvotti, a lady of whom we hope to hear more in the concert room, sang exceedingly well, in a sweet, clear, round and sympathetic voice, and with excellent method. The efforts of Mr. Leggart, Mr. W. J. Hill, and Mr. Jewett were also artistic and praiseworthy. The audience complied almost unanimously with the suggestion of "evening dress," printed on the tickets, and the consequence was that Steinway Hall shone more resplendent than ever a hall or theatre did in this city at any public concert. The next concert is to be given on the 18th of May. The easier of Beethoven's masses, that in C, is to be performed, and also the second part of Oberon. Mr. Pech makes his programmes too long. He was obliged to cut nearly half of the Hymn of Praise at this last concert. And his audience, otherwise well-behaved, have a most impolite and vicious habit of walking out in great numbers during the performance of the latter part of the programme. By so doing they selfishly mar the pleasure of all who remain to the end.—Sun, March 5.

Bach's Grosse Passions-Musik. (ST. MATTHEW.)

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

The consideration of this wonderful work naturally assumes a threefold division. Thus it will be to speak separately of the narrative portions set to Scriptural text, of the choral tunes employed to connect these most intimately with the people's sympathy, and of the reflective passages which may be accepted as the composer's comment on the sacred story.

English audiences have been made acquainted with the intermixture of the narrative with the dramatic form in Mendelssohn's St. Paul, in Professor Bennett's Woman of Samaria, in Mr. Sullivan's Prodigal Son, and in Herr Goldschmidt's Ruth. In all these, the story is told, and the several personages concerned therein, whether individuals or a multitude, step as it were out of the picture, become animated, and appear in living presentation, speaking each his own words, and expressing his own feelings according to the interpretation of the composer. In the first three of these oratorios, however, the narration is assigned by turns to several voices, with no apparent object in the division but variety in the musical effect; while in Herr Goldschmidt's work, the Bach model is closely followed, the tenor voice being employed throughout to recite the history.

In all of these, the dramatic portions are far more copiously developed than in the composition under notice, wherein the solo characters are introduced but incidentally in the recitative, never having to repeat a single word, and scarcely ever having to sing a rhythmical phrase, far less a distinct movement, such as the two songs of St. Paul, the duet between him and St. Barnabas, and several analogous instances in the other works that have been adduced. The incidental choruses are indeed somewhat more extended, but the length of these is limited by dramatic propriety and never exceeds what may well be supposed to be the duration of the embodied action; and where the words are reiterated in such extension, it is for the sake of increasing the vitality of the scene rather than for that of completing the musical idea. A happy instance of this is where, at the last supper, when Jesus has declared that one of the twelve will betray him, they every one say, "Lord, is it I?" The astonishment of all at what they regard less as a suspicion than a prophecy, the anxious distrust of some in their own weakness, the steadfast confidence of others in the devotion they feel for their divine master, the loving eagerness of each to avert from himself the imputation and the possibility of fulfilling it—such is the various expression given to the heartfelt question as it passes from lip to lip, but is not more often uttered than it may have been on the actual occasion the evangelist describes. The moment is perpetuated in Leonardo's great picture of this incident, whereas here it is as fleeting as in real life; both presentations of the subject are true, and they exemplify the different functions and applications of the two arts by which they are rendered.

There needs some amount of reverence on the part of the auditor, for the work and still more for the subject, to secure him against any feeling of strangeness in a singer's rising to utter a single ejaculation perhaps, or a complete sentence at most, which if unrightly regarded may be supposed to interrupt rather than to continue and vivify the narrative. An auditor of the present day, hearing the oratorio not in a church but in a concert-room, and habituated to the forms as much as the freedoms of such a locality, may be liable to so misconceive the author's purpose and its fulfilment; but in this case, the custom of the whole Christian era would testify against him, for, as has been shown, it has been the Church's wont from primitive times to set forth the relation after this particular manner, and Bach's treatment of the text differs only from long-established precedent in the admirable truthfulness and the heart-searching expression with which he declaims the whole, as distinguished from the bald chanting of Roman use and the scarcely more impressive recitative of earlier Lutheran musicians.

The single bass line with figures indicates the silence of the orchestra throughout this portion of the work, a device for giving full freedom to the singer's recitation and the utmost clearness to his enunciation. Be it not supposed, however, that the composer's purpose or the effect of the original performance would be in any way represented by the English practice of accompanying recitative on a violoncello and a double bass, and assigning the articulation of the harmony more particularly to the former. It must have been Bach's habit, as it certainly was Handel's to accompany recitative upon the harpsichord—or perhaps, occasionally upon a very soft stop of the organ—and to allow the bowed instrument to support the bass notes only.

With the richer tone of the pianoforte to replace that of its obsolete precursor, an improvement upon the original effect may be made in the present day, which may be still analogous to it, giving all the required assistance to the voice of the changeful harmonies which mark and most delicately color every inflection of the sense, and presenting with clearness and ample force the sometimes florid passages which in rare instances separate the sentences and illustrate their purport. A remarkable example of such passages and of the rigid restriction of means for their presentation, is in the description of the rending of the temple veil, the earthquake, and the other miraculous manifestations that succeed the death upon the cross. The scene is most vividly conceived, and is highly picturesque in its portrayal; and one might marvel that greater instrumental resources were not brought to bear upon the expression of the musical ideas, were one too short-sighted to penetrate the truly artistic purpose that induced this reticence of means.

The explanation of this orchestral economy is, that the instruments are reserved for another object. The words spoken by Jesus throughout the narrative, and these words only, are accompanied by all the string instruments, and mostly in long sustained, widely dispersed chords. This arrangement conspicuously distinguishes the personality of the Divine Being from everything that surrounds it, investigating it with a glory fully as significant as the impossible palpability which is employed to the same end in the old pictures, and imposing a sense of his preternatural character whenever he takes part in the action. One cannot but be amused at the simplicity of those great masters who found it necessary to encircle the head of the Saviour with a glory, that of the Virgin with a nimbus, and to make two horns of light issue from the head of Moses, in order to distinguish these personages in the eyes of the spectators.

Now, however strong may have been the magnetic influence of these living beings upon all around them, however sensitive all around may have been to their preternatural power, such influence must have been exercised upon the inner consciousness, and not upon the sensuous perception—the witnesses must have felt the light from within, not seeing its external radiation. Just such a metaphysical effect as must have prevailed among the men who heard the uttered speech of Jesus, is that induced by the distinctive accompaniment of his words, which, marks them with a peculiarity that all must feel who may be unable to define, and can never obtrude itself as a symbol out of nature and beyond truth.

A pointed exception from this design of more richly accompanying the words of Jesus than those of the other speakers, and an exception that is more remarkable because of the great importance and infinite pathos of the words in question, and the peculiar beauty of the setting, is in the treatment of the last exclamation of the dying Saviour. Here, with the accompaniment of the figured bass only, the Hebrew words, "Eli, Eli, lama lama sabachthani," are declaimed by Jesus with thrilling poignancy; and then, the Evangelist resumes the relation, and gives the translation of the text to the same musical phrase transposed a fourth higher. The intensity of the passage is of course increased by the transposition, and thus the words in the language understood by the audience are so rendered as faithfully to reflect and yet highly to strengthen the effect of the Hebrew.

The greater length of the speeches of Jesus than of any other personage, and the important doctrinal significance of several of them, give prominence to this character over every other that comes forward in the narration, and entail a peculiar and most grave responsibility upon the singer who sustains it. At the revival of the oratorio in Berlin, the arduous task fell upon Edward Devrient, who really instigated the reproduction of the work in public, and shared with Mendelssohn all the difficulties of that undertaking, if not divided with him the renown of its accomplishment. The two ardent friends and enthusiastic musicians brought their double intelligence to bear upon the interpretation of the great artist's meaning; and to emulate the pains spent upon the part by Devrient, who, having no tradition to guide him, may be called its second originator, will be worthy of the greatest singer that can undertake it after him.

It is to speak now of the treatment of the choral tunes dispersed throughout the oratorio,—those, namely, intended to be sung by the congregation—for there are some included in what have been defined as the reflective passages, where they are intermixed with other and totally distinct melodies, and are so elaborated as to render the performance possible only to members of an organized choir. As has been said earlier in these remarks, the tunes alone can have been sung by the people, while the harmony was sustained by the trained chorus with one or both organs, and sometimes with one or both orchestras. The character of this harmony, therefore, is not that, we may presume, which the author would generally have employed in writing for popular use, when the tunes are sung in the ordinary Service. On the contrary, instead of giving the broadest expression in the harmonization which might be applicable to each entire hymn, the aim here has obviously been to paint the purport of the particular verse that is selected, and to make this so far as possible an illustration of the point of the narrative at which it is inserted. With what a masterhand this aim is accomplished, no technical description can set forth. A keen sense of musical beauty, and, still more, of poetical fitness, is a better guide to the comprehension of this admirable portion of the oratorio, than can be any amount of knowledge of rules and principles. It must have been a most peculiar effect upon the singers, if they were gifted to any extent with musical susceptibility, when they found the character and expression of their well-known tunes qualified by the accompanying harmony, and when they found these tunes with the selected verse of the hymns thus specially appropriated to the situations where they are introduced. We, strangers to the tunes and to the words, can never experience this effect; but we may well suppose its nature and its extent, and we may wish, if not hope, that some day some inseparable hymns and tunes may become so familiar in England, that, should a future Bach arise, he may have a like effect within his reach.

One tune occurs four times in the course of the oratorio, I presume to four different verses of the same hymn. As No. 21, it begins, "Acknowledge me, my Keeper," and it follows the promise of Jesus, upon the Mount of Olives, to go before his disciples into Galilee, when he shall be risen again. As No. 23, the first words are, "I will stay here beside Thee," and it occurs as a comment upon St. Peter's second protestation that he never will deny his master. As No. 53, the first line in the English version reads, "Commit thy ways, O pilgrim," &c., and succeeds the account of the silence of Jesus upon Pilate's interrogation. And, lastly, it is set to the words, "O Head all bruised and wounded," as No. 63, and is there sequent upon the mockery of the soldiers, when they strike their enrobed prisoner upon the head with a reed.

This fourfold use of the tune may have been because of the pertinence of the words associated with it to the several situations of its introduction; may have been because of the beauty and the susceptibility of various treatment of the tune itself; and may have been because of the tune's remarkable popularity. That it possessed and still possesses such popularity, is evidenced by the frequency of its occurrence in the works of German composers, such as Schein (1627), Graun (1755), and many others, from the time of its first adoption in the Lutheran Church till our own. I say adoption, because it is one of the countless instances, as common in Germany as in England, of the appropriation of secular tunes to sacred use, this having been a great favorite in the sixteenth century as a love song, "Mein G'müth ist mir verwirret," in which character it was harmonized for five voices by H. L. Hasler, in 1601.

The rhythmical modification that the tune has undergone, while retaining its original melodic intervals, during the lapse of centuries, appears strangely as strongly to contradict the supposition that rhythm is a highly essential, if not the chief element of musical popularity; but here is not place for discussing the question, which, however interesting in itself, is irrelevant to the main subject before us. Let us return to Bach, and observe that he has given the tune in as many different keys as the times of its occurrence, and thus somewhat varies its effect; and that the last time he has wonderfully diversified its character by his different harmonization, fitting it thus to the reverential sorrow and the keen anguish of the respective situations. Thus we have it in E, in E flat, in D, and in F. All the four arrangements have one point in common, a point of the utmost tenderness, that implies loving and longing as fully as music can express them; this is the use of a second inversion of the chord of the subdominant, which accompanies the penultimate syllable of the fifth line of each stanza. What power is there in the happy application of a single harmony, to conjure up images all but palpable, thoughts that seem to run to the mind's limits, and feelings that become our very own by the strong power of sympathy.

Another tune is twice employed. It is assigned to the congregation with the words, "Say, sweetest Jesu" (Herliebster Jesu), when its plaintive strains bespeak our sorrow at the Saviour's first announcement that his crucifixion will follow the feast of the Passover—our sorrow, because we who sing and we who hear are assumed to lament his sufferings as much as repent the sin for which they were borne. It occurs again, but there for the select choir only, interspersing the infinitely pathetic tenor solo, No. 25, "O grief," which reflects upon the agony in Gethsemane.

To describe its treatment here, reference must be made to the manner of performing the choral tunes in Lutheran churches, of which manner this treatment is an extension. The manner may be believed and perhaps proved to have been derived in the Reformed Church from Roman use, and is possibly a remnant of the earliest form of metrical music. A pause is made at the end of each line of the verse. Such was the case in the singing of metrical psalms and hymns in the Church of England, and such must be if the original broad, massive effect is to be preserved to our old grand psalm tunes. In German use, however, the pause is lengthened from a mere breathing point to a decided interruption of the rhythm; and the long sustained note of the voices, or their silence between the final and the initial note of one and the following line, is accompanied or filled up by an interlude on the organ.

These interludes are for the most part, necessarily, but florid passages upon one continued harmony, and are improvised by the player. Their extent is sometimes amplified on more important occasions, and nearly always in written composition of which a choral is the groundwork. The widest application of this form is the Fugue upon a Canto Fermo, wherein the contrapuntal elaboration of an independent subject intersperses the several strains of some standard tune, and is even continued as accompaniment while these strains are sung or played. Its employment is less frequent now than it was at the time when contrapuntal device was the chief if not the sole element of the musician's art; but there are enough specimens now-a-days to prove its applicability to modern means, and examples of its use constitute a chief part of the riches of the past.

The chorals throughout the oratorio, of which, according to the original design, the congregation were to sing the tune, have the old pause at the end of each line, during which either some extempore passage or only a sustained chord is to be played. Three of the reflective pieces comprise choral tunes which are more or less elaborated, as has now been described; for, although there be no fugue in the entire work; although it be remarkably free for its author in its general structure, there is to remember that counterpoint was the art atmosphere of this composer whence he drew his very breath of life, and that complication was as clear to his singularly perfect sense of order as his simplicity to other men's minds; and that thus, while he totally eschewed the fugal form of composition, he had manifold other means of elaboration at his command, and showed them to be exhaustless by their various application.

Concert of the Church Music Association.

(From Watson's Art Journal, New York, March 5)

The second concert of the first season of the Church Music Association took place at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, March 1. Contrary to the expectations of many, who believed that the interest in this association would die out after the first concert, the attendance was much larger and still more brilliant on this occasion; and it was evidently esteemed as a society affair, in the success of which every one present was interested. An audience of such sterling worth, and of such high social standing, has not been gathered together within the walls of an opera house or concert-hall for many years past, and we accept this demonstration as an indication of the advance which music and musicians have made, in point of influence and social standing, in this community. We do not lay particular stress upon the mere wealth of those who originated and those who sustain the Church Music Association, for wealth is not necessarily allied to education and intelligence; but in this instance, the promoters of this association are found among the oldest and most influential families in the city—among those bred up amidst the luxuries and refinements of life, both mental and physical, whose tastes have been cultivated and matured by travel, and refined by habits of education and association, and who would naturally be the promoters and the fosterers of art in every department.

That such an association should have sprung up from such a source, cannot but be a subject of solid satisfaction to all who have the interest of music earnestly at heart; for it is an admitted fact that where the intelligent and the wealthy evince an active interest on some subject, whatever it may be, the thousands recognize in it, at once, something worthy of especial consideration; something to be admired and cultivated; in short, something to be followed. Like superior apes, the instinct of imitation which prompts our first tottering footsteps clings to us through life, giving direction to our aspirations for the better or the worse, according to the circumstances of education or home surroundings. May we not hope, then, that the example afforded by the success of the Church Music Association will be followed in other directions? That in other classes of society similar societies will be established, less expensive in the details of their public performances, but having the same end in view: the promotion and the extension of a love and appreciation of the true and beautiful in music.

What a rebuke to our existing choral societies is the career of this five-month-old Church Music Association! Green, inexperienced, practically entirely ignorant of the class of music they were called upon to perform, they, the members, by their energy, earnestness, enthusiasm, and intelligence, and by their good faith in attending rehearsals and concerts, have accomplished more in their brief association life, than the others have achieved in ten or fifteen years. There is much, to be sure, in thorough breeding—blood and brain will tell. There is a great deal in having a conductor as earnest, enthusiastic, uncompromising, and as conscientious as Dr. James Peck has proved himself to be; still without good faith on the part of the society, his individual efforts, however strenuous, would have failed in achieving such a result as the performance of Tuesday evening presented. This result must have an influence upon society at large, and we do not think that we are over-sanguine in believing that the influence will be for good.

The programme of the second concert comprised Meyerbeer's overture to "Dinorah," Haydn's Sixteenth Mass, and Mendelssohn's exquisite symphonic cantata "The Hymn of Praise."

The overture to "Dinorah" is very difficult to play, from its fragmentary character and the constant changes in the tempo; in addition to which the violin passages, though practicable, are excessively awkward and crabbed. Very delicate and sure manipulation is required in their execution; less than great excellence would produce the most terrible discord. Though with but two rehearsals, this work was rendered admirably. A little roughness was observable here and there, but in promptness of attack, general delicacy, and nice attention to light and shade, it was a performance of great excellence. The chorus, which bears an important part in the overture, commenced with some uncertainty of intonation, but it speedily recovered itself, and sustained its part well. The voices are admirably balanced, and the freshness and purity of their quality and their fine graduations in power, render the performance both effective and impressive. It was a brilliant opening to a very successful concert.

Haydn's Sixteenth Mass, though less showy and popular than Mozart's Twelfth, is a work of rare beauty, and in feeling is far more in keeping with the text. The religious sentiment is more predominant, and the aim seems to have been rather to preserve the pure devotional element, than to produce scientific music, as indicated by elaborate fugues, &c. Its chief charms are its spontaneity and its earnest utterance of a devotional spirit. The choruses are more difficult to execute than their lack of pretension would seem to indicate; they require great delicacy of utterance, promptness of attack, and decision in taking up points, frequently occurring upon difficult intervals. These requisites, in almost every case, were fulfilled by the association, only one or two instances of a momentary hesitancy occurring during the whole Mass. The soprano and tenor were particularly effective in each number of the Mass, not from their pre dominance, but from the rare parity of the quality of tone produced. When they came out in their power, the body of tone was beautiful in the extreme. Among the movements the "Kyrie Eleison," a portion of the "Gloria in Excelsis," "Laudamus te," and the fugue, "Et Vitam Venturi," were specially admirable in point of clear, vigorous and effective execution.

The solo parts were sustained by Mmo. Salvotti, who has a voice of rare beauty throughout the whole scale, excepting when she forces the lower tones, when they become hollow and disagreeable; Mrs. Jenny Kempton, Mr. William S. Leggett, and Mr. Joseph Jewett. While we are compelled to observe that, as a whole, the solo singing was not on an equality with the choral and instrumental department, still some of the movements were admirably sung. We might instance the "Kyrie," the "Quoniam Tu Solus," the "Et Incarnatus est," and the "Benedictus," as the movements most successfully executed.

The whole would probably have been more successful, had the position of the singers been more favorable; as it was, the quartet was separated, and could not see the conductor. Under such circumstances, a perfect rapport could hardly be expected, more especially as in several movements the solo parts are so catchily interwoven with the choral parts.

The original score of this Mass is exceedingly meagre, and needed to be filled in, to give proper balance to the orchestra. This delicate task was undertaken by Dr. Pech, and was very ably accomplished. Haydn's instrumentation was strictly preserved, Dr. Pech simply adding the necessary wood and brass wind instruments to give richness, shading and coloring to the beautiful outlines. He effected this in a masterly manner, and with so nice an appreciation of the original, that we believe Haydn himself would have approved of the traditions.

Mendelssohn's immortal "Hymn of Praise" formed the second part of the concert, and it is to be regretted that, from the length of the programme, some portions of that exquisite work were necessarily omitted, and the regret was more keenly felt from the fact, that that which was given was so admirably performed. Of the symphonic movements the third number—the adagio religioso—was omitted, but the other two movements were superbly played. The first, maestoso-allegro, presented no points for criticism; it was read in the true spirit of the author, and was executed without a blemish. The second movement, allegretto un poco agitato, was taken, almost for the first time in this city, since its first performance, twenty years ago, in the right time. It is usually taken too fast, which robs the subject of its pathos, and the episodic chorale of its dignity. On this occasion both had their due weight, and with the exception of a want of sufficient emphasis in the delivery of the theme, the whole movement was exquisitely interpreted. It was a tone poem, as eloquent in its expression as any passage delivered by an inspired orator. It was loudly applauded, and the general sentiment was a desire for its repetition.

The difficult opening chorus and the still more difficult final chorus, were sung with admirable promptness, force, and vigor. There was no feeling the way, and bursting forth when confident; but the points were up taken upon the heat, with boldness of attack and solidity of tone. After the first chorus, we felt no anxiety for the rest; it was evident that every faculty of the singers was intent upon the work, and that the conductor had got them thoroughly in his hand—that they were mutually reliant. The result justified our faith, for no hesitation or wavering was observable from the first to the last. We have rarely heard finer shading or more delicate singing than in the beautiful chorus, "All ye that cried unto the Lord," and the chorus to the duet, "I Waited for the Lord." They were rendered to perfection. The conductor gave the true reading to the chorus, "All ye that cried," which is usually taken too slow, and to the air, "Sing ye praises," which is always taken too fast, and by so doing secured a fine artistic contrast. These tempi will be disputed by some, but to our mind they are clearly indicated by the character of the music, and they are certainly justified by the result.

The calm beauty of this music is not suited to the style of Mrs. Mixsell, neither is its simplicity calculated to display her voice to advantage. She, however, attacked it with earnestness, and evidenced a desire to do it justice. In the exquisite duet "I waited for the Lord," the voices of Mrs. Mixsell and Mmc. Salvotti by no means harmonized, but the work was sung correctly.

The instrumental accompaniments, so full of grandeur, and abounding with countless points of beauty, were finely executed. The orchestra was, in truth, a splendid one, and followed the conductor's thought as with one impulse. Too much praise cannot be awarded them. Chorally and orchestrally the concert was a marked and brilliant success, and we doubt if there is another man in the country who, like Dr. Pech, could, on the one hand, wield the comparatively raw vocal material, and, on the other hand, control the splendid orchestral resources, with two rehearsals, with so truly admirable a result. He has proved himself master of the situation, and has vindicated his claim to the position we awarded him from the first, as one of the ablest conductors in America.

Mozart's "Don Juan."

If, as Fétis remarks, the "Idomeneo" of Mozart be the basis of all the music of the present day, "Don Juan" lies as the centre of all human intelligence with regard to operatic writing, not only in this day but for all other days. It is possible that there may be operas more pleasing to the ear than Mozart's "Juan," more passionate to the heart, tinged with a deeper personal sorrow, displaying more of the controversial schools in composition—but never again can there be such a romantic, innocent-hearted description of the denial of the infinite life and the humiliation of the present as seen in Mozart's portraiture of the scenes in "Don Juan." Professor Ruskin, in considering it the greatest prostitution of the greatest musical genius that has ever yet appeared upon earth, has judged hardly and harshly of the poor composer. He was not in the situation of Meyerbeer, and the Bertram of Meyerbeer is not the Juan of Mozart. Mozart lived by his pen; and when the Viennese publisher told him that unless he could write in a more popular style, he would buy no more manuscript of him, the prompt reply of the artist told of both his necessity and his honesty—"Then I had better starve and go to destruction at once." He was never in the position to choose his subjects; but the facts to be described, if not in unison with his disposition, never affected his artistic power. He saw that great things in art often failed from want of an admixture with the lower and meaner circumstances of life, and he accepted the combination, but not with any intention that it should circumscribe or debase the action of his own great heart. "Don Juan" was with him at first a necessity, and afterwards a deliberate choice, but he knew his own powers and instincts. He had to paint the true reprobate—one who was never sorry for anything he did and never intended to be; repentance was a word cut out of his dictionary; and when the Stone-Ghost cried out, "Repent," and the serving man joined in the entreaty, he could see nothing to repent of. Mozart had no sympathy in such a creed, his temperament and emotional tendencies were altogether opposed to it, and in the affluence of perfect artistic power, he well knew he could reveal it. This great artist who could write to his father and say, "I never lie down in bed without thinking I may never see another day, but I have no fear, for death alone fulfils the real design of life, and is the key to true happiness," cannot be considered as prostituting his genius when painting in all the intensity of burning passion the impotent struggle and nothingness of such a creed as the libertine's.

The great charm of the opera is the innocent way in which Mozart conceives and treats every incident. Is it something about love—Zerlina, Donna Anna, or even Elvira? Then comes forth the strong tenderness of affection—the man who sends a "million of kisses" to his wife—and he instantly weaves a little scene of true, honest feeling, a chapter in human life, sweet and solemn, as coming from one who holds certain belief in the purity of woman and in the faith of man. In the "Batti, batti," and the "Vedrai carino" of Zerlina, there is as much of the true spiritual life—the infinite existence—of maiden affection, as in the larger framed songs of Donna Anna and her lover Ottavio. Haydn could not realize anything of this kind, but he appreciated keenly the power he himself failed in, when he remarked "It is the affecting emotion, the deep musical intelligence, that makes Mozart the greatest composer living." Meyerbeer could not do it; indeed, the only bit of feeling shown in the Bertram is when the poor wretch (in the recitative) reflects it is all of no use, for he is irrecoverably damned. Even in the case of Leporello, Mozart's good heart makes the servant show a true affection for his master when in real affliction and danger. The Ghost asks Juan to come and sup with him; "No, no, don't," is the instant answer of the joker of jokes, and he is as earnest as the marble visitant in his prayer for sorrow and amendment on the part of the disappearing hero. And, amid the heartless fun and merriment created out of the woes of the poor abandoned and half demented lady, Leporello drops in with lovely tunes of melody sympathetic of her melancholy, and marvellously advantageous to the expression of the situation. It was Mozart's mission to reform the musical drama; he felt this, and made it the object of his life; all his thoughts were dependent on this condition of his mind, and gave him that high tone and advancing impulse which mark all he did. The only

"Don Juan" to match that of Mozart is the "Juan" of Lord Byron; but then the two lie at the opposite points of the compass. Lord Byron in his "Don Juan"—a work of enormous power—is describing himself. Mozart, like the poets of the golden age, describes the cruelty and injustice of the libertine as a scene on the dark side of human nature which has come to him to be dealt with as thinker and artist, and manifests, by his individual mode of treatment, his power to realize the position, and yet look down upon it as one placed immeasurably beyond its sphere and influence. As with Byron, Don Juan is always Byron, so with Mozart, whatever is going on, Mozart is foremost, and therefore there never is anything very bad; for so great an optimist is he, that he tries to reform the unreformable and never stays to reason upon the improbability of the attempt. Don Juan's duet with Zerlina, "La ci darem," is a genuine bit of real feeling; there is no hard-heartedness in him now, although, unlike Faust, he does not care a bodkin for the girl. Faust does love Margaret, but Juan is not in this case with Zerlina, and yet no interpreter of Faust has ever put so much real love-song into his mouth as Mozart pours out of the lips of the professed deceiver.

The opera failed at Vienna, being badly mounted, badly rehearsed, badly played, badly sung, and worse understood. In fact, it was incomprehensible, and people said Mozart must re-write it, for it satisfied no one. The "Azur," a new opera by Salieri, succeeded against it. Mozart declined changing any part of his work, and congratulated the public on their preference for Salieri—ugly music to ugly men; rubbish to rubbish. Mozart was beyond their habitual train of thought. Salieri was not. The Viennese publisher was no doubt right, and Mozart had shot over the heads of the profession and the general public. That he died a few years after and was buried in the pauper burial-ground between a huckster and midwife, and at an expense of about twenty shillings, and without a friend to follow him to the grave, are very significant facts as to the state of music in his day in Vienna, and the dog's life he must have led. The magnificent set, the grand finales, the supernatural recitatives for ghost and hero, were all too big for singers, players, and audience. Mozart had dealt with true passionate love in unusual and unconventional forms; he had realized its grace and beauty, its exaltation and refinement; he had put into the drama what the poet had never dreamt of; he had never stayed his hand, or stinted his imagination; never sacrificed aught to timid or prudential motives; thought little or nothing of public opinion; had gone beyond his art into the divine regions of the heart and the imagination—and the public declined to follow, preferring the material life, and abjuring all new desires, and reforming aspirations. Mozart had aimed to go beyond himself, and he had done so; it was an unnecessary effort, an indulgence not to be forgiven. So he passed to more symphonies and other operas; saving himself from starvation by composing dances and impromptus and short pieces for people who could not play. As was said of Beethoven, Mozart in his latter days had become unintelligible, an error he endeavoured to correct in his "Magic Flute," by the introduction of the comic element in a more Teutonic shape, and with the realism of a ring of bells. The attributes of the old Egyptian philosophy—endurance, gentleness, charity, self-denial, and heavenly contemplation, required a strong saccharine sop, and Mozart added the sop with good will and without stint.

The superb casts of the "Don Juan" have long made the opera a great favourite, although long after its first presentation in England (1817), the Italian troupe fought shy of its great difficulties. The lady singers disliked the fetters of the orchestral accompaniments; but all such dislikes have long passed away. The advance of the "Robert" made the "Juan" easy to all, and Meyerbeer placed Mozart and his opera in the place he will ever occupy. There is nothing like a comparison between differences, especially when there is lavish luxury of genius on the one hand, opposed only against hard, dry, and painstaking mechanism on the other. Mozart had the head, hand, and heart—and, further, the good motive. He was always up to real passionate heat.

Music as a Moral Agent.

Music is as ancient as the world itself. Were it necessary to cite authorities to prove this, we should be only embarrassed which to select. It all times man has sung himself, or made instruments do so. But, even had this not been the case, the birds of the air would be sufficient to attest that music was synchronous with Creation. What appears new in this art, and what is so really, is the form it has assumed since the sixteenth century. Until the time of Monteverde, who introduced in harmony the chord of the seventh on the dominant, music possessed a religious and placid character, which is preserved even in productions of a light description. Nearly all the airs of this period have a tender, melancholy, unctuous expression, essentially distinguishing them from modern music. The least practised ear recognizes in them an element not to be found elsewhere. Generally, they are characterized by a vague sadness which penetrates the soul. We feel in them something strange and contrary to our habits; a mixture, apparently, of religious and profane emotions. Old people are fond of hearing these ancient songs, and young people do not despise them.

For musicians who are tolerably well read, there is no mystery about the character peculiar to these compositions. We find in such good old airs the last vestiges of the ancient tonal system. It is still plain-song, with its varied modes, which breathes in the strain, gay or sad. Hence the slightly religious expression which is mixed up with the mundane ideas of the poetry. If we take a madrigal by Monteverde or by Palestrina, we shall be struck by the mystic coloring we have just described. It exists in all the works of this epoch, and maintained its footing so long, that the compositions of the eighteenth century are not completely free from it.

Even in our own days, this mitigated form of the ancient system of tonality has been employed. Meyerbeer has put it in the mouth of the Anabaptists of his Prophète. The effect is striking. This ought not to surprise us, for it would seem to be the property of music to reflect the human soul, which is, by nature, profoundly sad. But may we not start from this point to search for a system of musical æsthetics which shall fully and perfectly satisfy the idea we have formed of this great art. Music, in its actual form, dates only from yesterday. Since modern tonality has introduced human passions into the lyrical drama, master-pieces have been written, but no direction has been given for the genius of musicians to follow. The way in which they grope about in their inspirations proves plainly that music is a new art. For the last century, no man of genius has appeared without a revolution being the result. Such was the case with Rameau, with Gluck, on the stage; with Mozart and Beethoven, in the symphony. Each of these names, and we might cite a great many more, represents a phase of musical art. There is a subversion of ideas attached to it. These men, perfectly unappreciated at the outset, have afterwards been greeted with rapture, because they caused art, which was considered stationary, to advance a step.

At the present day, however, after proclaiming that music is favorable to the moral progress of nations, we seemed to have stopped at a decisive form, of which the most sublime prototype is to be found in the works of Mozart.

Despite such musicians as are led away by pride or by incapacity, the musical horizon is clearing up more and more in the direction of Germany. The classic land of the Lied and of the Symphony is trembling as at the dawn of a new era. Philosophers and poets are gazing intently at a point which stands out from the night, and casts far, very far into the future, a strong light, inundating the human ant-hill. A name, which never vibrates on respectful lips without finding an immediate response, has been, for some years past, pronounced all along the banks of the Rhine, and repeated beyond the frontiers of the North. This name, which we just now wrote, is that of Mozart! Mozart the golden-mouthed, as he is called by an eminent critic, in reference to his Christian name of Chrysostom.

All men's eyes are turned towards this luminous name. As the distance becomes greater between us and the earthly existence of the author of Don Juan, the more do his works free themselves from the veil of the Past; they appear to us more radiant and more pure, as though they had borrowed the light of eternity from their composer's immortal soul.

This slow, instructive, and universal return towards the source of light, of which every spark is destined to kindle a world of ideas, is a happy reaction for art. It is an incontestable proof of an ancient alliance between music and man. We draw nearer Mozart, because no other musician has collected in his heart the human affections which flowed over in the heart of Mozart. We perceive moving in this great man's music all that constitutes the life of our souls. His music is the very epopee of nations. It is constituted of hopes, of sadness, of recollections, and of aspirations. It is religious, for it seeks God in the blue sky; it is Christian and democratic, because it breathes a love for all created beings and things. We see, therefore, in the conceptions of Mozart, the argument proving that music is really destined to effect the civilization of nations. If by civilization we understand the development of the moral faculties, a greater outpouring of heart, and a stronger bond, founded on profounder convictions, between individuals, it is the works of Mozart which should be taken as a basis, by musicians, as well as by statesmen who entertain the legitimate notion of rendering the masses moral by the medium of music.

As we said at the commencement, fine music is at bottom melancholy. This is true of the two centuries and a half which succeeded the introduction of the modern system of tonality, as it is of all that was done previously to that event. It is by this elegiac element that music first obtained possession of man's sympathy. It is by this that music will act upon future generations.

There is always a certain amount of sadness at the bottom of human affairs. Mozart expresses joy with a charm peculiar to himself, because it was a part of his delicate nature to perceive the mixed composition of it. That musician alone will live and regenerate the world who will identify himself most completely with man. Music must excite great thoughts; place itself in communication with the soul; and foster everything good and generous which the latter contains.

Reader, you have heard the wonderful harmonies in Don Juan and in Die Zauberflöte. You have felt touched, as by the reminiscences of the years of your youth. It was in fact those reminiscences whose song was heard in your heart. Your fond dreams returned; the sweet faces you loved bent once more over you. You loved your mother, your sister, your fair and gentle companions, running on the sward. The Sundays, all ablaze with sunshine, appeared again before you, with the young girls in their cool bodilices and their irreproachable costumes, fluttering with ribbonds. You gazed on a form, which was that of an angel, as it fled into the welcome shade of the wood; you listened to sounds which resembled the rustling of wings; you have thought of the vision which follows us in life; which never quits the firmament in which our eyes are fixed, and which goes before us, like the Star of the Shepherds. You heard voices which never advocated apostasy, treason, egotism, falsehood, or cowardice. You listened to those voices which are heard in the spring of life, like the song of birds in the spring of Nature. Those voices commanded you to love, and to attach but little value to the rest. As you listened to them in the grand and magical symphonies of Mozart, you felt you were a better man. Your soul opened more freely. The tears started to your eyes—tears at the recollection of those who were absent. You felt strengthened; you felt fresh youth; you felt you were purified from the stains of life by the effect which the chaste accents of such Divine music produced upon you. You thought as you thought when you were twenty; you loved as you loved at that age, which is blessed by Heaven; and your Ideal, the beloved One, regarding you from her azure throne, said: "Tis well!"

LOUIS ROCCA.

[Here is a choice bit of criticism, found in the New York Evening Post. So "fools rush in where angels fear to tread!"]

Mozart in 1870.

To the Editors of the Evening Post:

In glancing over your columns yesterday, the notice of the debut of the English opera troupe in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" attracted my attention as being the only one I have yet seen which shows an independence of the dry old traditions of musical art; but your critic is not half strong enough in his remarks. Will you permit me, on behalf of the many attendants at the Academy of Music, on Monday night, who found the much-vaunted music of Mozart decidedly dull, to express in plainer terms their disappointment?

I distinctly maintain that were the "Marriage of Figaro" to be offered to the public as the work of any modern composer it would have an uninterrupted run of one night. Its music is thin and uninteresting. The yawns of the audience Monday evening proved this. Out in the lobbies, musicians, opera-singers and critics freely acknowledged to themselves that the music was antiquated and tedious; but they—especially the critics—will not dare to say as much when outside of the Ring.

As a musical amateur I claim to be familiar with Mozart's music, and for his undoubted genius I have high reverence. His masses are sublime. His grander operas were a great advance on anything that preceded them. His music, however, has served its purpose, and its day has passed away, just as the days of stage coaches and sailing packets have. When Meyerbeer's, and Verdi's, and Pacini's, and Mercadante's, and Donizetti's, and Gounod's music can be had, why must I be bored with those works of Mozart which, like the "Figaro," are his weakest? Why must I hear his endless mannerisms and tame self-plagiarisms? Why must I listen to a comedy of vulgar intrigue, couched in childish semi-idiotic language, because to it is wedded music in which three or four charming melodies seem only like oases in a dreary desert? Why must the critics and tradition lovers cling to this antiquated music simply because it is by Mozart?

I am told that in this opera the Parepa troupe in their travels have been unusually successful, that it has everywhere drawn crowded and delighted houses. This can be naturally explained. In the western villages musical appreciation is not as advanced as in the metropolis, and this little comedy with its pigmy music suits the artistic development of the villagers. Let them have it by all means, but let us in our leading metropolitan opera house have operas of the present day. I do not wish to wear a pigtail or powder my hair because Mozart did; neither do I wish to hear his music, especially when his weakest works are selected. I regret to see a great artist like Parepa wasting her time in old-fashioned trivialities. She might quite as consistently wear a poke bonnet and dress like her great-grandmother.

Of course the tradition-lovers will praise the "Marriage of Figaro" to the skies. Perhaps the next few generations of them will howl in the same way over Verdi's music when he too shall have become antiquated and superseded by better forms of musical development; but the world at large will recognise that art as well as the material sciences progresses, and does not retrograde. AMATEUR.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 8.—On Saturday evening Feb. 26, I attended the 4th concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. We had the following programme:

2d Symphony, C. op. 140.....	Ref.
Cavatina, "Di plauer".....	Rossini.
Quartet for "French Horn".....	Miss Kellogg.
Overture, Melema .....	Weber.
"Ah non credea" and "Ah non giungo".....	Bargiel.
Overture, "Columbus".....	Miss Kellogg.
	G. F. Bristow.

The Symphony was the same that was played at the 2d concert of our New York Society, and was performed even better than upon that occasion. The other orchestral pieces were also carefully rendered, and the concert was in every respect a very enjoyable one. No question can be raised with regard to any supposed inferiority of either Society to the other, for the orchestra is almost precisely the same, excepting in number. At the Brooklyn concerts there are usually 60 instrumentalists, and at our own concerts there are usually 100.

It gives me great pleasure to say that Miss Kellogg sang uncommonly well. She was less excellent in the Rossini aria than in the selections from "Son-nambula"; but her performance of the "Ah non credea" was really admirable, and I have never known her to sing as well; the Brooklyn Academy being much smaller than our "Catacombs," her clear, thin voice filled it nicely. She received, in each instance, a very decided and demonstrative encore, which she acknowledged by singing, 1st, a French chanson, and 2nd, Mozart's delightful "Deh vieni," which was emphatically her best effort during the evening.

The quartet for horns was quite interesting, although at times it did seem a little tedious. The programme was, however, quite a short one, and it would have been pleasant to have an instrumental solo of some kind. In every way the concert was a success, and the character of the programme was beyond reproach.

On Saturday evening, March 5th, we had the 4th concert of our Society, with the assistance of Mr. Bergner ('cello), and Mrs. Davison (soprano). I append the programme :

Overture, "Magic Flute".....Mozart.
Quintet. Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, Horn.....Rietz.
Scenes and Aria, "Der Freischütz".....Weber.
Mrs. Davison.
Fantasia, "Air Russe".....Kummer.
Mr. Bergner.
Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann.
5th Symphony, C minor.....Beethoven.

It seemed to me that Mr. Bergmann took the tempo of the "Magic Flute" Overture a shade too rapidly, as was also the case with the concluding pages of the 4th movement of the Symphony; otherwise the orchestral playing was quite up, perhaps, to its usual standard of excellence. The magnificent "Genoveva" and the Andante from the Symphony were the especial orchestral excellencies of the evening.

Mr. Bergner is so emphatically and unmistakably a true artist that it is a pleasure to speak of anything in which he takes a prominent part. He played the "Air Russe" with all his usual excellence of execution and clearness of tone, and won from the audience very warm demonstrations of satisfaction and delight. He replied to the encore merely by bowing, thereby setting a good example to ambitious amateurs who eagerly grasp anything which bears the remotest resemblance to a recall.

Mrs. Davison is a lady possessing a very good soprano voice, which is as yet only in the early stages of cultivation (apparently). In the "Prayer" and Aria from "Der Freischütz" it was very evident that her voice was totally inadequate for the rapid and brilliant bravura passages of the Aria; possibly at some future time she will become a singer of ability and excellence, especially if in the meantime she devotes herself resolutely to study and practice. At present she is a very pains-taking but quite mediocre vocalist, whose sphere is emphatically a moderate sized concert room.

The quintet for wind instruments, with orchestral accompaniment, was very attractive and pleasing, although not strikingly original either in ideas or treatment. It was very neatly rendered by the five gentlemen (members of the Society) to whom it was entrusted.

On Monday evening, March 7, Miss Mehlig (pianiste) gave a concert at Steinway Hall, being assisted by the following artists: Mr. Werner ('cello), Mr. Kopta (violin), Mr. J. P. Morgan (organ), Mr. S. B. Mills, Mr. Fradel (accompanist), and by Mlle. Clara Perl "from the Vienna Imperial Opera." I quote the programme :

Trio, E flat. Pianoforte, violin, 'cello.....F. Schubert.
Aria, "Tancredi," [Mlle. Perl].....Rossini.
Fantasiestück.....Schumann.
Prelude and Fugue, E minor.....Mendelssohn.
Mlle. Mehlig.
Violoncello Solo. Aria and Gavotte.....Bach.
Spinneried, [arr. by Liszt].....Wagner.
Mlle. Mehlig.
Violin Solo. Adagio from Mendelssohn's Concerto.
Mr. Kopta.
Arioso. "Prophète".....Meyerbeer.
Mlle. Perl.
Hexameron, Duo for 2 pianos.....Liszt.
[Manuscript. 1st time in America].
Mlle. Mehlig and Mr. Mills.

This was one of the finest and most enjoyable musical entertainments of the season, and brought together at least 1400 appreciative people (mostly Germans), notwithstanding the storm and the very slippery condition of the pavements.

Miss Mehlig played with much more force and vigor than at her former concert, and acquitted herself superbly in everything which she undertook, unless we except Chopin's Impromptu in C sharp (in response to an encore), which she interpreted in a very peculiar and scarcely satisfactory way. I still think, as I said in a former letter, that she takes too much liberty with the tempo occasionally, and errs sometimes in an exaggeration, so to speak, of expression. [?] Her rendering of Mendelssohn's Fugue was a marvellous achievement, and it was at once evident that, unequal as may be her merits, this lady is a consummate artist. The most wonderful feature of her performance of the Fugue was a very gradual, carefully planned accelerando (with crescendo), which Mlle. M. played resistlessly, moving us all with her.

In the Duo with Mr. Mills (which proved to be an arrangement of a theme from Puritani), the wonderful evenness and clearness of the scale passages, and the artistic exactitude with which each artist played, all combined to accomplish a splendid success, and to fairly electrify the large audience.

Mr. Kopta, in the Trio and in his solo, played with all the finished execution and beautiful clearness of tone for which he is so justly distinguished, and was materially assisted, in the Mendelssohn Andante, by the very careful accompaniment, which was delightfully played by Mr. F. Von Inten.

As for Mlle. Perl (her first appearance here) she has a contralto voice of some compass, of much crude power, and of curiously dissonant quality. Mr. Werner, the violoncellist, played carefully and well, and has a very good tone although not very strong; the effect of his solo was somewhat marred by the fact that the organ and piano, by which he was accompanied, were not at all in accord with each other.

(From a private letter.)

BERLIN, JAN. 20.—My usual evening abode is the "Concert-Haus" where Bilse's orchestra plays. They play well, though not so well as Pasdeloup's. The orchestra is small for Europe. Only five double basses and six 'celli. They do manage to get a very good pianissimo and crescendo, though their fortissimo is noisy. The most striking defect in the band is an obstreperous first oboe that is perfectly ear-piercing and never by any chance plays softly. Bilse has given us two or three tastes of Hector Berlioz, but the German orchestra does not play the French music any better than the Paris orchestra played the later Beethoven Symphonies. The other evening, I heard for the first time Wagner's "Faust Overture," and cannot express how much I liked it. It is very sombre and abstruse, but that the subject demands.

Last evening I heard the first movement from Anton Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony; I was very much surprised and delighted by it. There is a marked individuality about it, which is a rare thing to find in composers now-a-days. Is Rubinstein a Russian? The music is just as individual and un-German as Gade's is. Gade is to me thoroughly un-German in his nature, although his style is German, that is to say neither French nor Italian. Berlioz is essentially French in his individuality, but his musical forms and the structure of his pieces have very little if anything in common with what is generally known as French music. Everything I have heard of his strikes me as thoroughly artistic and often intellectual. He is in strong contrast to Meyerbeer, whose "Bénédiction des poignards" I heard last evening. The man seems to have gone mad with the idea that he was a great contrapuntist. He never loses a chance of getting in some little bit of imitation, even if he makes everybody on the stage and half the orchestra wait with one foot in the air while the last instrument finishes the figure. He loses sight of the fact that the real art in counterpoint is to make each part flow smoothly, but does his imitation by letting one voice sing a bar and then wait while the next voice repeats it like an echo,—ce qui n'est pas difficile, and can be done just as easily with twenty obligato parts as with two or three, if you only let each part wait long enough for the others to get through. I have heard of the "Bénédiction des poignards" all my life and expected to be carried away. It makes noise enough, certainly, but I don't think it compares with the "O sommo Carlo" in Ernani, either for melodic or harmonic beauty or grandeur, and it certainly has nothing of the clan of Verdi's finale. Then compare the famous trio of the last act of "Les Huguenots" with the final trio in Ernani, and see which is the greatest! To be sure the idea of announcing the appearance of the heavenly hosts by an altissimo trill of a piccolo flute solo has some degree of originality in it, but even that idea may have been borrowed from the scene shifter's whistle.

I have heard for the third time Ambroise Thomas's Overture to "Mignon," and think, still more than at first, that it is an instance of the most outrageous abuse of the good gifts of heaven in the shape of a charming theme, that was ever perpetrated by man! The theme of the Allegro is original and to me very beautiful, but it is smothered by such an amount of trombone, tuba, drum, cymbals and vulgarity of every sort, that its beauty is all lost. Was Mignon or any of her relations a rope-dancer? There is a general air of tight-rope that pervades the whole overture.

I heard Stern's (late Taubert's) orchestra the other afternoon. The orchestra is painfully small (only 4 contrabassi) but they play wonderfully, and Stern takes his movements slow enough even to suit me.

The Dresden Musical world is about nothing as far as I can find out. Rubinstein and Tausig come there once or twice in the winter and give a concert, and perhaps Joachim shows his face there once a year. Old Burde-Ney had her name up in the streets when I was there. There are two contrabassi in the Royal Opera orchestra and the singers are scandalous. The military bands are fine, and I believe there are concerts on the Brüllsche Terrasse and in the Grosse Garten. The Link'sches Bad has been turned into a casino. You can tell anybody on L's authority and on mine, that the Freischütz has been better given in Boston than it was this winter in Dresden. FIL.

LIVERPOOL. The London Musical World says :

We are apt to think that London monopolizes the good music heard in England, save when London goes to the country to hold high festival. This idea is far from correct. Some provincial towns are equal to the metropolis as regards activity and the facilities for gratifying an artistic taste. What Mr. Hallé has done at Manchester everybody knows, but we wish to illustrate our remarks more particularly by reference to Liverpool. In this great seaport music is chiefly represented by a Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. Benedict is conductor. This society gives twelve concerts yearly—concerts of high character as regards the selections. What music pleases the Liverpudlians, and how much they get, may be seen from the following catalogue of works performed during the last two years:—

"Oratorios, Masses, and Sacred Cantatas.—Handel: Messiah (twice), Judas Maccabeus, and Coronation Anthem (Zadok the Priest). Haydn: Creation and the Seasons (Spring and Autumn). Mendelssohn: Elijah, 95th Psalm, and 'Hear my Prayer.' Beethoven: Mass in C. W. Sterndale Bennett: The Woman of Samaria. Gounod: Messe de Sainte Cecile. Rossini: Messe Solennelle and Siabat (twice.) Cantatas and choral works, with orchestral accompaniments.—Mendelssohn: Midsummer Night's Dream; Finale and choruses from Loreley. J. F. Barnett: Ancient Mariner. Benedict: Richard Cœur de Lion. Symphonies.—Beethoven: No. 3, Eroica; No. 4, B flat; No. 5, C minor; No. 6, Pastoral; No. 7, A major. Haydn: No. 8, E flat; and No. 10, E flat. Mendelssohn: Reformation (twice), and No. 4, A major (Italian). Mozart: E flat; G minor. Spohr: No. 5, in C minor. Overtures.—Auber: Exhibition, Fiancée, Gustave, Masaniello, Les Diamants, Leopoldine, Le Serment, Zanetta. Beethoven: Egmont and Men of Prometheus. Benedict: Prinz von Homburg. Boieldieu: La Dame Blanche. Cherubini: Les Abencerrages and Medea. Hérold: Zampa. Lindpaintner: Faust. Mendelssohn: Athalie, Midsummer Night's Dream (twice), and Ruy Blas. Meyerbeer: Camp of Silesia, L'Etoile du Nord, and Struensee. Méhul: Joseph and Chasse du Jeune Henri.

Mozart: Così fan tutte, Seraglio, and Zauberflöte. Nicolai: Merry Wives of Windsor. Onslow: Le Colporteur. Rossini: Italiana in Algeri, Gazza Ladra, Semiramide, and Guillaume Tell. Spohr: Der Berggeist and Last Judgment. Weber: Ruler of Spirits, Euryanthe, and Preziosa. Wagner: Tannhäuser. Concertos and solos with orchestral accompaniments. — Violin: Beethoven's Concerto, Ernst's fantasia, Otello, E. W. Thomas's Barcarolle and Tarantelle. Violoncello: Carl Eckert's Concertstück, B. Romberg's Adagio and Rondo from Concert Suisse. Pianoforte: Mendelssohn's Rondo in B minor (twice), Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat; Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise.

For comprehensiveness and quantity that list surpasses any that could be furnished by either of the metropolitan associations.

About the year 1800, Joseph Haydn, on his return from England, stopped for some time at the Monastery of the Premonstratensians, in Ochsenhausen, near Biberach, in Würtemberg. The monks residing there were of a highly musical turn, and the good understanding between them and their guest resulted in a request, at his departure, that he would leave them some original composition as a souvenir. In complying, he chose six proverbs as so many themes, viz.: "It is the first step that costs;" "Look before you leap;" "Birds of a feather flock together;" "Saum cuique;" "Too much of a good thing is good for nothing;" "All's well that ends well;" and set them to music for four voices. These compositions are said to bear the stamp of the master, and to be infused with the happiest humor. In "Saum cuique," each of the four voices sings in a different time, as is most appropriate. On the breaking up of the convent Haydn's pieces passed into the hands of one of the fathers, and finally came to be the property of precentor Kaim, of Biberach, who has just had them engraved and published at Munich.

PRAGUE.—The members of the celebrated Florentine Quartet were the objects of a murderous and cowardly attempt on their lives, during their way from Olmütz to this city. As they were passing Pardubitz, the window of the railway carriage occupied by them was shattered by a bullet, which lodged in the case containing the famous Stradivarius, on which Herr Jean Becker always plays. Luckily, the valuable instrument was not damaged. Herr Becker, on the contrary, was somewhat seriously injured by the fragments of the glass which were scattered about in all directions. The motive and the perpetrator of this dastardly outrage are unknown, but the police are actively employed in trying to discover at least the perpetrator.

BOSTON, MARCH 26, 1870.

Musical High Tide.

Most unmusical, uncomfortable of all months is March, and April often not much better. Yet, strangely, with the snows and rains and East winds, we are deluged with musical entertainments. Just when all are weary and can least endure distracting multitudinous excitement, come more solicitations (many of them tempting) than it is possible to give but a hurried half attention to. It is the misfortune of our musical life in Boston, that it never rains but it pours. What through three quarters of the year we long in vain to hear, comes down upon us all at once in a few winter months, and is more and more heaped upon us, like the snows over the northern country, just in this period of our limbo, the opening of what poets call the Spring. How much better it would be if all these fine opportunities were more equally distributed over the whole year, so that the long summer liesure too might share them, and each season get such moderate portion only as admits of full enjoyment and digestion. As it is, the concert record of the present month here—say from the middle of March to the middle of April, —bids fair to be as crowded and bewildering as that of the London season. In orchestral music alone, this short space is tantalizingly rich with three Harvard Symphony Concerts, to be followed by eight "Symphonic and Popular Concerts" of Theodore Thomas and his Orchestra crowded into one week! Of Chamber Concerts, there are Mr. Petersilea's third and fourth "Receptions," Mr. Perabo's two Soirées, Mr. Tracy's "Recitals"—all mainly of piano music—and, most memorable of all, the Complimentary Matinée to Miss Mehlig. To which add several more at the Conservatories. Then the two evenings of the Parker (vocal) Club; a public rehearsal by "the Boston Chorus" of the "Creation;" the "farewell" Concert of Mrs. C. A. Barry; the Annual Concert of Mr. Peck; &c., &c. Most of these larger Music Hall concerts offer the great attraction of Miss Mehlig. As if all this were not enough, comes suddenly Italian Opera, nightly for two weeks at the Boston Theatre. And the Great Organ we have always with us.

An expatriated musical Bostonian, one who knows what is what in music, might find a rich and curious feast in running his eye over the programmes of all this. We will spread out here what we can of it; but doubtless some of the salient points will so arrest attention that we shall hardly get half through the list to-day.

TENTH AND LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The fifth successful season of the Harvard Musical Association maintained its prestige, both for Art and audience, to the end. The great Music Hall on Thursday afternoon (17th) was filled, as it had been nine times before, with more than two thousand eagerly attentive and delighted listeners; this time to the following programme:

1. Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis,".....Gluck.
2. Tenor Aria: "Nur ein Wunsch, nur ein Verlangen," from "Iphigenia in Tauris,".....Gluck.
August Kreissmann.
3. Septet, for Pianoforte, Flute, Oboe, Horn, Violin, Violoncello, and Double Bass.....Hummel.
Ernest Perabo, and Messrs. F. Zochler, Ribas, Hermann, Heindl, A. Suck and Stein.
1. Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann.
2. Cycle of Songs: "Dichterliebe" (Heine),.....Schumann.
August Kreissmann.
3. Overture to "Oberon,".....Weber.

The Schumann Symphony in C had been given in the first and second seasons of these concerts. We are tempted to recall the impression it made upon us then,—which we endeavored to express as follows:

The presence of true genius, in one of its great creative efforts, happily inspired too, was unmistakable to most listeners; albeit with the many expressions of satisfaction there have been mingled some complaints about the difficulty of understanding it, the strain upon the mind, &c. It was so with the yet greater Symphonies of Beethoven upon the first and second hearing. It is true that there is in the first movement something a little sickly, some spasmodic and some dreary traits, suggestions of pain and the struggle to be sound and well; for, as Schumann said, that movement was composed in a period of illness, and it seems to typify a healthy resolution, summoning up power from the centre, to resist and overcome the fitting pains and wayward fancies of a fevered brain. But it is laid out upon a broad, clear plan, which it develops logically and with commanding power, and it is full of beauties both of melodic thoughts and harmony and instrumental color. The adherence to the one key, or rather the reference and tendency to the C major, throughout all the four movements, with but little variation, is characteristic of the work. This in the slow introduction is marked in the bold, firm trumpet and horn tones, while the strings move dreamily and sadly, in undertone, groping up into the daylight (the tonic) from the shadows of the subdominant. Again, too, the unity is felt in the way in which the leading themes of the Allegro are foreshadowed in passages of the introduction; indeed the whole Symphony has its germs there. The oftener you listen to that Allegro, the less you feel the sickliness, and the more you enjoy the beauty and splendor of the triumph; the trumpet tones, challenging so boldly in the first bars, carry it.

The second movement is a true Scherzo, still in C, revelling in fine fairy sport, although perpetually modulating, as the leading melodic phrase woven into its whole texture keeps rapidly traversing diminished-seventh intervals. But how cheery those answering calls from flutes above and bassoons below, each in thirds! and how delightfully the latter climb to meet the former sometimes! If the joy is subtle, delicate and dreamy here, it becomes breezy and exhilarating in the triplets of the first Trio, (which returns into the Scherzo); and then a pensive mood comes over the same joy in the second Trio, where the staccato contrapuntal figure of the violas and cellos accompanies the even flow of the chief subject; and then how gracefully the moonlight fairy Scherzo theme steals back again!

In the Adagio (which, beginning in C minor, ends in C major) the soul, set free by this magical power of Art in which it has thus far revelled, rises into tranquil ecstasy, "a deep dream of peace," where all is heavenly and beautiful. Possibly the conception is just enough beyond the power of perfect execution in an orchestra, sometimes to disturb the enjoyment a little; we allude to such places as those long climbing trills of the violins upon the very highest notes, which will sound a little shrill and creaky in any short of an ideal performance; but has not the composer a right to claim some ideality of the listener? In the Finale, the spirit rouses itself from the swer, dreamy rapture of the Adagio into what one of Schumann's biographers calls "a jubilant, heaven-storming happiness." Ganymed-like, you are borne aloft by Jove's strong eagle, and in the full noonday sunshine of C major.

The time the Symphony had the advantage of an orchestra larger and better trained than then, and of a more familiar acquaintance in a large part of the audience with the spirit and the ways of Schumann. It certainly was listened to throughout by the whole multitude with the closest attention, and with every sign of deep interest and pleasure, in spite perhaps of a somewhat puzzled expression on some countenances. The Scherzo with its two Trios is a marvellously fine imaginative creation, and both this and the profound beauty of the Adagio, were rendered with a purity and clearness which we are inclined to look upon as the happiest achievement so far of our orchestra. Mr. ZERRAHN may be congratulated on leading them through such labyrinths of difficulty with such ease and certainty. There are passages in this work where Schumann strikes almost the very vein in which Beethoven quarried, takes hold deep down with like firm grasp, and brings out kindred thoughts.

The Hummel Septet is the very work in which the young PERABO first made his debut here, in the last Symphony Concert of the first series, five years ago. And we might say of his playing now all that we said then—"only more so." It was, as far as our poor sense could judge, a perfect rendering of that not deep, but thoroughly graceful, genial and exceedingly exacting composition. He played it as if it were all in him and knew its own way out without anxious trouble on his part. And taking the composition as a whole, thanks to the careful coöperation of the concerting artists, it was about as well brought out as we have ever heard it. It was a matter of course that the Scherzo, in which the horn ushers back so witchingly the little motive of the Trio, should have to be repeated. (Those who insisted on this did not think then of complaining that the concert was ten minutes too long!)

The two Overtures also were remarkably well given. That from the first Iphigenia lent more interest to Mr. KREISSMANN'S tenor Aria from the second: the noble recitative and air in which Pylades exhorts Orestes to meet death bravely, and links his fate with that of his friend as their lives have been linked from childhood. ("Only one common wish, one longing," &c.) The music is full of subdued, chaste, manly tenderness, admirably simple and expressive. But it takes an artist to render it as truly as Mr. Kreissmann did. In spite of a cold, his tones were rich and warm, and with a finished style and quiet fervor he realized the spirit of the song. The orchestral back-ground was delicate and yet sufficient. But more remarkable was the effect produced in that great hall by his finely poetic rendering of half a dozen out of the cycle of Heine love songs, which Schumann has caught up in so many little wafts of melody,—and with Mr. LEONHARD's exquisite accompaniment. Some of them rapturous ("Im wunderschönen Monat Mai;" "Die Rose, die Lilie," &c. &c.) some so delicately breathed as to be just audible, yet reaching the soul not the less; and one with which he closed, "Ich grolle nicht," impassioned, tragical;—they made an emotional and musical impression such as only true song inspirations truly sung can do, and such as larger, greater works may fail of. Mr. Kreissmann has some physical peculiarities of voice, to which some are far from partial; but as an interpreter of the best types of the German Lied, when have we heard his equal?

We shall wait for the two extra Symphony Concerts before summing up the season. Here are the programmes:

March 24.—IN AID OF THE ART MUSEUM.—Part I. Suite, for Orchestra, in D. Bach; Fifth Symphony, Beethoven.—Part II. Piano Concerto, Schumann. HUGO LEONHARD; Serenade (from a Quintet), by all the strings, Haydn; Overture to "Leonora," No. 3, Beethoven.

March 31.—In compliment to CARL ZERRAHN.—Part I. Seventh Symphony, Beethoven; Piano Concerto in E♭. Beethoven, Miss ANNA MEHLIG.—Part II. Introduction to an Act of "Klop Manfred," (first time), Carl Reinecke; Weber's Concertstück, Miss MEHLIG; Overture to "Bacchante at Sea," &c., Mendelssohn.

MISS ANNA MEHLIG. The complimentary matinee given to this lady on Friday, the 18th, at Chickering's, by the Harvard Musical Association, will ever stand out among our Chamber Concert memories as most memorable. It was one of those complete occasions in which there is nothing wanting, nothing to regret or wish to qualify. The spell of the music and the hour was upon every one from first to last. It was purely artistic; and the rapport between the artists with each other and the audience perfect. We doubt if ever before in our experience we have met so many people, testifying to such unalloyed delight. The young artist who bore the chief part both of the labor and the honor, was one who by the singular vitality and perfection of her interpretation both in technique and in spirit, had magnetized us in the F-minor Concerto of Chopin; was now to show us the wide and varied range of great piano music in which she was not less at home; the assisting artists, choice spirits of mature experience, came to it with a new enthusiasm for Art as well as for her; the audience, select, just filling Chickering Hall, was of the very best; and the programme a notable addition to our record:

1. Andante and Variations, for two Pianos, Schumann. Miss Anna Mehlig and Mr. Leonhard.
2. Songs: (a) "Am Meer," Schubert. (b) "Aufenthalt," Mr. Kreissmann.
3. Sonata Appassionata, op. 57, Beethoven. Allegro assai.—Andante con moto.—Allegro ma non troppo. Miss Anna Mehlig.

PART II.

1. Introduction and Rondo, for Piano and Violin, Schubert. Miss Mehlig and Mr. Eichberg.
2. Organ Prelude and Fugue, in G minor, arranged for the Pianoforte by Liszt. Miss Anna Mehlig.
3. Songs: (a) "Frühlingster," op. 7, No. 5, Franz. (b) Serenade, op. 17, No. 2, Franz. (c) "Wenn der Frühling auf die Berge steigt," op. 42, No. 6, Franz. Mr. Kreissmann.
4. Scherzo, in B flat minor, op. 31, Chopin. Miss Anna Mehlig.

There were text enough for much discourse in every number of this programme, but the brief record of the Transcript, hearty and intelligent, shall speak for our own feeling better than we ourselves might do just now:

Here was sympathetic opportunity for the young lady to exhibit her rare gift and accomplishment in all their various aspects; and we only echo the enthusiastic opinion of every one present in saying that her playing on this occasion was of the happiest and highest order, creating a deep and lasting impression. Her chief successes were in the Beethoven Sonata, and in the Bach Prelude and Fugue. These were revelations indeed of the inner life of each composer—of the deep spiritual poetry and romanticism of the one, and the pure classicity of the other. The Sonata, under her hands, was a marvel of execution and interpretation. In every technical respect and outward feature there was nothing wanting. It was all graceful, vital, powerful, perfect; in touch, accent, shading; in finished and graphic execution; in the striking out of the great Beethoven chords, and in the exquisite and bold attack of his rich and expressive bravura the performance compelled entire praise.

Nothing, too, could be finer than the strong conception and feeling that prompted the young pianist's fingers, and the betrayal of a sincere, earnest nature, that mastered the very spirit of the work, from its brilliant opening movement, through its subdued Andante, to the fire and rush and passion of the closing Allegro. It was ideal playing, triumphing over the mechanism of performance, transcendent as the latter was.

Not less of an experience was the rendering of the Prelude and Fugue; which was the clearest Bach exposition ever heard in this city. For once the great contrapuntist was made vital and interesting to everybody. The Prelude may have sounded sometimes better upon the organ, but the Fugue, never; as it came from Miss Mehlig's fingers it was instinct with beauty, faultless in proportion, joyous with life. All things considered, this was the great achievement of the pianist and gained for her a storm of applause.

Thus singling the foremost pieces on the programme, we may only hint how well the Schumann pieces for two pianos went, and how Mr. Leonhard rivalled the lady in artist touches; and what delight the Schubert Introduction and Rondo gave—Mr. Eichberg's violin retaining all its old-time warm tone and musical feeling; and how the fitful poetry of Chopin was brilliantly and elegantly reproduced by Miss Mehlig; and, finally, what satisfaction Mr. Kreissmann gave in his group of Schubert and Franz songs. It was, matter and performance,—all, to delightfully dwell upon.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER'S CLUB of Amateur singers gave another delightful entertainment to their friends on Monday evening. Chickering Hall of course was full. The colds so common in this season seemed to have thinned the chorus ranks a little, but there was the same fine balance of parts, the same rich, pure, musical ensemble of tone, the same spirit and precision and fine light and shade in all the singing. The concert began with Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" and "O for the wings of a dove," in which the Soprano Solo was effectively sung by Miss GATES. Then came two beautiful part-songs: "Good night" by Schumann, and "Daybreak" (Longfellow's: "A wind came up out of the sea,") charmingly and graphically set by Mr. Parker, varying the expression with every couplet; indeed a nice piece of four-part writing. A selection from "St. Paul" came next, including the Recitatives: "Ananias, arise," &c.; and the Bass solo: "I praise thee, O Lord," capitiilly sung by Mr. WINCH; and the lovely chorus that succeeds it: "The Lord He is good." This was sung with rare purity and delicacy. Another brace of part-songs: Gade's dreamy "Water Lily" and Mendelssohn's exhilarating "Lark Song," closed the first part.

Part Second consisted of Gade's Cantata: "The Crusaders," in which there is much interesting music with descriptive accompaniment. Particularly the second part, in which the sorceress Armida, Tasso's Armida, summons her Spirits of Darkness, changes the desert into a garden, and tries to tempt Rinaldo to "unimagined bliss." This gave great opportunity to the fine voice and thrilling dramatic power of Mrs. HARWOOD. The part of Rinaldo, tenor, was given with good taste and feeling by Dr. LANGMAID. The first part of the Cantata represents the weary knights and pilgrims in the desert, and Peter the Hermit, (basso, Mr. POWERS), rebuking their faint-heartedness. The third part brings us before Jerusalem; the music is martial and stirring, ending with a chorus: "Jerusalem! the goal is there! Sing Hosanna!"

IN PROSPECT.—We must adjourn the remainder of the history, to save a little room for glimpses of what is coming.

First, next Tuesday evening. Mr. PERABO's second and last Soirée, when he will play with Mr. Leon-hard Schubert's great Duo, op. 140, for two pianos, out of which Joachim has made a Symphony. It will be a glorious novelty. The programme also embraces Liszt's arrangement of Hummel's Septet, and Schumann's Variations, op. 13.

Following the last Extra Symphony Concert, on Saturday evening, April 2, our excellent Contralto, Mrs. C. A. BARRY, gives a Farewell Concert, in the Music Hall, previous to her departure in May for Europe, where she has the laudable intention of passing a year in the further improvement of her voice and talent. We have not seen the programme, but she announces the assistance of the great pianist, Miss Mehlig; also of Miss Houston; Miss Crane and Miss Mead (pupils of Mrs. Barry); Mr. W. J. Winch, Mr. M. W. Whitney, Mr. J. C. D. Parker, Mr. Arbuckle, and Mr. John Howard, accompanist. We trust the Hall will be crowded.

NEXT WEEK will be swallowed up in brilliant Concerts by THEODORE THOMAS and his admirable Orchestra of 56 distinguished artists. Among the number are Bergner, cello; Weiner, flute; Eller, oboe; Schmitz, Lotze, Bernstein and Gewalt, horns; Leetich, trombone, and Toulmin, harp. Miss ANNA MEHLIG is engaged for Concertos and other piano solos in four at least of the eight Concerts; and Mr. KREISSMANN, too, will sing in some of them. The programmes, partly classical and partly popular, show a mixture of standard Symphonies, Overtures, Concertos, &c., with numerous modern novelties by Liszt, Berlioz, Wagner, Grimm, Raff, &c. The first Concert, Tuesday evening, April 5, offers the "Leonora" Overture, No. 3, of Beethoven; Weber's Concertstück (Miss MEHLIG); Liszt's Symphonie Poem, "Tasso;" the "Tell" Overture; Schumann's "Träumerei;" Weber's "Invitation," orchestrated by Berlioz; a Chopin Solo; and Meyerbeer's "Schiller March."

Wednesday evening. Wagner's Prelude to "The Master singers of Nuremberg;" Adagio from Beethoven's "Prometheus;" Schumann's Concerto by Miss MEHLIG; second part of Berlioz's dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet;" Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

Thursday evening. Suite in Canon form by Grimm; Introduction to third act of "Medea," Cherubini; Overture to "Coriolanus," Beethoven; D-minor Symphony, Schumann.

Friday evening. "Faust," by Rubinstein; Chopin's E minor Concerto (Miss MEHLIG); Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Overture to "Struensee," Meyerbeer; Theme and Variations, Haydn; Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream;" Piano Solo, Liszt; "Jota Aragonesa," by Glinka.

Saturday afternoon. Symphony in D, Mozart; Beethoven's Concerto in G (Miss MEHLIG); Liszt's "Les Preludes," &c., &c.

April 13. Mr. A. P. PECK's annual Benefit Concert. With Thomas's Orchestra, Miss Mehlig, Miss Adelaide Philipps, Miss Gates, and Mr. Whitney, basso.

WEBER'S "ONERON," of which all know and love the Overture, was brought out by the Parepa-Rosa troupe in Philadelphia, March 9th, for the first time (so far as we remember) in this country. The Inquirer of the next day speaks of it as follows:

ENGLISH OPERA.—"ONERON."—The opera of Oberon was first sung at the Covent Garden Theatre on the 12th of April, 1826. Charles Kemble, who was then the manager of the theatre, had been attracted by the success which Der Freyschütz met with in England, and so early as 1824 he forwarded a libretto (written by Mr. Planche) to Weber at Dresden, with the proposition that he should make it the ground-work of a grand English opera.

The story is not taken from Shakespeare's play, as the name would suggest, but from a German poem, by Wieland, the hero of which, "Sir Huon de Bordeaux," being a particular favorite of the fairy monarch, is enabled by him to accomplish super-natural wonders, first in the deliverance of "Rezia" from a dreaded marriage with one of Al Raschid's courtiers; and having made her his wife, being again enabled to rescue her from Barbary pirates, into whose hands she had lucklessly fallen.

Weber worked upon this plot for no less than eighteen months, bestowing upon its musical illustration the most fertile resources of his art and a vast amount of wearisome labor. The last five weeks before the opera was brought out he spent in London, directing almost daily rehearsals, and elaborating the various appointments. The scenery is said to have been unusually magnificent, and the choruses, to use Weber's own words, "were particularly good."

Of the principal performers he also spoke favorably. The original cast contained three historical names, two of which were afterwards widely known in this country. The part of "Rezia" was filled by the celebrated Mary Anne Paton, who as Mrs. Wood electrified our early opera lovers thirty years ago. Braham, the great tenor, assumed the chivalrous character of "Sir Huon."

It is worth mentioning, as an example of the difficulties of composers, that he obliged Weber, much against his will, to write for him the grand battle scene sung by Mr. Castle last night as a substitute for his opening air in the first act. The interpolation was afterwards expunged from the German edition. Madame Vestris, more celebrated for her charming manners and excellent acting than for vocal superiority, appeared as "Fatima."

The success of the opera was immediate and lasting, but the exhaustion attending the composer's labors, together with a frail constitution and the trying ordeal of an English climate, completely prostrated him. Only a few weeks after the opening night Weber was found dead in his bed, at the house of his friend, Sir George Smart.

The verdict of critics upon this work seems to have been always favorable; but the intricacy of its musical illustrations has rather bewildered audiences of ordinary cultivation. Except in the incantation scene and chorus at the end of the act second, there is an absence of those peculiar attractions which helped to make Der Freyschütz famous.

The production of the opera last night was in the highest degree creditable. We have rarely seen any first representation accompanied by so few drawbacks; and when the peculiar and intricate scenic effects are considered, it is really wonderfully how smoothly everything proceeded.

Mme. Lapere appeared more graceful and becoming in her Oriental costume than we have seen her in any other character. Her singing of the sublime air in the third act was more than a triumph—it was one of the grandest of her efforts. This great scene would alone render Oberon immortal. The orchestral accompaniments to it were most powerful and impressive. Mrs. Seguin as "Fatima" was charming, and made a most pleasing impression in the pretty air, "A lonely Arab Maid," and a still greater one in "Araby, dear Araby."

Mr. Castle had the very difficult part of "Sir Huon," and sustained it with great credit throughout. Miss Warden, as "Puck," made a good impression on this her first appearance. She has a contralto voice of considerable power. Mr. De Solla looked decidedly too terrestrial for a fairy—very much of the earth earthy. The air in act third he sang, however, with much effect, and more ably than anything we have yet heard him do. The choruses were generally good, particularly the second one in the first act, and the Mermaid chorus at the end of act third.

Mr. Lawrence received the honor of the first encore of the evening in his opening air to act four. We could not help thinking how finely this gentleman's voice would sound in Don Giovanni, if the Company would produce it. The orchestra last night contributed largely to the success of Oberon. The fine overture, which on its initial performance under Weber's leadership received the unusual tribute of an encore, richly deserved it on this occasion, if only for the general intelligence and industrious study displayed in rendering it.

Both Oberon and Marriage of Figaro owe much of their success here to the excellence of this department and watchfulness of the conductor.

The skill and energy with which Mr. Carl Rosa assumes the different duties of a director have been very generally commented upon. In the various operas he has led in this city we have yet to see the first serious blunder in the instrumental department—a record as rare as it is honorable to him. We cannot better express our sense of his services than by repeating a compliment we have already heard paid him—"Nothing could reconcile us to the loss of Mr. Rosa as soloist, except the appropriateness of his position in the director's chair."

We need not call special attention to the matinée to-day, when the Marriage of Figaro is to close the season.

PHILADELPHIA.—Mr. Wolfsohn's "Schumann Matinée" was one of the most delightful of the series. The principal feature of the programme was the fantasie in C-major, which is, not only the greatest of Schumann's compositions for the piano, but one of the most splendid creations for that instrument in existence. It abounds in ideas, and it brings into play all the modern improvements in pianos. The first movement is fantastic and full of pathos and passion; the second is grave, massive and march-like, working up constantly to great climaxes; the third one is a beautiful slow movement, full of delicious melody from beginning to end. The difficulties of this piece are appalling, but they were overcome by Mr. Wolfsohn, who playing with customary elegance, delicacy and feeling. This was the first performance of the fantasie ever given in this country. [No, it was played in Boston by Mr. Petersilea three years ago.—Ed.] and we are glad to record that it gave intense satisfaction to the audience. The trio for piano, violin and violoncello was given at one of the concerts last winter, but we were glad to hear it again from Messrs. Wolfsohn, Kopta and Hennig, for it is a delightful composition, and it was played splendidly. We must accord warm praise to Mr. Wolfsohn's management of the exquisite Schumann Romanza and the Träumerei, both of which were given in most artistic manner. Mr. Gastel sang tastefully and well, not only in the Schumann song, but in two others, which atoned for Signor Barilli's absence. The next concert of the series—the "Raff Matinée," will be given on the 8th of April.—Bulletin, March 11.

(From the same, March 5.) There has rarely been given here a more satisfactory entertainment than Mr. Jarvis's third classical concert, at Dutton's Rooms, last evening. Mr. Jarvis's particular solo was the wonderful "Hungarian Gipsy Life," of Taussig—a composition almost new to us, for it has been performed here but once before, by Mr. Mills, at one of the Philharmonic concerts, of blessed memory, last winter. Whether it was because of the superior advantages we enjoyed last evening for hearing Mr. Jarvis, or whether his interpretation was the more interesting of the two, we may not at this lapse of time with confidence assert. Nevertheless we are free to say that Mr. Jarvis's performance excited us to a degree of enthusiastic interest that Mr. Mills's playing failed to inspire. Mr. Jarvis has never played better than at this soirée.

For the rest, we had the lovely adagio from the clarinet quintet of Mozart transferred to the violoncello and exquisitely played by Mr. Hennig. Mr. Kopta, whose steady and sure progress in his art the watchful critic must not omit to note and commend, favored us with one of the most finished performances it has been our fortune to hear, of the enjoyable violin concerto of Mendelssohn.

The concert fitly concluded with the Beethoven trio (op. 97) in B flat. Of course, at the hands of these very accomplished gentlemen it was more than simply well done. It was of the very highest order of concerted playing.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The last of the series of delightful classical concerts given by Mr. B. D. Allen, took place in Washburn Hall, on Thursday evening, March 10th, with Miss J. E. Houston, vocalist, Mr. Julius Eichberg, violinist, and Mr. August Sack, violoncellist, as assistants. The programme, historically arranged, illustrated the progress of classical music from 1685 to 1847, which was as follows:

PERIOD I.

1. Sonata for Piano and Violin in three movements.....J. S. Bach.
2. Aria. Angels ever bright and fair.....G. F. Handel.

PERIOD II.

1. Slow movement for Violoncello and Piano....J. Haydn.
2. (a) Song—Loin de toi.....W. A. Mozart.
(b) Aria from "Il Re Pastore,".....C. Gluck.

PERIOD III.

1. Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello. No. 3. L. V. Beethoven.
2. Song. The Serenade.....F. Schubert.

PERIOD IV.

1. Piano Solo. (a) Impromptu, op. 29.....F. R. Chopin.
(b) Cradle Song, op. 124.....R. Schumann.
2. Grand Trio. Piano, Violin and Violoncello, op. 49.....F. Mendelssohn.

The Sonata, a rich and delicate bit of instrumentation, was most faithfully interpreted, with rare, artistic expression. The second selection brought out Miss Houston to win new laurels and untold appreciation from an audience who have never before had an opportunity to hear her in her happier moments; in music of so noble character which she feels so earnestly, and interprets so finely. She was in excellent voice, and sang all her selections with rare appreciation and magnetic effect. Her whole-souled, sympathetic voice awakened responsive chords in the hearts of all her hearers, in her perfect rendering of Mozart's lovely song, and Schubert's Serenade, the latter receiving a persistent encore. Worcester now fully understands her magnificence of voice and style. The slow movement from Haydn, full of beauty and pathos, received delicate shading and artistic treatment from both performers, making one of the gems of the evening. The piano solos, so unlike in character, met their required treatment, finding a true exponent of their beauties. The wondrously beautiful Trio of Beethoven and the splendid Trio of Mendelssohn, so marvellously wrought, will long be remembered as closing these choice concerts which have enriched our winter.—Falladium.

Modesty in Art.

(From Ruskin's "Queen of the Air.")

.... I think we shall better understand what we ought of the nature of Modesty, and of her opposite, by taking a simple instance of both, in the practice of that art of Music which the wisest have agreed in thinking the first element of education; only I must ask the reader's patience with me through a parenthesis.

Among the foremost men whose power has had to assert itself, though with conquest, yet with countless loss, through peculiarly English disadvantages of circumstance, are assuredly to be ranked together, both for honor and for mourning, Thomas Bewick and George Cruikshank. There is, however, less cause for regret in the instance of Bewick. We may understand that it was well for us once to see what an entirely powerful painter's genius, and an entirely keen and true man's temper, could achieve, together, unhelped, but also unharmed, among the black banks and wolds of Tyne. But the genius of Cruikshank has been cast away in an utterly ghastly and lamentable manner; his superb line-work, worthy of any class of subject, and his powers of conception and composition, of which I cannot venture to estimate the range in their degraded application, having been condemned, by his fate, to be spent either in rude jesting, or in vain war with conditions of vice too low alike for record or rebuke, among the dregs of the British populace. Yet perhaps I am wrong in regretting even this: it may be an appointed lesson for futurity, that the art of the best English etcher in the nineteenth century, spent on illustrations of the lives of burglars and drunkards, should one day be seen in museums beneath Greek vases fretted with drawings of the wars of Troy, or side by side with Durer's "Knight and Death."

Be that as it may, I am at present glad to be able to refer to one of these perpetuations, by his strong hand, of such human character as our faultless British constitution occasionally produces, in out-of-the-way corners. It is among his illustrations of the Irish Rebellion, and represents the pillage and destruction of a gentleman's house by the mob. They have made a heap in the drawing-room of the furniture and books, to set first fire to; and are tearing up the floor for its more easily kindled planks; the less busily-disposed meanwhile hacking round with rage, with axes, and smashing what they can with butt-ends of guns. I do not care to follow with words the ghastly truth of the picture into its detail; but the most expressive incident of the whole, and the one immediately to my purpose, is this, that one fellow has sat himself at the piano, on which, hitting down fiercely with his clenched fist, he plays, grinning, such tune as may be so producible, to which melody two of his companions, flourishing knotted sticks, dance, after their manner, on the top of the instrument.

I think we have in this conception as perfect an instance as we require of the lowest supposable phase of immodest or licentious art in music; the "inner consciousness of good" being dim, even in the musician and his audience; and wholly unsympathized with, and unacknowledged, by the Delphian, Vestal, and all other prophetic and cosmic powers. This represented scene came into my mind suddenly, one evening, a few weeks ago, in contrast with another which I was watching in its reality; namely, a group of gentle school-girls, leaning over Mr. Hallé as he was playing a variation on "Home, sweet Home." They had sustained with unwonted courage the glance of subdued indignation with which, having just closed a rippling melody of Sebastian Bach's, (much like what one might fancy the singing of nightingales would be if they fed on honey instead of flies), he turned to the slight, popular air. But they had their own associations with it, and besought for, and obtained it; and pressed close, at first, in vain, to see what no glance could follow, the traversing of the fingers. They soon thought no more of seeing. The wet eyes, round-open, and the little scarlet upper lips, lifted, and drawn slightly together, in passionate glow of utter wonder, became picture-like,—porcelain-like,—in motionless joy, as the sweet multitude of low notes fell in their timely infinites, like summer rain. Only La Robbia himself (nor even he, unless with tenderer use of color than is usual in his work) could have rendered some image of that listening.

But if the reader can give due vitality in his fancy to these two scenes, he will have in them representative types, clear enough for all future purpose, of the several agencies of debased and perfect art. And the interval may easily and continuously be filled by mediate gradations. Between the entirely immodest, unmeasured, and (in evil sense) unmannered, execution with the fist; and the entirely modest, measured, and (in the noblest sense) mannered, or moral'd, execution with the finger; between the impatient and unpractised doing, containing in itself the witness of lasting impatience and idleness through all previous life, and the patient and practised doing, containing in itself the witness of self-restraint and unwearied toil through all previous life;—between the expressed subject and sentiment of home violation, and the expressed subject and sentiment of home love; between the sympathy of audience, given in irreverent and contemptuous rage, joyless as the rabidness of a dog, and the sympathy of audience given in an almost appalled humility of intense, rapturous, and yet entirely reasoning and reasonable pleasure;—between these two limits of octave, the reader will find he can class, according to its modesty, usefulness, and grace, or becomingness, all other musical art. For although purity of purpose and fineness of execution by no means go together, degree to degree, (since fine, and indeed all but the finest, work is often spent in the most wanton purpose—as in all our modern opera—and the rudest execution is again often joined with purest purpose, as in a mother's song to her child), still the entire accomplishment of music is only in the union of both. For the difference between that "all but" finest and "finest" is an infinite one; and besides this, however the power of the performer, once attained, may be afterwards misdirected, in slavery to popular passion or childishness, and spend itself, at its sweetest, in idle melodies, cold and ephemeral (like Michael Angelo's snow statue in the other art), or else in vicious difficulty and miserable noise—crackling of thorns under the pot of public sensuality—still, the attainment of this power, and the maintenance of it, involve always in the executant some virtue or courage of high kind; the understanding of which, and of the difference between the discipline which develops it, and the disorderly efforts of the amateur, it will be one of our first businesses to estimate rightly. And though not indeed by degree to degree, yet in essential relation (as of winds to waves, the one being always the true cause of the other, though they are not necessarily of equal force at the same time), we shall find vice in its varieties, with art-failure,—and virtue in its varieties, with art-success,—fall and rise together: the peasant-girl's song at her spinning-wheel, the peasant-laborer's "to the oaks and hills,"—domestic music, feebly yet sensitively skilful,—music for the multitude, of beneficent or of traitorous power,—dance-melodies, pure and orderly, or foul and frantic,—march music, blatant in mere fever of animal pugnacity, or majestic with force of national duty and memory,—song-music, reckless, sensual, sickly, slovenly, forgetful even of the foolish words it effaces with foolish noise,—or thoughtful, sacred, healthful, artful, for ever sanctifying noble thought with separately distinguished loveliness of belonging sound,—all these families and gradations of good or evil, however mingled, follow, in so far as they are good, one constant law of virtue (or "life-strength," which is the literal meaning of the word, and its intended one, in wise men's mouths), and in so far as they are evil, are evil by outlawry and unvirtue, or death-weakness. Then, passing wholly beyond the domain of death, we may still imagine the ascendant nobleness of the art, through all the concordant life of incorrupt creatures, and a continually deeper harmony of "pleasant words and murmurs made to bless," until we reach "The undisturbed song of pure consent, Aye sung before the sapphire-colored throne."

The Two "Figaros" by Mozart and Rossini.

Comic operas, as a rule, are not long-lived, and the "Figaro" of Mozart, now about ninety years of age, and the "Figaro" of Rossini, about thirty years its junior, are the two great exceptions. With the English the comic element in music never had any abiding stay, and all that rendered the vernacular versions of the two "Figaros" at Old Covent Garden piquant and of interest has departed. The adaptations were great cruelties, for the light, lively, and strictly comic portions of these two operas were rejected and cut out. The late Sir Henry Bishop imagined he could be more playful and spirited than Mozart, and compose a better bravura than Rossini; but his excisions, however extraordinary, and his additions and supposed amendments, however uncommon and meritorious, failed in adding ardor and enthusiasm to the work of Mozart, or more of life and gaiety to the fancy of Rossini; and the only result of his labor was a rapid shortening of the comic existence on the English stage of the two greatest composers for the opera that ever flourished. Re-writing the "Figaros" was not a more venturesome task than imitating the "Freischütz" of Weber, the "Last Judgment" of Spohr, and the "St. Paul" of Mendelssohn; but each and all these efforts proved to be labor in vain on the part of Sir Henry, yielding neither profit nor emolument.

The plot of the Figaro married, differs as much from the plot of the marrying Figaro, as the genius and capabilities of the two composers. There is no real feeling and no intensity of thought in any one scene in "Figaro the Barber," and we much question whether the constant up and alive—the unbroken sparkle and effervescence—the utter absence of every point of repose, or any opening for serious or even sentimental coloring which mark the plot of the "Barber" would have done other than depressed the temperament of Mozart: whilst, on the other hand, the shades of tenderness and varied pathos rising up here and there in the Mozartian opera, demand an expression beyond the calibre of the swan, or rather the lark, of Pesaro. Rossini, however full of force and fun in his development of comic scenes, was, when he wrote the "Barber" but a mannerist, and a dismal one, in his portraiture of the deep and strong feelings appertaining to humanity. True it is, that the "Tancredi" and "Otello" in Rossinian guise raised an interest that, for a time, permeated all musical Europe; but the love, enterprise, and desperation of such a character as the Syracusan Prince is but feebly sketched in the touch and go pages of the Rossini score; and the agony of the Moor may be imagined from the fact that David, the great tenor, interpolated the famous duet from the "Armida" into the final scene of the "Otello" and walked off the stage arm and arm with his adored Desdemona. No musical dramatic composer that has ever lived would have approached Mozart in his rendering of such operas as the "Tancredi," "Otello," "Romeo and Juliet," and "Faust." Amenaide in prison and in chains with Tancredi as the Ioan-hoe—unknown knight and champion—would have given Mozart a chance of rivalling Sir Walter Scott; and as for the innocent Desdemona, the head-strong yet ill-treated Juliet, and the miserable Margaret—they must each wait their day: the poet has given them immortality—the musician of the future has this end to consummate.

Rossini was without rival when he composed the "Barber," for the so-called popular opera of the same name by Paisiello had been virtually made antique by the success of the new school. The French had overrun Italy, had carried with them their military bands, orchestras, and operas, and taught the Southern their new phrases, combinations, and modes of execution; and Rossini had carried the trombones, trumpets, and half the military band into the theatre, combining the flash and dash of the new armoury with a display of power in vocalization that none but a great singer would have ventured to deal with. If his orchestral performers were shady, his vocalists were generally reliable, and oftentimes not to be challenged. He had acquired as much of the learning of the master as he needed, without the drudgery of the pupil; he had seen what art was, and what artists could do; and had received no small experience in the sentiments and passions of the musical public. As to verses and poetry he decried both: he wanted situation, transition, contrast, and climax, and in the "Barber" he obtained all four. The serenade of the Count, the rhapsody or soliloquy of the Barber and the letter-song of the heroine were severally prodigious advances on the work of Paisiello, and are to this day as masterly and interesting as when first produced. No man's hands can be competent to deal with another man's head; for no two pair of hands can execute alike; and a common invention is not to be found in two sets of brains. No composer of any reputation has ever attempted an imitation of these three exquisite morceaux. The work has been so well and so fearlessly done, so perfect and so sure, that imitation can only end in vulgarity, and a something to be thoroughly ashamed of. The school is so simple there is nothing to catch hold of; the brilliancy and vivacity so truthful and intense there is no room for exaggeration; there was no trickery, deception, incomprehensibility, mystery, ostentation or pretence; all was the result of great knowledge, and the application of known means in a way never thought of before, and embodied in a graciousness and elegance of spirit that must have taken a lifetime to grasp and hold at ready and instant command. Of the same class are the two duets between Figaro and the Count, and Figaro and Rosina in the first act; brilliant and beautiful, overwhelming in their power, a power apparently produced by small and inadequate means, and yet enormous in their quantity of effect. Everything is right as far as it goes, and the composer has taken the true measure of singers, band, stage, and audience. He has engaged all, interested and satisfied all. The trio where the Count reveals himself to Rosina, and the famous "Zitti, Zitti," that follows it, are two capital situations that suited the temperament of Rossini, and which he has made marvellously sympathetic by the peculiarity of his contrasts, the delicacy of his ideas, and the sincerity of their expression. These movements on their first appearance were received as original and beyond measure captivating, and time has not weakened these predilections; they shine with undiminished lustre, and if the taste of the general public has improved, the result has not been attained by any advance on these exquisite specialities of Rossini.

It would be wrong to say that the finales in this opera are weak, for they are as full of bustle and complication, and are as clearly and gracefully constructed as any of Rossini's earlier works; there is a never-flagging animation, and an aggregation of melodious passages, and a courageous reliance on compilations and expedients which the composer well knew would meet with the sympathies of his audience; but, compared with the finales in the "Figaro" of Mozart, all the force and feeling of Rossini vanish, and the play of his imagination and his resources of the art cease to be matters of criticism. By the side of Mozart these ensembles lack grandeur and elevation, and indeed lose all their elegance, variety, and spirit. They are, of course, lively in their way, noisy, broad, and ornamental, with a thin border of melody; but there is no real dramatic interest, no true mental agitation, no intellectual power—nothing beyond what vocalists wanted at that day, and what could be readily and easily performed.

Whatever may be the changes in dramatic music, the finales in the operas of Mozart are certain of holding their own, and the finales of his "Figaro" can never pass out of mind or memory. The deep pathos of the songs of the true-hearted wife, the sentimental duets of the Count and Susanna, the romantic ditty of the page, and its more than true imitation by the lady's maid, the mock heroics of Figaro, are all unequalled in their portraiture of the different shades of human feeling, and give a delicate and feminine charm to the opera quite foreign to the work of Rossini. Mozart revelled in his pictures of woman's love, whilst Rossini seems to have known but little about it, or thought it too weak to deserve painting. But if Mozart was feminine when dealing with woman's tenderness, he was not so in his finales. Here he is all original thought, of enormous conversational power, full of strong and fiery passion, and hurrying his hearers away into the current of his own strong, quick, and beautiful thoughts. Everything is new and ennobled, and nothing is allowed to pass without creating an influence and impression. Rossini is the scene-painter, whilst Mozart is the man with a high and penetrating intelligence, possessing the artistic power to make men think with him, and like him. The two "Figaros" were written with two great and distinct ends: both fulfilled their purpose. Mozart was earnest; Rossini honest. Neither attempted to deceive.—London Orchestra.

Tenors and Basses.

The tenor I take to be the happiest man in the world, or, at least, he ought to be. He is the individual whom all the operative Elvira's love. He loves them, also. He has all the serenades to sing. He alone can indulge in the ut de poitrine. Almost invariably, he is allowed to die for the heroine, when he isn't permitted to marry her, and always has a fortissimo death-song given to him, which, like the swan's, is the sweetest. What little stage business there is, in the way of kneeling at the feet of the  innamoratas, kissing of hands, embracing of languishing Leonoras, belongs exclusively to him. He also can be the melancholy man, and drown susceptible damsels with tears, over his chalky grief and and cork-lined wrinkles of woe. The women dote upon the tenor, send him little billets, look at him through the lorgnettes, and adore him in secret, as Heine's pine adored the palm. He finds bouquets upon his mantle, and little perfumed notes upon his dressing-table. If he be a tenor di grazia, lovely woman will sigh for him; if a tenor robusto, lovely woman will die for him, or wish that heaven had made her such a man. The amateur tenor enjoys the same advantages as the operative tenor, on a small scale. He is privileged to sing all the pretty things, and he may sing them as badly as may be, if he is only interesting. He is the idol before which female bread-and-butterhood bends, both Grecian and otherwise. He is usually fragile, spiritual, and delicate. He sleeps on the under-side of a rose-leaf, drinks Angelica, eats caramels, and catches butterflies. He carries his voice in a lace pocket-handkerchief, when in the open air, and does it up in amber when he retires to sleep upon the rose-leaves. He alone is permitted to wear white kids and vest, and otherwise array himself after the manner of the festive hotel waiter. He knows the secret of immortal youth and never grows old. All tuneful lays set to the tinkling of flutes, guitars, and harps belong to him. He alone can sing to the moon and address the stars. In his répertoire are all the interesting brigands, the high-born cavaliers, the romantic lovers, and the melancholy artists.

And he has nice legs, or, if he hasn't, he had better degenerate into a baritone, and have done with it. A tenor without nice legs is worse off than a soprano who can't sing "With verdure clad," if there be such a rara avis, or an alto who has to do Siebel and Matteo Orsini with elephantine ankles, and there never was an alto in the world with whom I wouldn't measure feet, and give them the odds of one or two numbers.

The tenor lives in clover, chin deep, and never gets stung by the bees. Sometimes he forgets to wrap up his voice in the handkerchief when he goes out, or he sleeps in the direct line of a current of air, which comes in under the door, and the result is an indisposition. When he has an indisposition, he goes off hunting ducks at Calumet, instead of dears in the audience, and the manager forgives him and the audience pity him. He doesn't die like other singers, but gradually fades away like the rose, and disappears in a little cloud of perfume.

The basso, on the other hand, is the personification of vocal misery, and he knows it. He feels that he is not interesting at all. He knows that the women don't adore him, and he takes a fiendish delight in bellowing at them. He never has an opportunity to languish on the stage, or go round kneeling and sighing and kissing of hands. He is never a lover. If a brigand he is a dirty cut-throat. If a cavalier, he is some dilapidated old duke, with a young and pretty wife, just packing up preparatory to elopement with the tenor, and requesting him not to interfere with her little arrangements. If a sailor, he is a swaggering pirate. If an uncle, he is a miser. If a mayor, he is a simpleton. If a father, he is a fool. The composers never give him but one aria in opera, and that is always written an octave higher than he can sing, or an octave lower than his boot heel. He is always in trouble with the orchestra. He knows he can squelch the first fiddles and reeds, and come out even with the bassoons and double basses, but the man with the trombone is his mortal enemy, and the man with the kettle-drums his skeleton. He feels in his heart of hearts that the one can blow him into ribbons, and the other pound him to a jelly, and what is more, he knows they are never happy, except when they are engaged in that pulverizing process. What little singing he has to do is devoted to panegyrics upon beer, dissertations upon cookery, and lugubrious screeds upon the infidelity of woman and his own ponderous wretchedness. When he is not confined to this, he is set up for a laughing stock in buffo work. He has no runs and trills and sky-rockets with which to dazzle people.

He knows that one of his long arias is like a long sermon. He usually has so much voice in his copper-lined and brass-riveted throat, that it invariably gets the better of him, either running like molasses in cold weather, or coming out by fits and starts and leaking all round the edges. He must inevitably sing false, and it makes him unhappy. He is not at all delicate, being usually doubly blessed in chest and stomach, and the result is, he can't get sick if he tries. The blessed indisposition which so often gets into the velvet throat of the tenor, rarely gets into his, consequently his opportunities for duck-hunting at the Calumet are very limited. All of these afflictions make him misanthropical, and he goes through the world with his little répertoire of "The Calf of Gold," "Infelice," "O mio Palermo," "The Last Man," and "The Wanderer," a very Ishmael of wretchedness, and a howling Dervish of despair. He drinks beer and all sorts of fiery damnations, eats sausage and kraut with impunity, and smokes villainous tobacco in short clay pipes. He despises the razor, and eschews the little weakness of kids and patent leathers. The tenor is the nightingale; he is the crow. The tenor is the beloved of women, but for him no serenade, no face in the lattice shaming the moon with its brightness and beauty. I pray, therefore, all gentlefolk to deal kindly with the basso, and make his rough road as smooth as possible, for it is inevitable as fate that he will live to a hundred years of age, and sing every blessed day of the century, and will finally be gathered to his fathers, singing as he goes.—Letters of Peregrine Pickle.

The Forthcoming Opera Season in London.

I. DRURY LANE.

London, this season, will have its two grand operatic companies, the one at Drury Lane, the other at Covent Garden. Messrs. Gye and Mapleson hold the reins at the Garden, whilst Mr. George Wood is the Director at Old Drury. Both schemes are now before the public and are scanned with curiosity and interest. That offered by Mr. George Wood unquestionably bears away the supremacy, and if the programme he adhered to, the season at Drury Lane will be one of the greatest events that has ever taken place in the history of the musical drama. The production of some score of the finest operas are promised, and with casts that can only be described as of enormous strength, for Mr. George Wood has brought together an aggregation of stars of the first magnitude, which enables him to present the grand works of the classic composers, with a novelty and attraction certainly not hitherto attempted. Where the field is all brilliancy, it is no longer a question of a star or two. The "Figaro" of Mozart is to be given with Nilsson as the Countess, Volpini as Susanna, and Monbelli as Cherubino; whilst Santley assumes the Count; Faure, Figaro; Foli, Bartolo; and Lyall, Basilio.

In the "Magic Flute," Monbelli will be the novelty as Papageno, Pamina will be in the hands of Sinico, and Ilma de Murska will continue her supremacy in the role of the Queen of the Night. The cast in the "Don Juan" is unparalleled; Monbelli as Zerlina, Ilma de Murska as Donna Elvira, and Reboux the Donna Anna; Don Giovanni will be represented by Faure, Ottavio by Gardoni, Il Commendatore by Foli, Masetto by Verger, and Leporello by Castelli. Such are the prospects for Mozart and his three great and popular operas; and when we quote the scheme for "Les Huguenots," it will be found that Meyerbeer is no less worthily taken care of. Valentine is most happily placed with Mathilde Savertal, Margaret with Ilma de Murska, and Urban with Trebelli; whilst to Mongini is assigned Roulet, to Faure Nevers, to Santley St. Bris, and to Foli Marcel.

Mlle. Christine Nilsson continues her well-known impersonations as Violetta in "La Traviata," Margaret in the "Faust," Martha in Flotow's opera of that name, Amina in "La Sonnambula," Lucia in the "Lamermoor," and will also appear as Alice in the "Robert" of Meyerbeer, a part in which she has recently made so great a sensation in Paris; also as Desdemona in the "Otello" of Rossini, and as Mignon in the opera of Ambrose Thomas. In the last three characters she is at present comparatively unknown in England, but they are by no means the least of her triumphs, and have only to be witnessed to be appreciated and admired.

Nothing short of a plethora of talent could have enabled the Director at Drury Lane to lay out such unusually powerful casts to these popular operas, and his engagements have been of the most lavish character. In addition to the queen of sopranos, Christine Nilsson, and Sinico, and Trebelli-Bettini—vocalists universally beloved and esteemed—Mr. Wood has secured Mlle. Mathilde Savertal, a soprano of large voice and great reputation, one fully competent to take the parts in which Mlle. Tietjens has gained so much and so deserved a reputation. Then we find Pauline Lewitzky, a pupil (like Nilsson) of the famous master, Wartel, and one of fine voice and grand school; and in Volpini we have one, who in St. Petersburg, is as popular and as esteemed as Patti—an excellent singer and one needing only place and opportunity to make her mark. Volpini was here for the campaign in the Lyceum last year, which came so suddenly to grief. Mlle. Monbelli was also one of the troupe, and is known for her admirable concert-room singing. She is every way a great artist, of superb presence, and a most desirable addition to Mr. Wood's staff. Nor must we forget Mlle. Reboux, celebrated for her role in the "Mirilla," at Paris. This lady is a first-rate vocalist and excellent actress, and will doubtless prove of valuable assistance at Drury Lane. When we mention the useful Mlle. Corsi we shall have noticed the ten lady stars that give lustre to Mr. Wood's directorate for this season.

The gentlemen artists number no less than sixteen; some one must be first mentioned, nor shall we do much wrong when we commence with our celebrated countryman, Mr. Santley, now in the meridian of his powers, who holds his rank with undiminished reputation, and in addition to his representations of Rigoletto, Papageno, Hoel, Plunketto, St. Bris, Il Conte in Mozart's "Figaro," Renato, Germon, and Valentin, is to appear as Macbeth, as "Macbeth" has been reclothed by its composer for the Parisian stage. Macbeth in its early condition was but small and somewhat weak, nor did Verdi's nursing add any life to its brief career, and in all probability Mr. Santley may be spared the trouble of getting up a part in which he cannot well add to his fame. As the Flying Dutchman; or, Lost Hollander (as the new Italian version has it) there is ample room for his fire, force, and feeling. This opera, the second of the Wagnerian set, is in many respects a masterly work, and its second act is specially to be commended, for it is exceedingly fine, and satisfies all conditions of the musical drama. The proposed cast is unexceptionally strong and bright. Murska as Senta, Gardoni as Erik, Gassier as Daland, and Santley as the Dutch- man. With such a cast and with such a hand as Mr. Wood has gathered together, and such a stage and appliances as Old Drury offers, there is a certainty of an effective rendering; and why this opera, so popular throughout Germany, should not obtain consummate favor in this country it is difficult to conceive. With all his peculiarities Richard Wagner is no ordinary man: it took some twenty years to popularize the "Robert" of Meyerbeer, and the Hollander is an advance upon the "Robert." It is sufficient to name that most perfect and accomplished of actors and singers, Mons. Faure, unsurpassable in his Mephistopheles, Iago, Figaro, Nevers, and Don Juan. Signor Foli has now well established his reputation, and still gains on his hearers on each successive appearance. In Signor Perotti will be found a young tenore robusto of no ordinary reputation in Italy, and in such parts as the Duke in "Rigoletto," Alfredo in "Traviata," Munfredo in "Trovatore," the subscribers will experience the charm of novelty, brilliancy, delicacy of execution, and an entire command of style that met full approval from all who know anything of good singing. There is also a new Baritone from Paris, Signor Verger, known and acknowledged as an artist of great power and a universal favorite in the French metropolis. He is prominent in the "Sonnambula," the "Don Juan," the "Trovatore," and for intention, ability, technical skill, and general business talent he is unquestionably a great addition. Signor Bettini's reputation is too well fixed and too widely known to need our dwelling upon. Mr. Wood has hit upon a capital basso profundo in the person of Signor Ragner, an excellent vocalist, actor, and general favorite in the great theatres of Italy. Of Signor Trevero, Castelli, Zoholi, Archinti, and Rinaldini, no more need be remarked than that they are each and all fully adequate for all that may be required of them.

The theatre having been decorated and completely remodelled after plans by Messrs. Marsh, Nelson and Harvey, the architects, will be opened on Saturday the 16th of April. Herr Strauss leads the orchestra, Signor Santi is chorus master, and Mr. Stirling stage-manager, Mr. Jarrett the acting-manager.

The Ballet will be unusually strong, Mlle. Fioretti being the principal danseuse.

II. COVENT GARDEN.

The prospectus from Covent Garden embraces a long list of names commencing with Tietjens, Patti, Pauline Lucca, Scialchi; Signori Graziani, Casaboni, Ciampi, Tagliafico, Pettit, and Dr. Gunz. Of those not so well known we may mention Mlle. Olma, from the opera at Brussels, Mlle. Vanzini, an American with a moderate voice, and Mlle. Cari (or Carey), also an American with a fine voice. Mlle. Sessi, who has achieved a reputation in Paris from the circumstance of possessing a splendid head of hair, and an attractive mode of coiffure, will take some of the parts hitherto entrusted to Patti, and that which has pleased and been approved in Paris will probably prove successful at Covent Garden. Mlle. Sessi's great drawback is her want of height, but in all other respects she is worthy of commendation. The secondary characters will be filled by the ladies Madigan, Dell' Anese, Locatelli, and Baummeister. The leading tenor will be Herr Wachtel, and he will be assisted by Signor Naudin, an excellent artist, and by Signor Larocca, of good intentions but not much voice. Signor Mario is held in reserve and will be heard occasionally in his well known parts. The noble voice of Cotogni is a real service to the Gye and Mapleson corps; so also will be found Capponi and Bagagiolo. The conductors are to be Signori Vianosi and Bevigiani. The duties of the prompter are looked forward to as being unusually severe, and consequently Covent Garden is to be served with a pair of prompters in the persons of Signori Lago and Rialp. Mr. A. Harris maintains his position as stage manager, Tito Mattei as maestro al piano, and Mr. Pittman as organist.

No less than twenty-four operas are promised and their casts advertised. The "Ophelia" of Thomas will be assigned to Mlle. Sessi, who is also to undertake the Queen of Night in the "Magic Flute" of Mozart, the Susanna in the "Figaro," and Isabella in the "Robert." Patti, of course, stands upon her old triumphs: Elvira in "I Puritani," Rosina in the "Barber," Zerlina in "Don Giovanni," Violetta in "Traviata," and Adina in "L'Elisir d'Amore." Mlle. Tietjens will re-appear in Medea, in "Fidelio," in Valentina, Pamina, Donna Anna, the Countess in the "Figaro," Alice in the "Robert," and Agatha in the "Freischütz." Dr. Gunz will revive his performances of some three or four years ago, and be heard as Jason in the "Medea," Florestan in "Fidelio," Tamino in the "Magic Flute," and Rodolf in the "Freischütz." Herr Wachtel is to hold the parts of Raoul, Vasco di Gama, Arnold, and Don Ottavio.

Mario is reserved for the "I Puritani," the "Barber," the "Faust," the "Traviata," and the "Martha." Signor Naudin is placed in the "Le Domino Noir," Fernando in the "Favorite," "L'Étoile du Nord," "L'Africaine," "Dinorah," and "Fra Diavolo." "Macbeth," is advertised, with Graziani as Macbeth, and Tietjens as Lady Macbeth; and the casts of the "William Tell," the "Don Juan," and the "Huguenots," are severally good, but not to be compared with those announced for Drury Lane. Graziani, Ciampi, Cotogni, Capponi, are judiciously employed, and will be heard under propitious circumstances and their exertions will no doubt be graciously received. Mr. Wood and Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, the caterers for these gorgeous entertainments have no doubt had their difficulties to contend with in gathering together so splendid a staff, and there will be a tough and strong struggle for ascendancy with the public. On each side are there many favorite artists and first-rate vocalists, and nearly all the grand operas on which reputation are built are advertised for performance at both theatres. When talent is so rife and real excellence so abundant the enthusiasts for the musical drama may look forward to unlimited sensation, and to unnumbered repetitions without aught of wearisome effect. The season we take it must of necessity be most remarkable, and beyond measure brilliant and memorable. The sums expended and to be expended, must be enormous—a stern necessity in securing excellence and propriety in performance, and the managers are engaged in a competition which must prove most beneficial to the taste and musical knowledge of the public. We believe in the existence of a general feeling on the part of the public to patronize fine performances, and it is upon fine performances that Mr. Wood, it would seem, has founded and intends to conduct his gigantic speculation. The Drury Lane scheme has been well weighed and considered in all its details and is evidently calculated to advance the dignity of the art, the reputation of the profession to secure the finest rendering of the music, and engage the warmest sympathies of the audience. We wish him with all sincerity of heart a successful issue in the cause he has taken such care and labor to establish.

In one respect the coming season will specially differ from preceding ones—in the array of new and youthful talent. Hitherto we have been too much contented with those who have appeared year after year probably a quarter of a century, small opportunity being afforded to the young and promising artist, partly from the dislike of managers to disturb existing arrangements, but more, perhaps, from the jealousy of the reigning favorites, who have declined to give up any of their repertoire to those who might prove dangerous rivals. This policy seems to be abandoned, notably in the case of the Drury Lane Company—certainly to the advantage of Art: and we cannot think that it will prove anything but gain to the inaugurators of the new system.—Orchestra, March 18.

Weber's "Last Waltz" Again.

Trieste, Feb. 22, 1870.

DEAR DWIGHT:—In your Journal of January 29, is a correction of an "absurdity" by another, or possibly from a friend and pupil of Reissiger, about the so called Von Weber's last Waltz. The truth was given years ago in your paper, but as it seems to have been forgotten, let us try again by translating something on the subject. Yours truly,

A. W. T.

From the Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, of July 1, 1829.

REMARKABLE, YET EVIDENT PROOF, THAT THE SAME DANCE CAN BE COMPOSED OR PRINTED BY TWO DIFFERENT COMPOSERS AT THE SAME TIME.

All the world knows that dance music is now in an extraordinarily flourishing state in all German lands, and numerous as we count the marigold in our meadows, in equal numbers sprout out the dances. They, however, for the most part grow in Vienna, and, as an agreeable means of distinguishing them, often receive very original baptismal names. Now, it has happened, that one called "Der Schneckentanz (Le Desir), von Beethoven, is with uncommon sympathy abundantly played and danced; but once when the spirit of dancing descended also upon Schubert, when he was still alive, and impelled him to publish his "Original Dances, Opus 9. Diabelli, Vienna," then it happened that No. 2, called "Trauer-schmelzer," was precisely the same waltz as Beethoven's Schneekittels-waltz, though without the trio, in regard to which busy tongues persist in asserting, that Herr Hoffmann in Breslau was the one to add it to the waltz.

Another curiosity of this sort again has recently attracted notice. There appeared, namely, published by Schott at Mayence, the Last Waltz of C. M. von Weber, on the title, with a picture of the composer, and under it: "propriété de l'éditeur," which of course fully proves, that that well-known, honest firm had purchased it as a composition of Weber. Now, some years since, Herr Reinsiger, at present Kapellmeister in Dresden in Weber's place, published through Peters in Leipzig certain dances, and—mirabile dictu—among them already stands bodily also that waltz, only in another key. It may then be asked: Which soul, in mysterious hours of friendly communication, had breathed this Waltz into the other? or, how, and by what secret sympathy, has it become possible that two dances are one!—and other like questions.

(From the Same, July 22, 1829.)

EXPLANATION.

The Andante Energico, which has appeared under the title: "Dernière pensée musicale de C. M. de Weber," in Paris, published by J. Pleyel et comp. (Propriété des Editeurs), is nothing else than a Waltz composed by me, which is to be found in the set: "Dances brillantes pour le Piano-forte, œuv. 26," as No. 5, composed in 1822, and published, 1824, by C. F. Peters, in the "Bureau de Musique" at Leipzig; and unluckily somewhat changed to its injury.

However wanting in self-respect I consider it to quarrel about the authorship of a waltz, still I am of opinion that such cases deserve to be publicly censured, to save the public from being cheated; otherwise all music will soon be received with suspicion, if to pirated editions false titles be also added.

The "Great Musical Festival" in San Francisco.

(From the Boston Advertiser Correspondent.)

San Francisco, Feb. 24, 1870.

San Francisco has undoubtedly proved herself to be the centre of refinement and culture on this coast, or rather Camilla Urso, the distinguished violinist, has proved it for her. In the restless search for wealth it might be supposed that her citizens ignored all else; that the higher phases of civilization were not represented among us. But it is not so. The great musical festival has proved a perfect triumph, and in it one may see the progress of this coast. To Camilla Urso belongs the whole credit of the suggestion that a concert like the Boston—as near as might be—should be held for the assistance of our Mercantile Library Association of San Francisco, which has struggled on for some fifteen years, when, in an evil hour the managers determined to erect a magnificent building in the very heart of the city. To make a long story short, they built it, and found themselves at the end of last year in a hopeless condition of bankruptcy.

The association is in debt to the tune of a million dollars, gold. Only the other day, a savings and loan society had to foreclose a mortgage of $170,000—the fact being that the revenue of the library would not pay the interest on its indebtedness. At this juncture a complete paralysis seems to have come over the managers of the institution, and it was reserved for a woman to show them a way out of their difficulties.

Mme. Urso took the whole responsibility of the management on her shoulders, and has proved herself to possess rare powers of organization. The list of city and county societies includes all the German choirs and numerous delegations from interior towns. Even Virginia City, Nevada, contributed some forty performers. The day selected for the opening performance was Washington's birthday, but Urso divides with the Father of his people the honors of this occasion. Between eleven and twelve o'clock the crowds began to throng the neighboring streets, and a little later, carriage after carriage, and street car after car deposited their living freight at the doors of the Pavilion. Before the seventeen hundred performers of the first day had taken their places, the building was filled with not less than ten or eleven thousand persons. At precisely half-past two, Herold, the conductor, raised his baton and the band burst forth with Weber's jubilee overture, which was magnificently rendered. This was followed by Zoelner's "Prayer of the Earth," which was given effectively, though somewhat roughly, by the German societies. The next feature worthy of notice was the arrival of the ladies of the chorus, who, when seated in their places, cannot better be described than as resembling a terraced parterre of gay flowers. As soon as the last lady had taken her seat, the hand crashed forth with a musical potpourri including any number of national melodies, and finishing with "America," sung by 1200 voices, accompanied by all the accessories of a modern orchestra—organ, drums and the thunder of artillery, fired by electricity. But although "claptrap" had some place in this concert, there was plenty of classical music for the lovers of genuine unadulterated harmony. A chorus from Moses in Egypt, the overture to Fra Diavolo, the Hunter's Chorus in Euryanthe, and Tannhauser March, were all given in splendid style.

The great feature of the day, at least in popular estimation, was the "Anvil Chorus," rendered by 1200 singers, 400 instrumentalists and 100 firemen. The drummers beat a quickstep and the firemen with their red shirts marched and countermarched on the stage to the fifty anvils placed ready for them. Bells and cannon lent their aid; the big drum, eight feet two inches in diameter, and not less the big drummer himself, were most noticeable. The audience persisted in their demonstrative applause, and the chorus had to be repeated. During the re-performance of the same piece on the following day, a serious accident occurred. One of the guns outside the building had not been swabbed out very completely, and when a new cartridge was put in, went off with great vigor, sending the ramrod across the street and through the board partition of a building. On its way it broke the artilleryman's arm and struck a young street urchin in the abdomen, wounding him severely. The accident was not connected with the electrical arrangements, which at some rehearsals Madam Urso had superintended herself. She plays the cannon with decided ability.

The second day attracted even a larger audience—some 15,000 people were present—and the programme included a choice selection of oratorio and classical music. The great event of the day was, however, the appearance of Camilla Urso herself, who played a concerto by Beethoven, and both on her entry and exit was received with a torrent of enthusiasm. Immediately afterwards the President of the Mercantile Library Association, Mr. R. B. Swain, asked the performers whether they would not give one extra performance—hundreds of persons having been unable to secure seats for the day. The "eye" of 1200 singers was given without a dissenting voice.

The third day was devoted principally to the school children's performance, and it was a sight to gladden one's heart to witness that gathering of 2000 young Californians, with health and heartiness imprinted on all their features. The girls with their bright-colored dresses were placed in the foreground. The performance this day commenced with that overture of overtures, that of William Tell, and later the "Coronation March" in the Prophet was rendered by a picked band. The pieces selected were principally well known school songs. "The Mocking Bird" was arranged as an alternating chorus with whistling responses from the not unwilling lungs of the boys. "America" "Where the Warbling Waters Flow," and the "Star-Spangled Banner," brought down the house. Again, the President asked whether the performers—this time all juveniles—would repeat their programme next Saturday, and it is needless to say that the "aye" which followed was hearty and unanimous. Indeed I believe that the children would not hesitate to sacrifice another week's schooling for such a treat.

It is difficult at the present time to estimate the probable net gain of the Mercantile Library from the receipts of this festival; they can hardly have less than $40,000 gold. The trustees have organized a ball for the benefit of Mme. Urso, to take place to-morrow evening.

Historical Music.

The production of Spohr's so called "Historical" Symphony at the Crystal Palace, and its very decided failure as a specimen of historical music, gives an opportunity for comment upon the form of art to which it belongs. Let us begin by saying that this is neither useful nor dignified. It is not useful, because we are not dependent upon modern composers for a knowledge of their predecessors. If, in politics, religion, and social life, we had full and accurate records of the past generally accessible, there would be no demand for the modern recorder of facts. This is actually the case in music. We know, or may know with very little trouble, what was the condition of music at any given epoch since it developed into a science; and may have such knowledge at firm hand, because the actual compositions of the period have come down to us. Hence there is no need for the musicians of our own day to bring forward imitations. We can do without such things, and, even if they were better than they usually are, their authority compared with that of the originals lying close at hand would amount to nothing.

But neither is the writing of so-called "historical" music dignified. Seeing that it is not wanted, and can never have a value as what it pretends to be, those who compose the thing are little better than artistic masqueraders, dressing themselves up in the fashion of a past age to divert idle people. Of course there are occasions when, for the sake of local color, or of "unities" hardly less important in music than in drama, a composer has to go out of himself, and become identified with the men of the past so far as to think their thoughts and to speak their language. An example of this was supplied at the Exeter Hall audience of Saturday week by Mr. G. A. Macfarren's May day. In that case, the subject and all its surroundings illustrating old English life, the composer formed his music upon the old English pattern. Against a course so legitimate in its purpose and so artistic in its conception nothing can be said. But when imitation exists purely for its own sake it is an idle thing, and needs discouragement. This is the main reason why we cannot except the "Historical" Symphony of Spohr, a work ostensibly written in four different styles for no other apparent object, than to show off the fancied versatility of its composer.

But, granting that imitative music has a raison d'être, its existence should be held subject to certain conditions. For example, a composer may issue a series of historical sketches in chronological or any other order. Doing this he may be wasting his time, and making himself ridiculous, but nothing more. On the other hand, it cannot be permitted him to obtrude his whims on a recognized musical form to its impairment or destruction. If he chooses to make dolls for himself and dress them up in fancy costumes, nobody will trouble himself to say, "Don't"; but the case is different when he puts motley garments upon some classic figure. Of this latter Spohr has been guilty in his "Historical" Symphony. Such a work, as we think, is only permissible when one style is chosen—when there are four it becomes a fourfold absurdity. The unity of the symphonic form, to mention only the chief sin involved, is outraged. In Spohr's work we see that form treated as though made up of distinct parts, having no connection beyond that of accidental juxtaposition. Hence the "Historical" Symphony, so called, is, in strictness, not one work, but four, placed in the order, and, as regards mere outline, accommodated to the shape of a symphony proper. Beyond these points the difference is fundamental and essential. A symphony proper is not four works, but one; all its parts conducting to the same end, regulated by the same spirit, and indispensable to the same design. Examine any of the symphonies of Mozart or Beethoven, and this unity stands out plainly enough. The ear is led on from movement to movement as by a natural process; and at the close is satisfied with the satisfaction which a complete work of art can give. Contrast this with Spohr's production and the result is startling. In the latter we are shown a succession of phantasmagoria distorted by the medium through which they are apparent, and as distinct one from the other as the shadowy kings in Macbeth. Now Handel and Bach, now Haydn and Mozart, now Beethoven, and now Auber (or what is meant to be these illustrious men), pass before us till the mind is confused and definite ideas made impossible.

But there are special circumstances in the case of Spohr which make his failure more complete. We can only guess how Mozart or Mendelssohn would have succeeded with a "Historical" Symphony; and, guessing, we say they would have made the thing as interesting as complete imitation allows. Spohr has done nothing of the kind. His music is neither one thing nor the other. In outline it resembles the composer's model; in detail it is the pure and unadulterated composer himself. Hence the idea conveyed is, that Spohr could only catch the more obvious features of the men he copied, having no power to grasp their expression or reflect their thoughts. By this Spohr is not wronged. His was not a plastic genius, but one cast in iron. Whatever he did showed unvarying characteristics, and bore the same unmistakable stamp. The least acute judge of style can never mistake his music; for as soon as his florid harmonies, incessant modulation, and sentimental phrases appear, they are recognized with no shadow of reserve. Hence Spohr, of all eminent musicians, was least fitted for the work he undertook. Such a man attempting historical music, is as though Mr. J. L. Toole appeared in the character of the lord Hamlet.

The upshot of the whole matter is not encouraging to the business of a musical masquerade. In composition, as in most other work, naturalness is best; and he most consults his own interest who, having first studied his own genius, implicitly obeys its indications, and employs the gifts of nature as nature intended. Conveying this lesson, the "Historical" Symphony is not without the use which attached to the bones of Bunyan's wandering pilgrims.—London Musical World, Feb. 26.

Death of Prof. Moscheles.

LEIPZIG, MARCH 13.—This celebrated pianist, composer, and teacher, after an illness of eight days, died at his residence in this city on the 10th inst., from inflammation of the lungs. His death was not altogether unexpected, since he had reached the age of seventy-six, and for the past year given signs of failing physical vitality. Still, it is thought and remarked by some of his most intimate friends, that, had he taken the precautions becoming to an individual of that age, had he not ventured out to evening concerts in defiance of inclement weather, and had he lessened his labors as a teacher, some more years might have been his in which to enjoy observations from the great height which he had reached as an artist.

He was born in Prague in the year 1794, May 30. He was the son of a successful merchant. His brilliant talent made itself manifest very early, claiming the attention and admiration of all the great geniuses of music that knew him. He sought instructions from the greatest masters, such as Haydn, Weber, Albrechtsberger and Salleri. Having acquired the excellence attributed to a solo-pianist, he commenced his famous course in giving concerts in the larger cities of Europe. He was well received wherever he appeared, and at length, as an evidence of the appreciation in which his qualifications were held, the Royal Academy of Music, in London, called and established him upon its faculty list for the term of twenty years; where he doubtless would have remained until his death, had he not a short time subsequent to the creation and organization of this Leipzig Conservatory of Music, listened with favor to his favorite pupil, Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who gave him an urgent invitation to take charge of the piano department, of which he has been the star for the last twenty-five years. His unsurpassed excellence as a teacher, his power of analytical and synthetical explanation, gave him a supremacy that is seldom equalled. No one could say of him: "He is a fine player, but a poor teacher." Scattered hither and thither are the fruits of his labor. Some of the most exquisite pianists of the day have received from him their severest and best lessons. Many of these are now distinguishing or have already distinguished themselves in America, and will learn of his departure with regret, while it will awaken some very pleasant memories.

The compositions of this great musician render him no mean praise. There is a distinct individuality in all of his works. Those who are familiar with them will bear testimony as to their excellence; they are of the classic school of his age, of which he is the last.—(We are speaking of piano music, for he seldom, if ever, composed other.)

Aside from his greatness as an artist, much can be justly said of him as a man, serving life generally. His character was noble; he had a generous heart and a discreet mind. The great enthusiasm that he had in his profession caused no neglect of the improvement of his mental forces, and he was able and interesting in conversation upon general topics. All classes found favor in his nobility of soul. Having accumulated a handsome fortune by industry and moderation, he took great pleasure in assisting poor artists in their struggling to attain a worthy point. In fact, it is said that there was but little partiality in his pocket, that the needy and worthy of every class drew from it.

The numerous gathering of pupils, artists, citizens of all classes, this morning, at the house of the deceased to follow his remains to the cemetery, showed how sincere and general a regard was entertained for him. The music sung on this occasion by the pupils of the Conservatory, augmented by other talent of the city, consisted of selections from Elias, chorus thirty-two and twenty-nine, together with other pieces of appropriate character which were given at the grave.

A noble wife, two lovely daughters, and one son,—who is an artist, a painter, in London,—are left to mourn his departure, and remember his remarkable kindness as a husband and a father; not forgetting his tender advice, for we are informed that he was a model of a man in his family in the highest sense of the term. As to this Conservatory of Music, it is called upon to sustain a loss which it will not easily make good. E. S. M.

CINCINNATI, MARCH 18.—Music in Cincinnati has been at a discount this winter. We have had plenty of visitors from abroad, but from an artistic point of view there is very little satisfaction in concerts as they are given by the greater part of traveling minstrels. Their programmes are generally a strange mixture of high and low music, such as cannot but give offence to a true lover of the art. The whole arrangement has a disagreeable sort of a business appearance; even the Boston Quintette Club, I am sorry to say, are not clear of reproach in this respect, playing arrangements of Overtures and Potpourris;—and this, even at the opening of concerts, is not worthy of their reputation.

A bright exception have been the concerts given by Theo. Thomas's Orchestra; their wonderful precision of execution, the beautiful blending of their instruments, and the highly artistic rendering of all the varied compositions they introduced, was a treat long to be remembered. And still they gave us no entire Symphony; the concerts were arranged so as to draw a general public; but this was done throughout in an artistical manner.

The visit of the Parepa-Rosa Opera troupe was most satisfactory and successful, only too short, owing to previous engagements elsewhere. It is a shame that our local reporters always cry down English Opera; they tried their hands even at this troupe, in which attempt, however, they signally failed.

Our Home Concerts have all been poorly attended with hardly any exception. Our Harmonic Society, that should be a leader, have sadly deteriorated in their performances. They swing round the circle in an attempt at drawing a general public, as they would call it, but it is really nothing else than stooping to bad taste, when they mix up with Oratorio music the lightest kind of Operatic Choruses, and male Songs accompanied by humming voices, such as the Germans sing in the open air,—something after the style of Yankee Doodle succeeding "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The redeeming feature in the concerts of the Harmonic Society is Mrs. Dexter's singing, which is always beautiful and artistic. The Cecilia Society continue the even tenor of their way. The programmes of their concerts are always good and attractive, and frequently introduce novelties heard here for the first time. Their new leader, Mr. Nembach, proves to be a musician of thoroughly artistic cultivation, and with his assistance the Society has recently given signs of increased life.

CHICAGO, MARCH 25.—The Testimonial Benefit tendered to the Mendelssohn Quintette Club last Saturday, prior to their return to the East, makes a fitting occasion for me to give your readers a brief outline of their doings in this department of the "moral heritage" during the past few months.

As you know, the Quintette Club came West in October, and entered upon an extended tour which has just closed. They visited and gave concerts in all the principal towns of Michigan, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas and Missouri. To do this they travelled more than 9,000 miles, and gave over 150 concerts. In a large majority of instances their concerts have been the first introduction of really artistic music to the respective audiences; and, when we consider the power of first impressions, we can hardly over-estimate the artistic importance of a series of musical entertainments given by so accomplished artists as these, throughout the small cities that are just now entering upon that stage of existence in which artistic culture becomes possible. This and the unusually extended provincial tour of the Parepa-Rosa troupe, bringing the best singing where no true song had ever been before, seem to determine the present as a musical season long to be remembered.

In many of these towns the Club gave three or four concerts, and in some cases, where but one had been intended, they were obliged to return from long distances to give one or two others, so highly were their efforts appreciated. Of course the programmes were in most cases what a Boston audience would term light, but every one contained at least selections from the classics and very often a whole quartet. Beyond this it was not found possible to carry the attempt to introduce classic music. The remainder of the selections consisted of arrangements of airs from operas, parts of concertos, short extracts from symphonies, and a variety of virtuosos doings. About the best appreciated of all these things were the wonderful performances of Heindl on the flute. The immense number of notes that he manages to get out of a flute in little or no time, and his truly wonderful length of wind, in which none but Parepa seems his equal, proved entirely too much for the self-possession of every audience.

Even in Chicago the programmes were no more severe than the Club have been in the habit of giving in the suburbs of Boston, and by no means up to the ultra-classical standard of the soirées in Chickering's Hall. They have given here eight concerts of the regular series, and quite a number of extra ones in churches in various parts of the city. Our city is divided, as some of your readers may know, into three parts, by that delectable pig trough known as Chicago River, which with its two branches makes a sort of Y around which our city is built. Between the arms of the Y lies the "west side," in which live about half of our population. As there was no suitable room to be had, no concerts were given in this part of the city. Those on the "south side" were given in Crosby's, a kind of dismal appendage of the Opera House, far too large for such concerts, and constantly disturbed by stray sounds from the auditorium or from the thickly jostling cars in the streets below (to say nothing of the man with squeaky boots who opens the windows). I have often wondered why the Club did not give their south-side concerts in the "lower hall" in the building of the Young Men's Christian Association, a room at once quiet, pleasant, and of just the right size.

On the "north side" four regular concerts were given in the Historical Hall, a pleasant, recherché little place, holding four hundred or so. Here they have gathered the best Chicago audiences, and here they have played their best western programmes; yet kindly as they did "temper the wind to the shorn lambs" in the matter of classicism, it was made a request that on the occasion of the farewell benefit the programme should be as light as possible. Hence it came that the following was the bill of fare:

- Overture to the "Post and Peasant".....Suppe.
Scene and Air, "Il Bacio".....
    Miss Jennie Busk.
Italian Fantasia, for Flute.....Terneck.
    Edward Heindl.
Selections from Oberon, for Quintet.....Weber.
Fantasia Melodique, for Violoncello.....Schubert.
    Wulf Fries.
Caprice in B minor, for Piano, Quintet accomp't.
    Mendelssohn.
"Saltarella," Solo for Violin.....Alard.
    William Schultze.
a) Song without Words No. 9, Bk V.....Mendelssohn.
b) Scherzo from "Reformation Symphony".....
English Ballad, "Alpine Shepherd".....Glover.
    Miss Jennie Busk.
First Potpourri, an Original and Favorite Theme.
    T. Ryan.

Concerning the execution of these selections I do not need to say anything, except that it was in the Club's best style. One of the most interesting features was the Mendelssohn Caprice, of which the piano part was played by Miss Tinkham, a young lady of, apparently, sixteen or so. Her performance made a very favorable impression, it was so modest yet so assured, and the result gave so much evidence of artistic comprehension and such promise for the future. It was also gratifying that the debut of a young pianiste should be made in a work of real merit, rather than in a pretentious show-piece, as is commonly the case. In this respect Miss Tinkham's example may properly put many of our teachers to the blush.

I have spun rather a long yarn; my excuse is that I fear me it will be many a day before my pen gets afool of this noble band of musicians again.

Meanwhile I am, DER FREYSCHUETZ.

Concerts.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The two Benefits of the past fortnight (Thursday, March 24 and 31) filled out the full dozen of grand SYMPHONY CONCERTS given under the auspices of the Association during the fifth season. With programmes of as nearly equal excellence as possible, and equal chances of a worthy rendering, these two concerts, musically, might have been expected to prove equally attractive; and indeed the unflagging interest and enthusiasm, with which the ten subscription concerts had been followed up, naturally led to the belief that the prospect of two more would be eagerly and generally welcomed; the more so that the members of the Association waived their privilege of the first choice of seats. But circumstances alter cases, and there was a great and unexpected difference in the sale of tickets for the two. The first, in aid of the projected Museum of the Fine Arts, barely covered expenses; and indeed, but for the generous reduction of charges on the part of the Orchestra, the Music Hall, and one or two newspapers, and the outright gift of their valuable services by Mr. Zerrahn and Mr. Leonhard, it would have proved a loss. The explanation is two-fold: first, because the public at large are not yet sufficiently possessed with the idea of the Art Museum, and with its importance. But then the Benefit would never have been thought of, had it not been taken for granted that the musical attraction of itself would be pretty sure to fill the hall. At any other time, perhaps, it would have done so; but just then there had one star risen into the ascendant, exciting to the general imagination; Miss ANNA MEHLIG was to play in the second Concert, Mr. ZERRAHN's Benefit! This, added to the great popularity of our Conductor. Thomas's splendid orchestra also was announced for a whole week of concerts, with Miss Mehlig too for his bright particular star. So the more familiar, unpretending excellence of the intermediate occasion was overlooked. It could not reasonably be supposed, all things considered, that either concert would be a whit better than the other; only the first was doomed to comparatively small attendance. Now for a brief review of each.

That for the ART MUSEUM had the following programme:

- Suite, for Orchestra, in D, (Second time).....J. S. Bach.
    Overture. Aria. Gavotte.
Fifth Symphony, in C minor.....Beethoven.
Piano-Forte Concerto, in A minor, op. 54.....Schumann.
    Allegro Affettuoso.—Intermezzo.—Finale.
    Hugo Leonhard.
Serenade (from a Quartet), by all the strings.....Haydn.
Overture to "Leonora," No. 3, in C.....Beethoven.

The Suite by Bach was beautifully played,—a marked improvement on the first performance,—and the sincere, healthy, hearty music was keenly relished; particularly the lovely Aria and the jovial Gavotte. The C-minor Symphony (one of the two prime favorites among the nine of Beethoven, and about which musicians never can agree which is the greatest, this or the seventh), and the greatest perhaps of all Overtures, the Leonora, No. 4, were also admirably played. The little Haydn Serenade again, by all the strings (this time unmuted, giving an effect of greater breadth and number than before) served for a tempting bonne bouche between the two great pieces of the second part, and made a witching effect of pianissimo and naive delicacy.

Schumann's Concerto in A minor is certainly one of the three or four greatest works in that kind after the two or three greatest by Beethoven; and in Mr. LEONHARD we had an artist of the finer stamp, amply equal to it, technically as well as in the power of rightly conceiving and reproducing the spirit of musical creations of so high an order,—one whose appearance is always hailed with pleasure and who never disappoints. But the fates were against him; a most annoying accident, one perhaps unprecedented, but which might have occurred to anybody, crossed, not so much his own best mood, as the conditions of the best effect of the performance. By some carelessness in moving the fine Chickering piano into its place, the lid which shuts down over the keyboard had got lifted at one end out of its socket, so that, as he played, it slowly slid forward resting on the black keys. This, growing irremediable otherwise, brought the performance to a full stop, and orchestra and pianist were obliged to begin the piece anew. As it was, though of course much disturbed and feeling as if the gracious spell were broken, Mr. Leonhard gave an admirable rendering of the work; indeed we never listened to a more exquisite treatment of the delicate Intermezzo.

The concert was exceedingly enjoyed by nearly a thousand people, and was indeed one of the truest feasts of Art of the whole season. As for the Art Museum, it at least helped to call attention to a noble project, and to inaugurate the movement worthily, and we may trust auspiciously, with noble music.

Mr. ZERRAHN's Benefit filled the Music Hall, and was in every way a warm and worthy tribute to the indefatigable Conductor who has moulded our orchestral material to such fine service. Surely the difference between their performance and that of the Thomas Orchestra will be found to have narrowed very perceptibly since last year. Here is the programme:

- Overture: "Meerestille und glückliche Fahrt" (Becalmed at Sea; a Breeze; Happy Voyage; Coming into Port).
    Mendelssohn.
Piano-Forte Concerto, No. 5, in E flat, op. 73. Beethoven.
    Allegro. Adagio. Rondo Finale.
    Miss Anna Mehlig.
Vorspiel to the fifth act of "King Manfred," C. Reinecke.
    (First time in Boston).
Concert-stueck, for P. F. with Orchestra.....Weber.
    Miss Anna Mehlig.
Seventh Symphony, in A major.....Beethoven.

The orchestra, throughout, was up to its highest mark of excellence, and the audience enthusiastic to the end, although the concert was unusually long,—for which said audience must thank itself, or rather, one portion of it thank the other. Without attempt at encores it would have kept itself within bounds. The old Seventh Symphony never rang out its note of triumph and of joy more gloriously; and the becalmed ship of Mendelssohn's fancy made its happiest voyage and came into port with flying colors. For best effect, however, it should end a concert; but it was well to separate the great Beethoven Symphony from the great Beethoven Concerto.

The short Prelude from Reinecke's opera is a rich, subdued, sweet strain of harmony, mostly for the strings, and with a certain sense of mystery about it, which took the fancy of the audience and had to be repeated. We cannot say that there seemed to be much originality, much thought or fancy in it; it is such a strain as an organist might improvise with a subdued, calm, serious feeling, and charms more by its nice execution, than by any rare invention.

Miss MEHLIG made another triumph, in the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven, showing the same vitality of touch and of conception, the same easy, perfect grasp of all its phrases, chords and passages, the same brilliant, exquisitely shaded execution. And the same wonderful power; for in the strong, swift octave passages she was clearly heard above the fortissimo of the whole orchestra. Nothing could be finer, too, than the perpetual shading which she gave (say) to that long staccato passage which travels up and down the instrument so strangely and with such singular effect. We do not say that it is or can be in so young an artist to enter fully into all the intentions of the most deeply planned mature work of so deep a nature as Beethoven; one must have lived much and tasted deep experience for this. But it was a thoroughly musical, vitalized, sincere performance, and carried a magnetic virtue with it. The Adagio was given with exquisite delicacy of feeling. In some other parts, especially the finale, there were occasional ritardandos in which expression seemed a little overdone; was it the influence of Liszt? But there is no affectation about it, nor can you detect a shade of that in manner or performance; she is sincerely absorbed and happy in her music, and at the same time never hurried out of tempo by her own excitement, but having the artistic self-possession to a degree remarkable for one so young, and most refreshing. We do not remember ever to have heard so brilliant and triumphant a performance as hers was of Weber's cheval-de bataille for piano virtuosos. It electrified the house.

So closed the fifth and still the most successful season of the Harvard Concerts. We shall sum up the whole five at leisure.

MR. ERNST PERABO'S two Soirées were a welcome supplement to his two series of Matinées (four in each). Of the first (Tuesday, March 22) this was the programme:

Sonata, (C major), unfinished; written in April, 1825. Schubert.

- [First time in Boston].
 a. Moderato. c. Menuetto, Allegretto, unfinished.
 b. Andante. d. Rondo, Allegro, unfinished.
 "Hochzeitlied." [Wedding Song]. op. 20. . . . . Carl Löwe.
 Six Variations, op. 34, F major. . . . . Beethoven.
 Songs: a. "Du liebes Auser," op. 16, No. 1.
 b. "Die Rose, die Lilie," op. 34, No. 5.
 c. "Wenn der Frühling auf die Berge steigt."
 Op. 42, No. 6. . . . . Robert Franz.
 Sonata, op. 52. D major. . . . . Schubert.
 a. Allegro vivace. c. Scherzo, Allegro vivace.
 b. Con moto. d. Rondo, Allegro moderato.

The Sonata in D of Schubert had already been made somewhat familiar here in several renderings by Mr. Perabo, and is always welcomed as one of the most spirited and grand of his creations in that form. The young artist always plays it con amore and with a fire that makes it felt. Of the unfinished Sonata in C, it was our misfortune to lose the first half. What we heard was interesting and original; but it did seem that the composer broke off so suddenly in the Rondo after prolonged and vain attempts to round it to a close. The Six Variations by Beethoven (heard here only once before when Miss Alide Topp introduced them), are worthy specimens of the great master's rare, imaginative gift in variation-making,—out of a pregnant theme (often, as in this case, his own) developing exquisite surprises, in each of which you still trace unmistakably the family relationship. They were finely rendered.

Mr. KREISSMANN'S singing added greatly to the pleasure of this concert. We wish we had room to transfer to these columns the clever translation that was printed on the bill, of Goethe's exquisitely droll, fantastic Ballad: "The Wedding Song." Löwe's music, both song and accompaniment, expresses all its images most graphically, and the singer and pianist brought it out with fine effect. Of course the three Franz songs were sung as no one else but Kreissmann sings them; the third ("When the Spring comes climbing o'er the hills") is one of the very finest in the last sets Franz has given to the world.

The second and last Soirée (March 29) was one of the most rare treats that Perabo has ever given. The programme of itself shows that:

- Grand Duo for four hands, op. 140, C major. . . . . Schubert.
 [First time in Boston].
 Etude en Forme de Variations, op. 18. . . . . Schumann.
 a. "Beethoven's" Song of Repentance, from "Geistliche Lieder von Gellert," vol. 2. . . . . Beethoven.
 Arranged by Franz Liszt.
 b. "Die Abgeschiedenen," The Secluded, op. 9, vol. 2, No. 8. . . . . Carl Löwe.
 Arranged by Ernst Perabo.
 Grand Septet, op. 74, D minor. . . . . Hummel.
 Arranged by Franz Liszt.

The Duo in C, for four hands, is indeed "Grand;" its themes, its whole thought, the broad way in which the work is laid out, suggest orchestral proportions. To more than one musician it had long ago occurred that Schubert must have meant it in the end for a grand Symphony. Portions of it, as the Scherzo particularly, need an orchestra to express their full intentions. Accordingly the great violinist Joachim has done a good work in scoring it for a Symphony; and doubtless in that form it would have been heard before now in our Harvard Concerts, but for the fact that the publisher in Vienna who owns the MS. score and parts has not yet seen fit to print them. Mr. LEONHARD joined hands with PERABO in the performance, and the two artists worked together with a manly sympathy and mutual understanding, bringing out its grandeurs and its traits of delicacy so that all were much impressed by the whole work and would gladly have heard it over again. The Andante seems to us only second to the divine one in the great ninth Symphony of the same composer.

The Schumann Variations in C-sharp minor were once played by Mr. Perabo in a Symphony Concert, and from one of that author's most important works. Great depth of meaning and of feeling, logical persistency of thought with marvellous imaginative variety of illustration and a power of holding up the same essential idea in many lights and in the tempering atmosphere of many moods, is what you feel in it throughout. In this extremely difficult task Mr. Perabo acquitted himself nobly. A yet more arduous task awaited him; namely, to play the Hummel Septet entire, (the parts of the other six instruments incorporated into one by Liszt, in that masterly bold way of his), with his one pair of hands. We must confess we never listened to the Septet with more satisfaction; for with such arrangement and such playing, the unity was complete, the outline nowhere blurred or broken.

The song transcriptions, too were interesting. The "Busslied," the only one of much pretension (though all are beautiful and noble, full of pure religious feeling) of Beethoven's settings of Six Religious Songs by Gellert, consists of two movements: the first slow and mournful, as if weighed down with the sense of sin; and then a quicker tempo, with a figurative movement, as the hope of mercy brightens in the soul. But why Liszt has worked up this latter part into such a furore of brasses passes our comprehension; the religious poetry seems utterly forgotten; nor could the pianist well resist such invitation to unbridled accelerando. His own simple and honest transcription of the sweet and tender melody of Löwe brought repose again.

Mrs. C. A. BARRY'S Farewell Concert was largely attended and most enjoyable; the programme one of the very best of the miscellaneous kind in a large hall, without orchestra, that we remember. But we are obliged to reserve the fuller notice it deserves.

The same, too, of the opening Orchestral Concerts of THOMAS THOMAS, (since we have to go to press before Fast Day); they will furnish rich and varied matter for discussion in the lump. The first (Tuesday eve) was crowded and received with great enthusiasm, Miss MEHLIG again covering herself with glory. To-day there will be two Concerts. Afternoon: Mozart Symphony in D; Beethoven's loveliest Concerto, in G, by ANNA MEHLIG; Liszt's "Preludes," &c., &c. Evening: Overtures to "Oberon" and "Tannhäuser," Air and Gavotte by Bach; Scherzo from Reformation Symphony; Torchlight March by Meyerbeer; Hungarian March, Berlioz; Quartet for Horn; Trombone Solo, &c. Sunday Eve: Schumann's B-flat Symphony; Gade's "Spring Fantasy," for vocal Quartet (Miss GATES, Miss RYAN, Mr. KREISSMANN and Mr. SCHRAUBSTÄDTER), piano (Miss MEHLIG) and Orchestra; three movements from Beethoven's "Prometheus" music; "Erl King," by Mr. Kreissmann, &c. Monday: (last concert,) when Miss Mehlig will play Liszt's Concerto in E-flat, and the chief orchestral novelty will be a Suite by Raff.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG.—The death of the Nestor among pianists and piano-teachers and composers, IGNAZ MOSCHELES, beloved by all, and who has written music that will not soon perish, is announced in a letter which we print upon another page.

Our townsman, OTTO DRESSEL, has been invited in most flattering terms to play in the Gewandhaus Concerts, and a place kept open for him in the programme for a long time; but his poor health has prevented his acceptance of the honor.

A correspondent, a Bostonian, sends us programmes of the Gewandhaus Concerts, as follows:

12th Concert, Jan. 13. Overture: "In the Highlands," Gade; Aria from "Elijah," sung by Frau Peschka-Leutner; Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto, played by Fräulein Emma Brandes, of Schwerin; Aria from Haydn's "Seasons;" Piano Solos: Presto in A, by Scarlatti, "Des Abends," Schumann, and Rondo in C, Weber; First Symphony, in B flat, Schumann.

13th Concert, Jan. 20. Fest-Overture by Rob. Volkmann; two Songs, in Canon style, for female Chorus, by Reinecke; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, by Herr Singer, of Würtemberg.—Gade's third Symphony, in A minor; two Songs for female chorus, with accomp. of two horns and harp, by Brahms; Romanza in F, Beethoven, and Rhapsodie Hongroise, Singer, (both for violin.)

14th Concert, Jan. 27. Mozart's Birthday; selections all from his works.—Overture to "Zauberflöte;" Canzona from "Figaro's Marriage," sung by Fräulein Lilli Lehmann; Sinfonie Concertante for Violin and Viola (Concertmasters Röntgen and David); Aria from "Don Juan;" Piano Solos: Rondo in A minor, and Fantasie in F minor (Kapellmeister C. Reinecke); "Orgelstücke für seine Uhr;" Chorus from "Zauberflöte," sung by the Pauliner Sängerverein—Symphony in C, with the fugue finale.

15th, Feb. 3. Overture to "Jessonda," Spohr; Hummel's Piano Concerto in B minor, played by Herr Sigismund Blumner, of Berlin; Scene from Weber's "Euryanthe."—Mendelssohn's "Antigone" music, (text declaimed by Fräulein Link and Herr Arnau, solos sung by Herren Wiedeman, Rebling, Schmidt and Ehrke, choruses by the Pauliner Sängerverein.

Feb. 10. (For the Benefit of the Orchestra Fund). Fantasie-Overture to Moore's "Paradise and the Peri," Sterndale Bennett; Recit and Aria, with violin obbligato, Mozart, (Fr. Peschka-Leutner and David); E flat Concerto of Beethoven, played by Fräulein Emma Brandes.—Prelude for Violin Solo, Bach, arranged for orchestra by Stöhr; Aria from Winter's "Interrupted Sacrifice;" Piano Solos: "Humoreske," Schumann, and Rondo Capriccioso, Mendelssohn; "Overture: "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz.

16th Concert, Feb. 17. Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Schumann; Recit. and Aria from Handel's "Rinaldo," sung by Fräulein Volkart of Zürich; Adagio for Violin, Spohr, played by Fräulein Franziska Friese (a pupil of the Conservatorium, from Berlin); Recit. and Aria from Gluck's "Orpheus;" Variations on a theme from Mozart, for the Violin, by David, performed by Fräulein Friese; Songs, with Piano: "Des Morgens in dem Thau," by J. Heuchemer, and "Du wunderschönes Kind," by Th. Kirchner.—Symphony No. 2, in D, Beethoven.

—More of like sort in our next.

DRESDEN.—The following extracts from Dresden journals will of course interest our readers. The distinguished critic, Carl Banck, writes in the Dresdener Journal:

"Herr B. J. LANG, of Boston, gave a piano concert on Friday, March 11, in the hall of the piano-maker Rönisch. He played compositions of J. S. Bach, Handel, Chopin, Mendelssohn (G-minor Concerto and Caprice, op. 16), Liszt (arrangement of Weber's Polonaise in E flat). His playing showed a technique very clean and thorough, with an easy handling; while his rendering evinced a sound musical culture, and an intelligent conception shaping all with fine and careful shading. Most praiseworthy was his rendering of the Mendelssohn compositions; in those which give room for a freer movement, a want of flow and sweep of rhythm was more perceptible. Of the two Fantasies of his own composition, short lyric pieces—Songs without Words—the first particularly showed a right fine and thoughtful feeling. It must be remarked, that Herr Lang is an excellent organ player, who distinguishes himself by the musical correctness and tasteful treatment of his performances upon that instrument. Herr L. will give another concert by the end of this month."

The Tageblatt says: "All who were present count it among their pleasantest musical memories of this winter; for, high as are the requirements now made, among the multitude of good pianists, the concert-giver satisfied them completely. The artistic understanding with which the programme was put together showed, that Herr Lang belongs among those virtuosos, whose power results from æsthetic striving, and not from mere mechanical studies. With equal excellence he interpreted Bach, Handel and Mendelssohn, as well as Chopin and Liszt. His playing is distinguished by pithy, energetic comprehension, while the elegiac element steps somewhat into the back-ground. His own two Fantasies, in A major and C major, with whose rendering Herr Lang gave pleasure, are cleverly invented and particularly distinguished by enchainment modulation."

ORATORIO CONCERTS. Mr. Barnby's zeal for high and noble tasks has shown itself lately in the production of Beethoven's great Missa Solemnis, in D, which had been only twice before performed in England. (We heard it in 1861 at the Birmingham Festival). This time it was preceded by the Choral Fantasia, Mme. Arabella Goddard playing the piano part.—They have already commenced rehearsal on the equally great and difficult problem of the Matthew Passion by Sebastian Bach. What they have begun, we doubt not, they will carry through. Would it were so here in Boston!

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY'S CONCERTS.—Two grand symphonies by Beethoven and Cherubini, and a concerto of Mendelssohn's, formed a fit opening concert for the 58th season of this old society. Cherubini led the way with a symphony in D, composed for the society in the year 1815, which was performed for the third time at the concert on Wednesday evening at S. James's Hall, to an unusually crowded and fashionable audience. It is somewhat lengthy and in parts heavy, but the few opening bars succeeded by a spirited allegro, and the minuetto and trio especially noticeable, were sufficient to sustain the interest and assert the master hand of this veteran Italian composer. The concerto of Mendelssohn's was that in E minor, the executant being Mme. Norman-Neruda. This lady, whose wonderful genius stops at nothing, fairly surpassed herself in this tuneful and yet difficult composition. The applause was so spontaneous that the allegro was suspended for some few minutes at the end of some beautiful passages which occur in this wonderful movement, so brilliant was the tone and bowing. Of course at the conclusion of the finale allegro, with its irresistible melody, the lady was enthusiastically recalled. Beethoven's symphony was that in C minor (No. 5); so well is this sublime work of the great master known that it is needless to comment on its many beauties; suffice it to say that it was never given with more spirit, and was much applauded. The overtures selected were Der Freischütz (Weber), and Fidelio (No. 4) Beethoven. The vocalists were Mlle. Carola and Mr. Vernon Rigby, the lady choosing an air from Mozart's Idomeneo, and two lieder of Schubert, while Mr. Rigby gave "Love sounds the alarm" (Acis and Galatea), Handel. At the second concert on March 30th, symphony in D (Mozart), and symphony in F, No. 8, (Beethoven), with Herr Joachim as soloist, are announced.—Choir, March 19.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—Two works were conspicuous in the scheme of Saturday's Popular Concert; one, Schubert's quintet for violins, viola, and two violoncellos (Op. 163); the other, a "dramatic fantasia" for pianoforte, by Wilhelm Friedemann Bach. Schubert's work was lately revived by Mr. Chappell, and met with so much favour as to secure the honour of Saturday's repetition. The result might have been foreseen, although enormous length stood in the way. So far, the quintet is comparable to its author's ninth symphony, which, as everybody knows makes equal demand upon one's admiration and one's time. No composer less fertile than Schubert in beautiful ideas, and not more endowed with ability to use for the best such as he may have, could write at equal length without material loss. But the quintet proves, what, indeed, the ninth symphony proved long ago, that Schubert is the "Ancient Mariner" of his order. His story may be very long, but there is no getting away from him. Instead of discussing Op. 163 in detail, we will simply mention that it displays both the characteristic beauties and defects of a man who, not free from the latter, abounded in the former. The work was played to perfection by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Daubert, and Piatti.

W. F. Bach's fantasia is one of a series of "Revivals," now publishing, and will therefore come under notice at a future time. We may, however, say at once that in certain respects it equals, in others surpasses the work by the same author which was brought forward not long ago. Each movement shows clearness of design, attractive melody, and pleasant airiness of treatment; while the dramatic character given by the use of recitative is alike novel and interesting. As usual, when new things are produced at these concerts, Mme. Arabella Goddard was the pianist. Freidenmann Bach's music made but little demand upon her great executive power, but it enabled her to show once more with what ability she can read a work, and lay its meaning as well as its design before her audience. The accomplished lady was recalled after retiring from the platform; and richly deserved the honor. Beethoven's favorite sonata for piano and violin in C minor (Op. 36) ended the concert; in its performance Mme. Goddard was associated with Herr Joachim, the result being simply perfect. Miss Edmonds sang two songs after a fashion as unpretending as it was charming.

The concert on Monday was one of the most brilliant of the season. Mme. Arabella Goddard played Mendelssohn's three magnificent "Posthumous Studies" magnificently, and was encored in the second (in F) and third (in A minor). The "encore" to the third was too emphatic to be disregarded, and the Study was accordingly repeated. Equally remarkable was Mme. Goddard's performance of Sterndale Bennett's exquisite "Chamber Trio" in A, with violin and violoncello—Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti. A more perfect execution of a work full of delicacy, and while, at times, just as marked by vigor and brilliancy, has rarely been listened to. The charming Serenade which forms the middle movement, with its piquant accompaniment for violin and violoncello, "pizzicato" was enthusiastically encored and repeated. The success of the Trio in A was so decided that, as we understand, it is to be given again at the Monday Popular Concerts, April 4th on the occasion of Mme. Goddard's annual "benefit." The quartets at the concert on Monday last were Beethoven, No. 4, Op. 18 (in C minor), and one by Haydn in G (first time). Both were played by Herr Joachim, Herr Ries, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti, in perfection. The singer was Mlle. Carola. Mr. Benedict was the accompanist.—Mus. World, March 19.

On Monday night, Mme. Schumann made her first appearance for the season, and played Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, Op. 31, in a manner peculiarly her own. She was twice enthusiastically called back at the end of her performance. She also played with Herr Joachim, the same composer's sonata in A major, Op. 30. Schumann's labored quartet in F major began the concert. Now that Mr. Chappell has joined hands with Mr. Manns of the Crystal Palace, we may hope to be speedily Schumannized to a wish. The most interesting instrumental feature of the programme was Beethoven's trio in G, for violin, viola, and cello, splendidly played by Joachim, Straus, and Piatti. The singing of Herr Stockhausen, in songs by Schubert, Schumann, and Handel, was as near perfection as possible. Being encored in Schumann's "Widmung," he sang another Lied by that composer.—Mus. World, Feb. 26.

FLORENCE.—Herr von Bülow performed several pieces at the last concert, given by the Società Cherubini.

KONIGSBERG.—Herr Rubinstein's last work, a "one-act sacred opera," entitled Der Turmbau von Babel, was performed a short time ago.

LEIGR.—The 129th anniversary of Grétry's birth was celebrated in this town, his birthplace, by the revival of his opera, Zémire et Azore. The Guide Musical observes:—"It is a strange thing that of all Grétry's scores, the one which, in our opinion, has preserved its color, together with its freshness and novelty, is the very one in which, to use the expression of Grétry himself, he tried to do a bit of the old —, we mean Richard Cœur de Lion, a work full of originality and chivalrous character. We do not hesitate preferring it greatly to Zémire et Azore, which, we all know, was the composer's favorite opera. We cannot conceal the fact, that Zémire et Azore has aged extremely, both as regards the music and the book." It might reasonably be supposed that, if the management thought it worth while to revive the opera, and on such an occasion, too, they would have done so in good style. Quite the contrary. The performance was unsatisfactory. On this head our contemporary remarks:—"The occasion was a solemn one: a great fuss had been previously made about it. The fact was notified to every person who passed by a few wretched flags, waving in the cold air, around Grétry's statue, and the public came in great numbers, believing in a programme of which only a portion of the promises was fulfilled." After Zémire et Azore, Mlle. Juillet read the verses composed by M. Marcellis, senior, for the inauguration of Grétry's statue, in 1843; then various choruses, by the hero of the festival, were sung, and, lastly, his bust was duly crowned, on the stage, with laurels.—About the middle of March, Mme. Adeline Patti will appear in Faust and Les Huguenots. In the latter opera she will sustain, for the first time in any theatre, the part of Valentine.

Moscheles.

(From the Leipzig "Signale," translated for the London Musical World.)

Another of the great musical celebrities whom Leipzig proudly called her own has passed from among us, and the loss will be deeply felt, not only here but everywhere else. On the morning of the tenth of March, the sad news ran through the town with the speed of lightning, that, at a quarter past 2 A. M., Professor Ignatius Moscheles had gently and quietly expired.

Though he was very old—having nearly completed his 76th year—and had been ailing the entire winter, the noble-minded master seemed to have happily got over the last serious attack. A few days previous to his decease, he was seen in the concert-room and in the theatre, where the production of new works always greatly interested him; for the warmest sympathy with all artists and all matters connected with art was one of the many amiable and rare qualities which distinguished him, even at his advanced age. But a sudden relapse again flung him on a bed of sickness, and, a few days later, a pulmonary attack put an end to his existence.—Let us cast a hasty retrospective glance on the career, so fertile in beneficial results, a career which the honored master pursued with undiminished intellectual power to the very last—a career of fame, prosperity and peace.

Ignatius Moscheles was born on the 30th of March, 1794, at Prague, where his father was an Israelitish tradesman. His musical talent manifested itself at so early an age, that his father, a careful man, soon made him take lessons, first from Zahradka, a Bohemian, and then, from Hozelsky. When the boy was ten, he was fit for the Prague Conservatory, of which the celebrated director, Dionys Weber, instructed him from 1804 to 1808, with such good results that the young phenomenon was able to appear in public by 1806, exciting universal astonishment, both by his virtuoso-like, fiery pianoforte-playing, and his successful essays in composition. It was determined that he should be sent to Vienna (1808), in order that he might there complete his musical education.

As a boy of fourteen, Moscheles enjoyed the advantage of instruction, at Vienna, first from Albrechtsberger and afterwards from Salieri. The result was most astounding. The very next year (1809) he played at a concert in Vienna with great success. Salieri took a warm interest in him, and afterwards appointed him his deputy for three years at the Kärnthner-Theater, thus exempting him at the same time from the military conscription. The young virtuoso's talent developed itself so quickly and brilliantly that he soon became one of the favorites of the Vienna public, and the centre of all matters connected with concerts, though Hummel (who left Vienna in 1816) was then shining as a star of the first magnitude, and young Meyerbeer exciting great sensation as a pianist. But it was this very rivalry which impelled Moscheles to keep raising himself higher and higher. At the age of two-and-twenty he was the most popular pianoforte teacher and virtuoso, besides displaying indefatigable industry as a composer; his extemporaneous performances on the piano were celebrated even then. "The public," Hanslick tells us, in Moscheles's own words, "rushed forward, with open arms, to receive and welcome the virtuoso; for bravura pieces at that period were something new." During the Congress of Vienna, (1815), Moscheles played, for the first time, his most brilliant effort as a virtuoso, namely, his "Variations, with Orchestra, on Alexander's March," a piece that afterwards became so celebrated. In 1817 he gave concerts with the very popular guitarist, Giuliani, and, in 1818, with Mayseder, both these artists having previously played with Hummel. Moscheles earned no less applause and honor than his celebrated predecessor.

As far back as 1816 Moscheles made his first professional tour through Germany, everywhere exciting admiration by his eminent virtuosity as well as by the elegance and dash of his style. During another tour, undertaken in 1820, he visited Holland, France, and England, meeting with so brilliant a reception that, in 1821, he settled in London. It is from the time of his sojourn in England that his European celebrity commenced. It was in England, too, that he entered upon the full maturity of his productive powers, powers which soon obtained for him a name as celebrated in the character of a composer for the piano as in that of a performer on it. He did not return to Germany before 1823. He visited his birthplace, as well as Munich, Dresden, Leipzig, Berlin, Hamburg, etc., and in Vienna achieved even greater triumphs than ever. He came forth the decided conqueror from a contest with Kalkbrenner. The public acknowledged, unhesitatingly, that there was a profounder purport in Moscheles's compositions, and something more imposing in his style; with all his smoothness and bravura, Kalkbrenner was superficial. Moscheles's extemporaneous performances, too, performances in which he displayed such unusual brilliancy, far surpassed those of Kalkbrenner. Moscheles and Hummel were, at that period, acknowledged unconditionally as the most effective composers for the pianoforte, and the most sterling virtuosos since the time of Mozart and Beethoven; with them there began a new period of pianoforte playing.

After his return to London (1824), Moscheles received all the honors which the English love to bestow upon their favorites. He was appointed Professor at the Royal Academy of Music (1825), and a Director of the Philharmonic Concerts; he was the most fashionable master among the aristocracy, and the most popular pianist, while his co-operation was as early sought for the concerts of others, as his own were invariably numerous attended. For the cultivation and propagation of classical music, as well as for the elevation of musical taste generally, Moscheles did a great deal in England, for he did not confine his efforts to London alone, but visited the provincial towns, as well as Scotland and Ireland.

It was at this period that young Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, during his tour through England, studied under Moscheles, who soon became his most intimate friend. Mendelssohn's letters mention this in a most charming manner. The fact of Mendelssohn's removing to Leipzig was the primary cause of Moscheles coming here on a visit, and, among other things, giving a concert with Mendelssohn, when the two masters played Moscheles's "Hommage à Handel," together, an event of which Schumann wrote so enthusiastic an account.

This bond of friendship between the two artists assumed great and lasting significance when Mendelssohn, after the establishment of the Leipzig Conservatory, prevailed on Moscheles to migrate to Leipzig, and accept the post of first professor of the piano. This was in 1846, and must have been of all the greater importance for the prosperity and reputation of the newly founded institution, from the fact that Mendelssohn was unfortunately taken from us the very next year. Moscheles's celebrated name attracted a large number of pupils from far and near, especially from England and America. The noble-minded master was indefatigable in precept and example; in the encouragement of young students of talent; and in the never varying kindness with which he gave his opinion on their productions; he was a model of punctuality and unflagging zeal in the discharge of his professional duties, while his mental freshness and bodily vigor were so rare that he continued to figure successfully as a virtuoso and composer up to a very advanced period of his life. While, on the one hand, he knew how to maintain, with undiminished strength, the classical traditions of the grand period to which his youth belonged, he advanced, on the other, in a most extraordinary manner, with his own times, taking an interest in everything new and important, and being always kind and just in his opinion of others.

It was not alone as a pianist and a teacher, but as a composer likewise, that Moscheles rendered lasting service to art. As virtuosity with him was not the final object, but simply the artistic means, his compositions bear the sterling stamp of classical form and artistic earnestness, and, even in the higher solo style, always exhibit delicate and interesting touches. His Études are justly considered classical models of indisputable value. Of his eight "Concertos for the Piano and Orchestra," that in G minor is the most celebrated. From the long list of his other works (the Opus No. of those published goes up to 142), we would especially select the "Sonate mélancolique;" the Trio, Op. 84; the Sextet, Op. 35; the Septet, Op. 88; the "Hommage à Handel," for two pianos; the "Sonata for four Hands," Op. 47; and the "Sonata for Pianoforte and Violoncello," Op. 121. Moscheles wrote for the orchestra several symphonies and two overtures, (those to The Jungfrau von Orleans, and to the ballet, Die Porträts). As an author, too, he proved his cleverness; he wrote, among other things, an English biography of Beethoven, in which he alluded to his own connection with that master, who entertained a high personal regard for him as the interpreter of his works. Moscheles added, moreover, a collection of original letters.

It is said that Moscheles has written an autobiography, which will most certainly be published. The deceased master was in the laudable habit of keeping a very exact diary, and this will doubtless furnish a rich store of materials for the special history of music. His name will live honorably in the history of art; his portrait will never be effaced from the memory of any one who knew him.

(From The Orchestra. March 25th.)

Ignace Moscheles—the son of the Jew tradesman of Prague—stands as one of the first results of the bread cast upon the waters by Mozart and Beethoven. When a boy it was thought that a professor of music should know something more than the technicalities of mere playing, and he was brought up like the masters of old, thoroughly well versed in all appertaining to his business as both an art and science. From his youth up he was a great executant upon the piano, and his scientific knowledge enabled him to hold the position his performances had given him. In the last fifty years Moscheles has occupied a foremost place in the long catalogue of artists in music, and he has died in harness as one of the professors in the Leipzig Conservatoire at the ripe age of seventy-eight [?] years. Fétis records he was born in 1794—others that the date showed 1791. He left the Royal Academy of Music here when much wanted, nor has his place been supplied. His great love, his passionate affection for Mendelssohn, and his unnecessary dread of the influence of the new school of Thalberg on the amateurs of this country led him to exchange his tutorial duties in London for the more quiet but more severe routine of the Academy at Leipzig; but it was a mistake; had he stayed no man would have been more patronized, no man more admired. He was essentially an artist, as his conduct invariably gained him the respect and esteem accorded the artist. He died at Leipzig, on the 10th inst.

Moscheles was born at Prague, between 1791 and 1794, of Hebrew parents; and, when about ten years of age, entered the conservatory of that city, then under the rule of Dionys Weber. He was educated in the school of Clementi, strengthened by close study of the clavier compositions of Bach, Handel, Haydn, and Mozart. When about twelve years old, he played in the public concerts at Prague with success; and soon after left Prague for Vienna, studying counterpoint under Albrechtsberger, and the philosophy of composition under Salieri. Moscheles here met Meyerbeer, then a famed pianist, and each helped the other in their common study. From 1816 to 1821 Moscheles travelled through Germany to Paris, and so great were his performances on the piano that he was distinguished as the founder of a new school—something which in matter and manner surpassed that of Clementi, the father of piano playing, and even that of the no less famed J. A. Cramer. When at Paris he gave several concerts at the Grand Opera, and no doubt made a great impression on the leading members of the far-famed Conservatoire. From Paris he came to London, then the residence of Ries, also a pupil of Beethoven, who ever since 1813 had held great sway among the pianists of this metropolis. Ries had played much and composed much; for so long as Muzio Clementi continued to give him forty guineas for a sonata, he wrote without ceasing, and the Ries sonata was a perfect drug in the concert room. The style of Moscheles was sunlight in comparison with that of Ries, and the latter soon left Moscheles to the field and the honor thereof.

Moscheles came to this country in 1821, and appeared at the Philharmonic concerts the same season with Mr. Kiesewetter, the great violin player, and Mr. Tulou, the then emperor of performers on the flute. The subscribers to this celebrated concert heard Moscheles first in his concerto in E flat. He was then in his thirtieth year, and had achieved a great reputation on the continent. In those days the leading pianists were Clementi, J. B. Cramer, Ries, Neate, Potter, Meves, Cianchettini, and Griffin. Moscheles from his performance that evening, took a foremost position, and it is recorded of him that "his powers of execution were wonderful, and the physical construction of his hand such as to render ordinary difficulties mere amusement or child's play. Both the school of composition and the general style and expression were new to English ears; his music was described as wanting melody, and being somewhat hard and much energy and contrast; when ingenious, quaint; and when forcible, bordering somewhat on the violent; ever learned and often surprising, it left nothing to sink in the soul or live in the memory. But in style of playing he was universally allowed the supremacy; never was heard an imperfect note or unfinished phrase; in the legato, the staccato, triplets, octaves, repetition of notes, velocity and precision in passing from one distant interval to another, variety of touch and tone, pliable fingers and forcible wrist, and in all attributes relating to delicacy, brilliancy, rapidity, and legitimate power, the musical profession fully estimated his extraordinary gifts and acquirements, and never, on the part of the amateurs, was there more liberal or spontaneous applause.

In 1823, Moscheles left London to revisit his family and friends at Prague, and gave concerts at Munich, Vienna, Dresden, Leipzig, Berlin, and Hamburg, and returned to London covered with fresh laurels. He settled down to hard work in teaching and composing; and for twenty years was foremost for zeal and energy in all the good work at the Royal Academy of Music, the Philharmonic concerts, his own splendid annual concerts, and every other association that reflected credit on music and the profession. He brought out the great symphony (the Choral) of Beethoven—edited his sonatas—the sonatas of Weber, and accompanied all this with a stream of his own compositions—concertos, sonatas, fantasias, sextets, duets, rondos, and studies, fortified by constant performances in public of the works of Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and the founders of the school of piano playing. He ever kept up his practice, and was always "ready to play" and in a way that no man but himself could play. It was not difficult to imitate many of the peculiarities of fashionable pianists, but Moscheles was somewhat more than the performer of the hour.

As a master Moscheles was one of the best to be found in all Europe. In consequence of his great reputation, Mendelssohn visited this country with his father, and for some considerable time was in every respect Moscheles's pupil for advance in pianoforte playing; and under the guidance of Moscheles, Mendelssohn laid the real foundation for his superb mode of execution on that instrument. When, some years after, he revisited England, and as a great organ player as well as great pianist, Moscheles was much puzzled in his endeavor to solve the, to him, inexplicable riddle. He knew that Mendelssohn's opportunities for organ practice were few and far between, and was not a little ambitious in an attempt to take up the pedal music of old Sebastian. Mendelssohn did not tell his old master that an old pianoforte of Collard and Clementi, with a pedal board chalked on the bare boards, an unrivalled memory, and a cool, clear head, had brought about that which excited so much talk and so much mystery. The practice upon old wiry pianos and stiff deep falling keyboards of the mediæval German organ gave Mendelssohn a supremacy in the staccato, a brilliancy and force which far transcended all living pianists; even Thalberg alongside Mendelssohn was a sleepy executant, and when the octave passages came, Mendelssohn's wrists and fingers were like sledge-hammers. The school was old Bach and his organ keys grafted on the teaching of Moscheles. As it could not have been done without the Bach and the organ, so it would not have been done without the careful nursing of such a master as was Moscheles. The day came when the master was to take a lesson from his pupil: nor did he disclaim to do so. By constant playing with his old pupil, and watching his peculiarity, and breathing in his spirit, Moscheles pulled up and increased his power of performance: and when the two set to work on two pianos, or even on one, to improvise and to give life and being to the extempore duet, then the extraordinary talent and acquirements of these two great pianists were fully revealed. The intention was music-playing—something to excite a sympathy for the poetry of the art; but the occasion and the enthusiasm of the moment drew from the two performers all the monstrous technical power, and real, true, artistic learning, the grandeur and pre-eminence of perfect schooling which was lying within them, and needing some extraordinary feat to draw it all out of them. In the social meetings of some half-dozen of the greatest pianists—when everybody was bound to play—and the names were written down on slips of paper and put into a hat, and each drew for his turn, Moscheles always came off second to Mendelssohn, and foremost when Mendelssohn was absent. He could think in sounds, and think through a movement, and never fail for want of ideas, or pass the bounds of just feeling and good taste.

In 1846 he resigned his appointments in London, after having directed the Grand Musical Festival at Birmingham. His intention was to have taken a Chapel-master's appointment, but from the earnest wish of Mendelssohn he went to Leipzig and joined him as one of the masters in the new Conservatoire.

The sudden death of Mendelssohn was a source of great affliction to his friend, or rather to one who loved him as a father, and in some measure changed the whole current of his life. As one of the executors of the will he most wisely refused to leave any composition of Mendelssohn for the press and public eye unless such as he thought the composer himself would approve. For this Moscheles was much abused, but he acted justly and kindly to his friend's memory, and deserved and received the applause of all thinking musicians.

With vocal and sacred music Moscheles did little or nothing. He published no songs, and with the exception of a Psalm for choir and orchestra, performed at the Birmingham Festival, he attempted nothing in church music. Being of Jewish race he was shut out of the church on the continent, and here there was no "Master of the Chapel" open to him: and if so, no emolument as composer. He published a "Life of Beethoven," translated from the German, with some additions of his own. As a theorist he had studied in the school of Köch, and at one time attempted to establish a students' class for the dissemination of the theory—good in itself, and one easily to be worked. His proposal met with small encouragement, and Moscheles never revived the scheme.

In a pecuniary view, his career in England was a great success. Industry, prudence and capability met in his case with their reward; he retired from his labors with no inconsiderable results, and would, in Germany, be esteemed a wealthy man.

We believe no pianist ever produced so instantaneous and overwhelming an impression as did Moscheles on his first appearance in this country at the Philharmonic Concerts. There was universal astonishment and a perfect hurricane of applause. Fifteen years afterwards the scene was revived in the person and playing of Thalberg. Moscheles sat on a side bench not far from the performer, and watched him with all the interest that J. B. Cramer had fifteen years before scanned the then inconceivable feats and flights of the young Bohemian. In both cases there was the general murmur: "How does he do it? How does he do it?"

Bach's Grosse Passions-Musik. (ST. MATTHEW.)

BY G. A. MACFARREN.

It is, lastly, to speak of the reflective passages—I use their German definition—which constitute, abstractly as music, to the general hearer, and for ecclesiastical performance, the most attractive and perhaps most interesting portions of the work.

The Oratorio opens with a Double Chorus, in which one choir represents Zion exhorting all believers to weep for the sins of the world, and the other choir represents the Faithful responding to the summons. A singularly effective application of the antiphonal form—to use the word in its ecclesiastical, not in its Greek sense—is felicitously appropriated to the distinction of these two individualities. The exclamations, "Behold him, the bridegroom, like a lamb!" of the first choir are broken by the interrogations of the second, "Whom, how?" and these separate syllables stand out with distinct prominence. An independent melodic figure for the instruments is a background to the vocal phrases; and all these very diverse musical characters are as the pillars of a mighty building, while the dome they support is the choral, "O Lamb of God," which constitutes a ninth vocal part, and poers above the grand harmonic structure as its crowning glory, standing forth from time to time as the ever chief idea, though for a while it be hidden by other features of the musical architecture.

The Recitative, "Thou dear Redeemer," and Aria "Grief and pain," for contralto, follow the incident of the woman anointing the feet of Jesus. The lasting pain of a bruised heart is laid bare in this most pathetic piece—for the two movements constitute but one whole—which must bring such relief as tears afford on its earnest utterance.

Far more piercing is the anguish of the Aria for soprano, "Only bleed, thou dearest heart," which occurs when Judas accepts the hydra for his treachery. In the piece last named is shown the heaviness of woe, but this pictures its acutest pangs. High, indeed, must be the tragic powers of singers who can vitalize these great conceptions, which with their ceaseless melody and deep expression need but adequate performance to move all hearers.

Of a completely different character are the Recitative, "Although my heart in tears," and Aria, "Never will my heart refuse Thee," for soprano, which follow the dispensation of the wine at the last supper. Sweetness and tenderness are here the elements of expression, and loving hope the tranquil feeling they reveal. It is too often said by those who but superficially know the author, that Bach's music is deficient in melodious interest. Let them hear this song, which is perfectly a tune from beginning to end, definite in its rhythm and charming in its phrases, and their false apprehension will melt away like frost under a sunbeam. The close of the recitative signally exemplifies Bach's mastery of expression, and his most delicate perception of the full meaning of the words he set; the purport of the German sentence is that the Saviour can never mean unkindly to His own, so dearly does He love them to the end; and in the music to this, the pertinence of the dissonant harmony on the word "böse" (unkindly), and the heavenly sweetness of the change of key for the final phrase, attest the subtlest power of the artist.

Allusion has been made to the Recitative, "O grief," which is succeeded by the Aria, "I'll watch with my dear Jesu alway," for tenor with chorus. More than an allusion to this extraordinary piece could but prove the powerlessness of words to represent its beauty. In this and all the accompanied recitatives, there is not the freedom for the singer which marks those of Mozart and Beethoven, and some—such as "Deeper and deeper," in Jephtha—of Handel; Bach's are rhythmical declamations exacting highest dramatic powers of the vocalist, but denying to him the liberties that mostly belong to recitative singing. The solo phrases constitute the interludes to the chorus, which is here given with the verse beginning, "Why must Thou suffer." Its melody is slightly varied, so as to make the more gentle its expression of the touching sentiment, and such variation may indeed be called embellishment. The resolve set forth in the Aria to excel in devotion the three chosen apostles, and to watch ever with Jesus, is beautifully relieved against the phrases for chorus, "So slumber shall our sins befall," the rocking motion of which has a soothing, lulling effect, which more than pictures, it realizes the sweetly calming influence of prayer. The countless points of technical interest that mark this piece, such as the wondrous harmonies of the Recitative, the double counterpoint to the first phrase of the Aria, and the chromatic progressions in the phrase that ensues, must be studied to be understood, and heard to be admired.

After the prayer in the Garden that the cup of agony may pass, occurs the Recitative, "The Saviour falleth low," and Aria, "Gladly will I, all resigning," for bass, a piece of less intensity than either of those which have been noticed, but not the less true to its place and purport. A spirit of cheerfulness infuses its tuneful phrases—cheerfulness in the endurance of the earthly ordeal for His sake who is the everlasting pattern of patience. The concluding strain is full of tenderness, and an apt peroration to the whole.

The most picturesque piece, perhaps, in all the oratorio, is that which ensues on the capture, "Alas! my Jesus now is taken." It begins with a duet for soprano and contralto, in which the counterpoint of soft wind instruments, violins and violas, without basses, is intricately interwoven with the plaintive vocal phrases. These are from time to time interrupted by the exclamations of the chorus, "Leave Him, bind Him not," with the accompaniment of basses, organ, and all the force of the opposite orchestra—note the word opposite, for the solo voices and their accompanying instruments belong to the first choir and the ejaculations of the chorus proceed from the second, so that in the original performance the effect must have been of a warning from a distance, a thought apart from that conveyed by the solo singers, stimulating this, while always distinct from it. The movement ends with a half close preparatory to the fiery outburst of the succeeding Allegro, for double chorus, which, opening in a different key from the commencement of the piece, concludes in that of the beginning; and so its termination rounds the whole into just completeness, after a course of seemingly wildest freedom. Amazement that all nature was not convulsed, that the eternal laws were not suspended, that the end of all things evened not upon the impious insult to the Son of Man, is expressed better in the music than in the words beginning, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," Its indescribable power of excitement might exhaust itself were its character unvaried; but at the words, "Burst open, O fierce flaming caverns of Hell, then," after a pause of silence, a newly introduced idea proclaims the indignance of the Christian world at that enormous deed of which the obloquy of all time is the retribution. Far beyond me is it to describe the marvellous effect of this mighty masterstroke; but I may remind those who have heard it, of the sustaining of a harmony by one choir against the melodic motion of the opposite voices, and may thus conjure up its impressions by means of its own magic, which surpasses the utmost power of analytical sorcery.

Had the oratorio been designed for presentation in a secular building, the tumultuous piece last noticed might have judiciously ended the first part, leaving the audience to calm from its stirring excitement during the interval of rest that would ensue. One hundred and forty-one years ago, the idea had not dawned upon the minds of men, even of Englishmen, that a church was an improper place wherein to teach sacred history, wherein to illuminate its incidents and enlighten its doctrines with the effulgence of human genius, and thereby to enkindle the highest and holiest of religious feelings, by the deepest and most searching religious teaching. Then, neither divines nor laymen had conceived that any locality could be so fitted for the performance of an oratorio as the oratory, after which the class of works is named; except only the body of the church, which, since the Reformation, has always been regarded as the special home for the lessons and festivals of religion, until the new and curious fancy arose in this country to question the accepted rule of all previous time, and interfere, if possible, with its observance.

The music to The Passion was composed to enforce, to animate, to idealize the text, and for performance in church on the day when the consummation of the sacred story is celebrated. The famous divine who proposed, and the greatest of musicians who achieved the work, would have ill-designed their plan, however, had they allowed it to break off at a moment of such impetuous excitement, before the sermon that was to constitute the interlude between the two divisions of this oratorio, instead of making it lead the hearers through a train of devotional feeling into a frame of mind fit for the reception of the admonitions of the preacher. Accordingly, the work proceeds with the statement of how the disciples left the master in his captors' hands, and thus introduces the hymn, "O Man, bewail thy sin so great," as the last piece before the sermon. This is set in the manner of which every one of the Church Cantatas of Bach contains an example. The old choral tune is assigned to one part of the chorus, and the other three parts have counterpoint upon this, sometimes in imitation of its phrases, sometimes in melodic figures distinct from them. The vocal parts are relieved against a totally independent accompaniment, throughout the whole of which one peculiar motion is constantly maintained, that hovers above all, as if catching the thoughts of them that pray and wafting them to heaven; and the idea thus beautifully developed, constitutes both the counterpoint and the interlude to the choral tune in the sweet continuance of its waving, both while the melody is sung and between its strains. Thus the song of the Church, according to the Church's manner, is appropriately employed to lull the agitation which the piece last noticed must have excited, and fitly framed the hearer to receive the pious discourse which was to follow.

The portion of the oratorio designed to succeed the sermon, the second part according to the usage of concert performance, opens with a solo for contralto with chorus, "Ah! now is my Jesu gone." Herein, Zion, or the Church, mourns over the lost Jesus, and the Faithful, half enquiringly of its cause, half consolingly for its pain, muse on her deep affliction—Zion being here represented symbolically as the one, the loveliest of women. It has the form of a dialogue between the solo voice and the chorus, and the distinct character of the two is always obvious, the latter having the air of solace to the keener anguish of the other. The pathetic effect of the piece is heightened by its fragmentary termination, ending, as it does, with a half-close; that is, upon a dominant harmony.

Thus prepared, we have now the scene before Caiaphas. At the words, "And Jesus held His peace," is inserted the Recitative, "He will not speak," and Aria, "Behold! behold!" for tenor, as a commentary on the situation. The translator's difficulty is here evident in finding a word with the same accent as the original, "Geduld," to convey the same meaning—"patience." The purport of the song is to teach from divine example the uncomplaining endurance of evil; and the more energetic than tranquil spirit of the music represents this as a virtue of the will more than of resignation. Until greater familiarity remove present impression, this will appear to me to be the least interesting piece in the work and the most thankless to the executant; but among so much beauty as surrounds it, one moment of less attraction scarcely weakens the whole.

"O pardon me, my God," is the Aria for contralto, with accompaniment for violin obligato, which is more generally known than any other separate piece. It occurs after Peter's threefold denial, when his bitter weeping tells the torture of his self-conviction. The deep, deep grief of a tormented conscience finds here an utterance which fulfils the purport, and far transcends the expression of the words. One might suppose the power of the artist to have been concentrated upon this one incident, so infinite is its beauty; one might suppose Bach to have regarded the situation it illustrates as more significant than others of man's relation to deity in his sense of sin and need for mercy, and as requiring, therefore, peculiar prominence in the total impression the oratorio should convey. If this was his aim, it is all accomplished. The penitential feeling embodied in the song is that which will longest linger in a remembrance of the work. The soft tone of the contralto voice, and the keenness of that of the violin, are accessories to the effect which the master well knew how to handle; but these judicious means are little to be considered in comparison with the musical idea of which they are adjuncts, and this may only be regarded with reverence and esteemed with wonder. Note criticism, to which I was for long far too prone, may halt at some technical points in this piece, and collate them with rules that elsewhere demand implicit observance. Words of my own might be quoted against me to this very effect; but my perception is, I trust, enlarged to the recognition of broader principles, and of the grander right that supersedes the smaller wrong of seeming irregularity; and I take leave publicly to recant some immature opinions of the master and his habits, which formerly I was too free in advancing. I believe the song under consideration to be all that art can accomplish in the transfiguring of human emotion. The sense of a great ill, of which Peter's denial is the type, and which is daily repeated in every man's experience, the repentance of this ill when its frowning image fills our conscience; and the longing, but scarcely hoping, for toleration of our dastardry; have here an expression whose terrible grandeur increases ever with our power to comprehend it. Curiously, Mendelssohn in "O Lord have mercy," and Handel in "Vouchsafe, O Lord," have employed the same key of B minor as is here chosen for the setting forth of the same sentiment; and the identity both of tonality and feeling in the three songs compels a reference from either to the others; the comparison is interesting, and it is satisfactory in showing how unlike are the three masters in their very likeness.

A most remarkable contrast to the foregoing is presented in the next reflective piece, the Bass Aria, likewise with violin obligato, "Give me back my dearest Master," which occurs when the priests, as represented by the chorus, refuse the return of the blood-money from Judas. Spurning the fee of treachery and its contamination, the Christian here demands the restoration of his Lord, as symbolizing the restoration of the susceptibility of goodly influence. To witness evil is to make the honest but fallible heart recoil from it, and the confidence, amounting even to gaiety, which gives to this song a happier expression than any other piece possesses, is indeed a poetical rendering of the situation; the wish is brightest to be free from sin when guilt looks blackest in our own esteem. The truthfulness of the voice part, the liveliness of the rapid scales and the passages in arpeggio, which exemplify the versatility of the violin, as compared with the effects drawn from the instrument in the previous song, and the whole tenor of the present piece, embody the feeling I have sought to describe.

The soprano Recitative, "He hath done only good to all," and Aria, "From love, from love unbounded," constitute the reflection upon Pilate's inquiry, "What evil hath He done?" The first movement recapitulates the mercies by which Jesus testified His divinity, and with the exquisite art elsewhere manifested in giving similar pointedness to meaning that would else be lost, the change of key upon the words, "Beside this, Jesus nought hath done," marks the purport with beautiful significance. The second movement tells how Jesus died out of love to us, and exaltation shines through even the regret with which this is avowed—a sunbeam upon the tears. The singularly delicate accompaniment of a flute and two low oboes, and no other instrument, individualizes this song with peculiar tenderness.

When Jesus is delivered over to be crucified, the narrative is suspended for the contralto Recitative, "Look down, O God," and Aria, "Are my weeping?" The remarkable modulation from the key of F sharp minor into G minor, that distinguishes the appeal for pity from the description of the taunting and scourging of the condemned Saviour, is another of those traits, which, as in the preceding song, test the artist and the special power of his art. Painting, nor poetry, has nothing analogous to this beautiful resource in music, the power of showing an entire revulsion of feeling by an unexpected change of key. Without any material means, such as a change of rhythm, the slackening or hastening of the movement, the addition or omission of peculiar toned instruments, or the like, the minutest gradation of feeling may be most touchingly expressed by a felicitous modulation; almost unconsciously, the hearer finds that by its power the effect of everything is changed, that even the same sounds convey a different meaning; hence, too much is not assumed in saying, however incompletely the subject is here argued, that modulation represents the metaphysical in music. Grossly, indeed, is this resource of modulation abused—profaned, would be yet a mild term of censure—in the music of Jews, Italians and natives, that is written for the gratification of the corrupt taste prevalent in France, in which keys are changed as suddenly and as startlingly as tricks in a pantomime, with no meaning but to surprise the hearer, and no aim at expression, which is the legitimate end of this wonderful device. Ears vitiated by such abuse may grow insensitive to the infinite beauty of this resource of the musician in its true application; but the beauty is there, and the oratorio of The Passion presents some of its most signal instances. In the second movement, hope, however faint, is blended with the soft lamenting, that though tears may not efface the past, still the sacrifice may be accepted of a contrite heart.

* St. Paul.

When Simon of Cyrene takes the burthen of the cross, the Recitative, "Yea! truly, to the cross," and Aria, "Come, blessed cross," for bass, points the lasting moral of the incident. It is a noble song, which must have made a powerful impression at the revival performance of the work; for, shortly after this, Mendelssohn, writing to Devrient to sing for the benefit of a meritorious musician who was in trouble names the piece as a desirable one to select, in spite of the difficulty presented by the part for the viol da gamba.

The contralto Recitative, "Ah! Golgotha," and Aria with Chorus, "Look where Jesus beck'ning stands," occurs after the account of the crucifixion. Zion points to the arm extended on the cross as the haven of rest for the Faithful, in a sweet persuasive melody. The more than once repeated phrase on the words, "Look" and "Rest," is one of charming tenderness, and the accompaniment, for low oboes and organ only, shares with the voice part the interest of the whole. Once more the interrogatives of the chorus here break the general stillness, and influence as much the material effect—for with them the full orchestra is introduced—as they bring out the expressive power of the music.

The last song in the oratorio is the Recitative "At eventide, cool hour of rest," and Aria, "Cleanse thee, O my soul," for bass. It is inserted in the Gospel narrative where Pilate grants the body of Jesus to the request of Joseph of Arimathea. After the agitated scene that follows the crucifixion, and powerfully realizes, though without the aid of orchestral effect, the terror of that awful moment, the purpose of the artist was gradually to calm his hearers from the excitement to which they had been wrought, and, by means of a succession of soothing pieces, to dismiss them in hopeful, happy tranquillity. Tending to this result is the effect of the Choral "If I should e'er forsake Thee," which is strengthened by that of the present song, quite confirmed by the final Chorus. Allusion to the chief events in Scripture history that have befallen at the close of day, gives scope for varied coloring in the first movement; but the variety disturbs not the softness of the hues, which picture rather the tranquillity of the after glow than the radiance of the sunset. The melodious smoothness of the second movement, with its very unique closing cadence on the descent of an octave, tells of a hope that our heart may be purified for the reception of Jesus, so that He may be entombed therein.

The narrative closes with the sealing of the sepulchre, sequent upon which is the concluding number, the recitative, "The Lord hath lain Him down to rest," and Double Chorus, "Around Thy tomb." The first movement is a series of passages for each of the solo voices successively, divided by short phrases for the chorus, the former reflecting on the termination of the Saviour's earthly troubles which were the price of peace to man, and the latter breathing a sweet farewell to Him whose body is departed, but whose spirit rests with us forever. Allow me a last word upon the accompanied Recitatives, of which this is a specimen, as distinguished from the free declamation to which the narrative is set:—The first examples of recitative, by Caccini, Peri, Cavalieri and Monteverde, at the end of the 16th century, exemplify rather the former than the more free style; so do such instances, as "Comfort ye" of Handel; so also does much of the writing, sometimes defined as Arioso, of the present day; its composition is infinitely interesting to the author, its effect upon the audience is most impressive when it is perfectly successful; but when it fails of this perfection, or when it is applied to trivial subjects, it becomes tedious in itself and unfits the hearer's attention for the regularly developed movements. It is in time but not in rhythm, and too musical therefore to be any relief to the continuous melodies, while it has no tuneful interest of its own; its merit is wholly in the force with which it renders the words, and in this merit the specimens by Bach are pre-eminent. The purpose already hinted at, of bringing the oratorio by gentle degrees to so tranquil a close that the hearers may depart from its performance in a condition of perfect peace, is beautifully completed in the final movement. Death is imagined as sleep, and the tomb as a couch of rest, and the music is a lullaby invoking softest slumbers. It is a stream of melody of the most refined character and exalted beauty. One phrase of touching sweetness set to the words, "Ruhet saufte, sanfte ruh't," (Rest Thee softly, softly rest); and it derives special tenderness from the commencement of the first syllable upon an unaccented quaver, and its continuance with the effect of syncopation upon the next accent.

A piece so mild, so soothing, so full of heavenly calm, is scarcely to be found in sacred music; and if the object of the proposer of the work was to impress the lesson that, however severe our ordeals, the Christian principle brings "peace on earth to men of good will," it could not have been summed up in language more penetrating.

If ever artist poured out his whole heart in his work, that certainly did Bach in the oratorio of The Passion. The man himself speaks and lives in every phrase of it, for such truthfulness, such fervor, could not characterize any subjective treatment. Immensely much has to be accomplished before English audiences can do that justice to this wonderful composition which is only to be reached through familiarity with its beauties. Such familiarity will a thousand-fold repay the pains of its acquirement; but it is to be acquired by knowing the music, not by reading about it, and the utmost value for which I can hope in these remarks, is that they may urge those who are open to the highest musical gratification to seek it in the study of this great work of art.

Music in Boston—Reported Down East.

(From the Portland Transcript.)

Boston, April 9, 1870.

Editor of the Transcript:—The Harvard Association series of concerts for this season have come to a close, supplemented by two extra benefit concerts, one for the projected Art Museum, and the other for Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the very able and popular conductor. These concerts, as usual, have been interesting and well attended, and we have come to regard them as the staple musical engagements of the year. The programmes, (I am tempted to follow the London Orchestra and abbreviate this word to program) are always made up from the best material and with especial regard to unity and fitness. Thus far the managers have steadily resisted all innovations upon their first formed plan of producing none but the works of composers whose reputations are well established—in short of trying no experiments. They say there is need of our first becoming familiar with music that the world has already stamped with its approval, and then we can better afford to give ear to some of the new applicants for our admiration. While Gade and Sterndale Bennett, perhaps on the strength of Mendelssohn's admiration, have been admitted to the sacred company of Beethoven, Mozart, and Schubert, the doors are still barred against all new comers. In vain do the heralds of the "new schools" knock for entrance. Wagner, Liszt, Raff and Rubinstein find no recognition. Very many of our musical people, feeling that they have a tolerable acquaintance with the best masters, are anxious to hear what these new men have to say, and to know something of the musical thought of to day. Say these persons, they may or may not be great, but we want to hear and know. There are influences at work that may bring about a change and give us a taste of "Young Germany" another season.

Theodore Thomas is already giving us a foretaste of this new order of music in the series of orchestral concerts he is now giving at the Music Hall. He has evidently arranged his programmes mainly with reference to novelty, and consequently we often have a curious jumble of new and old that tends to keep one in a sort of fever and ague of excitement and repose. Thus at the second concert, a long and unintelligible Vorspiel by Wagner was followed by a very tender and lovely adagio by Beethoven, and the second part of a "Dramatic Symphony" by Berlioz, in which some of the love-stricken Romeo's experiences, winding up with a ball at the Capulets, more extravagantly set forth by a series of astonishing orchestral effects, was followed by a most superb rendering of the great Fifth Symphony. With what a joyful, restful feeling one heard the first measures of the glorious allegro movement, by which the soul was excited to a noble longing and delight.

The programme of the third concert was a little more consistent, and there were few interruptions to the novelties. In this we had a specimen of Rubinstein's work, which proved interesting in parts, but too long unless better. It seemed also lacking in form and unity, which these composers seem to have a perpetual disdain for. An overture by Berlioz, "Le Carnaval Romain," did not increase the interest in this composer's works, and Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture was but little better. The ever beautiful Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" was like a gleam of sunshine in a gloomy day.

A "Suite in canon form," by J. O. Grimm, given at the fourth concert, proved very interesting, and deserving of better acquaintance. I must confess to considerable disappointment in the specimens of the new composers thus far given by Mr. Thomas, and I am of the opinion that our music lovers will be more than ever satisfied with the kind of material of which our Symphony Concerts are made.

Certainly one of the most interesting features of these concerts is the wonderful playing of the new pianist, Miss Anna Mehlig, who has fairly taken Boston "by storm," to use a hackneyed expression. She made her first appearance here a few weeks ago in one of the Harvard Symphony Concerts, and was at once accorded a position among the finest players that have ever appeared here. In fact, it is difficult to speak as one feels after hearing her, without appearing unduly enthusiastic. One of our foremost pianists is said to have remarked that he felt that he was to her what his pupils are to him. In person she is tall, slim, with a thin face and dark complexion, not graceful nor particularly prepossessing. She is unassuming in manner and void of personal display. Her technique is the most complete and finished of any pianist I have ever heard, and seems to be more than equal to any requirements that may be made upon it. She executes the most difficult and trying passages with an ease that robs them of one half their difficulties. But more important and better than this, she plays with intelligence and feeling. She gives the meaning, the spirit of what she plays. Being a woman, she has no compositions of her own to bring into notice and advertise, and devotes herself to the interpretation of the best and most interesting works. She has played Schumann's Concerto in A minor, Chopin's in E minor, and Beethoven's in G No. 4, giving with admirable skill and thoughtful appreciation the spirit, feeling and characteristic beauty of each. I hope we shall have opportunities of hearing her in a smaller hall, and in compositions better adapted for a display of the finer qualities of her genius.

Musical Correspondence.

MILAN, MARCH 17.—DEAR JOURNAL.—The holidays of Christmas, of the New Year, and of the Carnival, have passed without having given us anything worthy of musical note. In a large Catholic city like Milan, one would naturally expect to hear something fine commemorative of the great annual Christian Festival. The Oratorios, "L'Assion Musik," Symphony and Quartet and Choral and Piano Concerts of a two winters' stay in Berlin ill prepare one for the actual dearth of everything but Opera to be found in Milan. To sum up the season's repertoire, it consists of four operas of Verdi, three of Meyerbeer, Halévy's L'Elre, and two new ones. Further than this there is absolutely nothing to record. The orchestra of the Scala—the royal opera house—does not give concerts; at least it has not given any. The nearest approach to anything of the kind is heard in the café Gnocchi, where two violins, a cello, a clarinet and a piano, discourse arrangements from the Italian operas. The Italians crave new things, and the impresarii find it for their interest to produce every season one or two new works. It is really astounding, the number of poor operas that are annually ground from the mill.

The usual complaint is that the German music is too heavy for Italians. No doubt the German manner of thinking is too deep and solid for the flighty Italians, but it cannot be that the Germans have written vocal music too heavy for Italians who pretend to sing Verdi. Mozart is purely Italian in his treatment of the voice, yet of this master one opera only, Don Giovanni, is given in Italy, and that too at rare intervals. Wagner, at the other extreme, can be put side by side with Verdi, so far as strain upon the voice is concerned. If Verdi does not prove too much for a singer, Wagner certainly will not. It is a deplorable truth that the Italians are losing ground in music; they are prejudiced against everything foreign, especially the German. In a conversation recently with an Italian artist, whose general intelligence and cultivation led me to hope better things, she made such a sweeping statement derogatory to the German music, that I asked her if she had ever heard any of the works of the German masters. Ponder upon the reply: "Ho sentito Don Giovanni e Lohengrin." "I have heard Don Giovanni and Lohengrin;" to which she afterwards added Schubert's Serenade. The answer tells its own story, the prejudice of ignorance, and is a fair exponent of the public opinion of Italy about German music. Here is another personal instance as proving the correctness of my statement. I recently carried the twelve soprano arias arranged by Robert Franz from Handel's operas, to Lucca, who has the largest music publishing house in Milan, and asked to know if he could not have a notice of them written in the musical journal, or bring them before the public in some way. "It's of no use. The singers will not sing them, and so the public would not buy them, and I should lose money by the operation," he answered. If this does not indicate a low ebb of public taste, I am at a loss to know what would.

But to return to the operas. The season commenced with Christmas and still continues. There are two opera houses, the Scala and the Carcano. The first of these as I said is the royal opera house. Of this world renowned Scala not very much can be said; externally dingy, with no particular style of architecture, the sides generously sprinkled with post bills, and the door-way beset with vendors of periodicals. It has no grand nor imposing appearance and is hardly theatrical. In the same block are stores and dwelling houses. The royal shield hung half way up the front side, with "La Scala R." upon its dim face, serves to dispel the doubt which the traveler generally entertains as to whether this can be the noted Scala or not. Having prefaced thus much of the outside, let us go through the numerous doorways into the low studded corridor, thence into the house proper. Your first impression on entering is likely to be the correct and lasting one, namely, that the theatre is very large. Elegant it is not, and is the farthest removed from classic. It is simply a very large theatre, pretty well upholstered, and with plenty of gilt and white contrast to give a showy effect when illuminated. The scenic arrangements are, however, of the very best and always in taste. The operas are put on the stage in the very best manner. The attendance is usually good, though the house is full only on occasion of a new opera, the interest for which flags after the first few nights.

An Italian audience is peculiar. I doubt if anywhere else one could hear like expressions of approbation or displeasure bestowed upon singers. The Italians are so familiar with their native music that they can and do follow note for note whatever may be sung. A false note or a poor tone brings down a storm of hisses. Most of them carry whistles in their pockets or attached to their watch guards. If the singer continues to do poorly, these whistles are brought into requisition, and such a storm of whistling, hissing, hooting, cries of "enough," "go home," "dog," "bow-wew," cannot be heard outside of Italy. This is what they call here a fiasco. The pen fails to do justice to such a scene of riot and disorder. At a recent performance of Luisa Miller, an opera by Verdi, the basso announced himself as suddenly taken ill, and begged the indulgence of the audience for that evening. Instead of showing him indulgence, they hooted him off the stage after the first act. All this and more the singer has to endure in Italy. The very best artists do not escape the hisses if momentarily indisposed. One great source of annoyance in the Scala is the incessant loud conversation and laughing; gentlemen reading the evening papers sold on the spot; many drinking champagne or eating figs in the boxes, with here and there a would-be connoisseur showing his prowess and annoying his neighbors by humming aloud the aria sung upon the stage, always a beat or two in advance. One could almost imagine one's self in a café.

If the opera in Milan is to be taken as a sample for Italy in general, then opera in Italy is a grand humbug. One loses all patience with such people and begs to know where their manners are. Little can be said of music without the pale of opera. In short there is none. Opera everywhere. The theme for conversation in the café is opera and singers, their fortunes and misfortunes; whether the performance of last night was meritorious; whether Mongini sang his high C with head or falsetto; whether Sass should not have sung this phrase in this fashion, and that phrase in another; finding fault with the miserable voice of this member of the chorus, and praising the fine voice of that one; analyzing the whole thing from beginning to end in general and in particular. Opera everywhere. People in the street sing it, nothing else is ground from the hand-organs, and only operatic arrangements for the bands and for the small café orchestras. The people never tire of it. They hear it in private concerts and do not want to hear anything else. They are jealous of every note even of the orchestral part, and if any member of the orchestra fails to perform his part well, he has to suffer the never failing penalty of hisses. A few nights since one of the horn players made a mistake such as may be heard at times in any orchestra,—a broken tone,—and the whole house went into a roar of "oh," concluding with hisses. The members of the opera troupe are generally non-residents; they make contracts of short duration and travel from place to place. There are fine masters of singing here, but their pupils after a short trial in Italy leave for a better field than this country can offer them.

Even church music has lost its former renown. A grand cathedral like that of Milan should have the means at its disposal to produce the best works in an appropriate manner. The church, both Protestant and Catholic, has nothing to gain in catering to a weak modern taste for romantic music. On the contrary it has every thing to lose. If any music should be preserved intact it is that of the church. The good old choral style, the substantial and solid four to eight part singing of the two centuries preceding our own is rapidly giving way to sentimental and meaningless stuff. Can we not find the explanation of this in the growing uncertainty and multiplicity of church creeds? The old masters were taught to believe in the strict tenets of religion of that day; their minds were moulded to adopt as their own the rigid, though it may be dogmatical, ideas of their time; they were taught to believe that the Bible had one, and but one, definite meaning to which they should strictly adhere. Their music breathes this from every pore. There is a certain sturdiness and truth in the old style of the two centuries preceding our own; a conviction which convinces. Among these old masters of church style, Palestrina was the first to establish a reputation which makes his name as well known to-day as any of the old composers. He was the greatest of the masters of the Roman school, which virtually commenced with Goudimel, the teacher of Palestrina. The music was sung à capella, no instrument whatever accompanying. All these fine creations of Palestrina have been set aside for the sweet, sentimental style of modern operatic music. Also his contemporaries and followers, Nanini, Allegri, Morales and Gallas, who still kept in the path of their master, though themselves more modern, are now almost unknown. Perhaps only in the halls of the Sistine at Rome can these old masters still be heard à capella, and this too only on rare occasions.

With the invention and development of opera, this four to sometimes twenty-four part song gradually gave way to melody and solo singing with instrumental accompaniment, which came to be regarded as the main feature of the church service. That the organ and orchestra were an immense gain musically, need not be dwelt upon. That these in themselves had no part in bringing church music to its present condition we have evidence enough in the "Passion Musik," "Grosse Messe," "Magnificat," and numerous Cantatas of Sebastian Bach. This grand old master, king of all the intricacies of counterpoint and form, a man of the strongest religious convictions, who went to the Bible for his inspiration and believed implicitly its truths, this Sebastian Bach breathed into his works his own lofty soul, and has left to the world choral compositions, which for grandeur, depth, pathos and sublime inspiration, have never been excelled by any other master. "Wem die Kunst das Leben ist, dess Leben ist eine grosse Kunst." "His life is a great art, to whom Art is life," said Bach. No artist has exemplified this more than he. His whole life was a constant devotion to music and religion. He never wrote to obtain the fickle flattery of his fellow men, but to glorify, through his divine art, the Creator, to interpret whose teachings he believed himself appointed from Heaven. A nearer acquaintance with Bach's works discloses ever new hidden beauties, and a tenderness of feeling united with a true poetic nature, such as no other writer of church music has ever manifested. Handel never had such convictions. More secular in his ways and manner of thinking than Bach, he took another direction in his oratorios. With all their grandeur the oratorios of Handel are not always without a certain secular element, not a suspicion of which is to be found in Bach. The Messiah even is not free from it. In some places the themes have been taken note for note from an opera written many years ago on another and secular subject; evidence enough that they were not always the result of religious inspiration. Handel, like many Italian masters, wrote not only church music, but operas as well, and the two styles could hardly remain distinct. This was especially the case with Handel, who wrote his oratorios after many years spent in composing operas. Mozart in his Requiem and Masses is just as little a church composer as Beethoven in his "Christus am Oelberg" or in his Masses. Notwithstanding their great musical worth and beauty, they have little in common with the old church style, and are a case in point to what I have already said of church music, namely, that it has lost its former strict and independent style; further, that it has passed through all the various stages of transformation, and has absorbed all the operatic and romantic element now prevalent in music. This is especially true of Catholic countries. The only real exception is North Germany, where they still retain the love for the old style. Catholic Germany has already made strides in the direction of romantic music, though not so far gone as Italy and France.

Another partial exception is the better English church music. The oratorios of Costa, at times so fine, yet border upon the sentimental only too often. In America no exception can be made. It is really dreadful, the continued melange of opera, which is served up to our congregations by persons who cannot or will not compose suitable music, nor draw upon the exhaustless supply to be had in the old Italian and German chorals and cantatas. It is a good sign and predicts well for our musical future in Boston that the Handel and Haydn Society has commenced the study of Bach's music. The singers will love it more the better acquainted they become with it. May the time be near at hand when we shall have every year, as a never failing event, the Saint Matthew Passion of Bach, as well as the beautiful Messiah.

I intended to speak of the Italian opera as compared with the German and French, but more in another letter. o.

Theodore Thomas's "Symphony and Popular Concerts."

A whole season of orchestral music crowded into a week! It shows how great an interest is felt here now in music of this order, that, immediately after the twelve Symphony Concerts of the Harvard course, the Music Hall could be filled for seven successive evenings, and an afternoon besides, by eager listeners to the admirable orchestra of Mr. Thomas, and to programmes so abounding in good things, if also mingled with things strange and questionable, as the following:

Tuesday Evening, April 5.

- Overture, "Leonore," No. 8.....Beethoven.
 Concertstück.....Weber.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Symphonic Poem, "Tasso," Lamento e Trionfo.....List.
 Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini.
 Träumerei.....Schumann.
 L'Invitation a la Danse.....Weber.
 Instrumentation by Hector Berlioz.
 Piano Solo.....Chopin.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 March Triumphant, "Schiller".....Meyerbeer.

Wednesday Evening, April 6.

- Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg".....Wagner.
 Adagio, "Prometheus".....Beethoven.
 Concerto in A minor, Op. 54.....Schumann.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Second Part of the dramatic Symphony, "Romeo et Juliet," Op. 17.....Berlioz.
 Romeo seul. Tristesse. Concert et Bal. Grand Fête chez Capulet.
 Symphony No. 5, C minor, Op. 67.....Beethoven.

Thursday Evening, April 7.

- Ein Musikalisches Charakterbild, "Faust," Op. 68.....Rubinstein.
 Concerto No. 1, in E minor, Op. 11.....Chopin.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz.
 Overture, "Struensee".....Meyerbeer.
 Theme and Variations, "Kaiser Franz" (Austrian National Hymn).....Haydn.
 String Orchestra.
 Scherzo, "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn.
 Piano Solo, "Faust Waltz".....List.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Capriccio Brillante sur le Theme, "Jota Aragonesa".....Glinka.

Friday Evening, April 8.

- Suite in Canon form, Op. 10.....J. O. Grimm.
 Allegro con brio, Andante lento, Tempo di Minuetto, Allegro risoluto.
 String Orchestra.
 The Solo Quartet, by Messrs. Theo. Thomas, C. Matzka, Fr. Hemmann, and Fr. Pfeilschneider.
 Introduction to the Third Act of "Medea".....Cherubini.
 Concerto No. 4, in G, Op. 55.....Beethoven.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120.....Schumann.

Saturday Afternoon, April 9.

- Symphony in D, No. 504, Koechel.....Mozart.
 Adagio, Allegro, Andante, Presto.
 Concerto No. 3, in C minor, Op. 37.....Beethoven.
 1. Allegro con brio. 2. Largo. 3. Rondo.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Festival Overture, Op. 50.....Volkmann.
 Träumerei.....Schumann.
 Polonaise, "Struensee".....Meyerbeer.
 Piano Solo, "Tannhäuser March".....List.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," (Lamartine).....List.

Saturday Evening, April 9.

- Overture, "Oberon".....Weber.
 Air and Gavotte.....Schubert.
 Scherzo, "Reformation Symphony".....Mendelssohn.
 Air Varié. Solo for Trombone.....Beer.
 Mr. F. Leesch.
 Torchlight March, No. 2, C minor.....Meyerbeer.
 Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner.
 S. venede.....Haydn.
 Witz, "On the beautiful blue Danube".....Strauss.
 Trio for French Horns and Trombone.....Bergmann.
 Messrs. Schmitt, Lotze and Leesch.
 Polka Masurka, "Ein Herz und ein Sinn".....Strauss.
 Polka, "Klingendes".....Berlioz.
 Marche Hongroise, "Rokoczy".....Berlioz.

Sunday Evening, April 10.

- Symphony, No. 1, B flat, Op. 38.....Schumann.
 Frühlings Phantasie, Op. 23.....Gade.
 For Vocal Quartet, Piano and Orchestra.
 1. Allegro moderato e sostenuto. 2. Allegro molto e cou furo. 3. Allegro Vivace.
 Misses L. Gates, A. S. Ryan, Messrs. A. Kreisemann and C. Schrauberädter.
 Miss Anna Mehlig and Orchestra.
 Overture, "Frelschütz".....Weber.
 Erikönig.....Schubert.
 Mr. August Kreisemann.
 Allegro Vivace.....No. 3, 9, and 10.
 Adagio—Allegro Molto. } from the Prometheus Music.
 Allegro, Pastorale. } Op. 42.
 Piano Solos: a. "Solrée de Vienne".....Beethoven.
 b. "La Campanella".....List.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Torchlight March, No. 1, in B flat.....Meyerbeer.

Monday Evening, April 11.

- Suite in C, Op. 101.....Raff.
 1. Introduction and Fugue. 2. Minuet. 3. Adagietto. 4. Scherzo. 5. March.
 Concerto, No. 1, E flat.....List.
 Miss Anna Mehlig.
 Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn.
 Orchestra.
 Fantasia for French Horn.....Schmitt.
 Mr. Henry Schmidt.
 Waltz, "Morgenblätter".....Strauss.
 Allegretto from the 8th Symphony.....Beethoven.
 Polka Masurka, "Arm in Arm".....Strauss.
 Polka Française, "S'gibt nur a Kaiserstadt".....Wagner.
 Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner.

Before discussing these programmes we should remark that this was the second visit of the Thomas Orchestra. In October last they came preluding to our winter season, as they have just now given us the postlude. Then they gave five performances. This makes twenty-five orchestral concerts heard in Boston in the six months from October 29 to April 11.

But we must bear in mind that there is an essential difference between the regular Symphony Concerts which have formed the staple of our season, and such skirmishing, occasional visitations as these last, however brilliant; as great a difference in spirit, motive, character, as in the manner of their coming. The former may be less brilliantly equipped, less exceptionally perfect in performance, less attractive to the crowd, less dazzling with novelties, and yet be better concerts in the true artistic sense. That is, they may be, and they generally are, more purely feasts of Art, and leave more of the impression of the spirit, influence, and (so to speak) religion of true Art behind them. Means and manner of performance are much in all Art occasions; but the spirit, the motive of the occasion counts in the long run for more. Concerts given for the motive mainly of celebrity or gain; concerts which cater to general desires and appetites, rather than to real taste (which can be very catholic); concerts which aim to draw full houses for the time being, by creating a sensation,—though they excel perhaps in means and execution,—never in the long run leave as fine and deep an impression, nor are they as purely enjoyable, nor as sweet in the memory, as those of which the motive is purely artistic and which minister in the first place and directly to the higher taste supposed to be already formed and needing to be made sure of its due round of opportunities. These latter are conceived in the same spirit with the classical "Philharmonic" concerts so-called, and the Conservatory concerts of Paris, Leipzig, &c., their object being to conserve, and keep ever bright and near the standard of true Art in the immortal masterworks of genius, so that it may not get lost sight of, or so mixed up in wearisome confusion amid louder, more importunate and dazzling things as to cease to seem like itself or pass for its intrinsic worth. Their aim is to consolidate and vitalize a certain central force of public taste and true Art feeling, keeping it, amid all the babel of tongues and novelties, undissipated, undistracted. One must be very jealous of such opportunities in order to preserve them. They cannot be made sure of, permanently, unless they are organized and made regular; and this implies the organizing of an audience, as sure and regular and loyal, as the programmes offered it are surely to be trusted for their truth to Art and to the soul's sincerest need of Art,—not to the whim, the curiosity, the prurient passion for excitement, the reigning fashion of the moment. We want something that shall point us often to the stars; fireworks are well enough too in their way: but which can we best afford to do without? The distinction between the artistic and the virtuoso character is one not too commonly, and yet well, recognized. Now there may be a virtuoso Orchestra as well as a virtuoso singer, violinist or pianist. There may be virtuoso Concerts of Orchestral music, even pressing Bach and Beethoven into their kaleidoscopic gallery, as well as concerts where such spirits give the tone, not excluding every other element, but suffering none to come into disturbing relations, or rather, into unrelated contiguity, with them.

We are by no means alone in looking upon the Thomas concerts somewhat in the light of orchestral virtuoso concerts. This is not meant as disparagement, but simply in the sense of definition, which after all is the only important sense of criticism. Thankful for an exceedingly rich week, in which there was a vast deal to enjoy and much to learn, we are of those who, after drinking thereof to the full, still keep the sweeter taste of the old springs which, however imperfect in their means of outlet, have still refreshed us season after season: for to them we are indebted largely for the power to enjoy, to learn from, to discriminate among the not always brighter liquids brought us now. While we enjoy and praise much which the stranger brings, we must not forget our loyalty to our own good beginnings, nor peril all we have achieved through perseverance in pure effort, by suffering our interest to be drawn hither and thither, while we support nothing permanent. Attracted by our success a host of speculators will be eager to rush in and try to build their transient fortunes on it. Let us learn from all examples, but let us use the lesson and the knowledge in our own way, still cherishing, improving on what has been well begun.

But we are putting the moral before the story. Let us make haste to recognise, as fully as we did last autumn, and as our whole musical community have done, the rare excellence of the Thomas Orchestra, and its decided superiority to our own or any ever heard in Boston,—for as to Jullien's, that was virtuoso altogether, and ran away with people's senses just when we were in a fair, hopeful way of forming a sound, settled taste (in the "Germania" times), so as to set us back for years, indeed until a new onward current set in with the Symphony Concerts only five years ago.—All that we found admirable in its composition then, we find now: the same average excellence in all the instruments; the same purity of tone in each, and the same clear, lively, rich ensemble,—a euphony of the whole which makes the tones quicken and grateful to the sense; the same marvellous precision of attack and accent; the same light and shade, the vital phrasing, produced by nicely graduated force in passing from one tone to another, and by the toning down of instruments in combination in favor of the one which ought to speak the most significantly; the same general perfection, clearness and effectiveness of rendering in every kind of music. All this, with some increase of numbers since last Fall (by the addition of our Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and a few more of our orchestra), bringing the whole up to nearly sixty. We think of the sound physique of such an orchestra, as if it were a splendid animal, with every limb and muscle equally developed, trained to vigorous, free play. No such thing as a lame or feeble execution of any piece seemed possible with it. Everything was certain to go well.

It was much to have it shown to us so palpably what a good orchestra can be, what beautiful results from choice materials in fit combination, continually trained to work together. For the stimulus of such example given to our own musicians, if for nothing more, we have to thank Mr. Thomas. Already we have seen the improvement in our Symphony performances. Indeed the difference between the two orchestras in the rendering of the classical Symphonies and Overtures is not so great—except in point of euphony and, so to say, the physique of the thing—in point of interpretation not so great—as one might expect from such superior means. The "Leonore" Overture has been made fully as impressive in our own concerts. The poetry and meaning of those four Symphonies has been quite as well brought home to us. But the C-minor of Beethoven did ring out superbly this time, and indeed was gloriously rendered. The Titanic scramble of the basses in the Scherzo was more holdly and distinctly outlined, after a Michel-Angelesque fashion, than we have known before. The brass, refreshingly pure and sure and strong, was perhaps too prominent at times, both here and in the Schumann Symphonies, which also were extremely well played. Once or twice a question of reading might be raised; for instance the announcing of the theme of the Fifth Symphony, the first three notes, with such marked emphasis, and in a time twice as slow as the general movement of the piece. Doubtless it was done because Beethoven said: "So knocks Fate at the door;" but if he had intended the three knocks to be exceptionally emphasized, he would have marked it so; and the imagination is excited more if the raps are first heard as if incidentally and unsuspectingly, leaving their dread import to be found out as the theme develops. No classic rendering on the whole seemed to us so fresh and perfect as that of Mozart's Symphony in D. The "Oberon" and "Freyschutz" and "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overtures of course were suited for this orchestra. But the finest revolutions, to our sense and feeling, were those selections from the "Prometheus" music, especially the Adagio with harp, and in which Berger's cello sings the melody with such expression; and that introduction from Cherubini's "Medea," sublime in its simplicity. These are choice additions to our concert stock, and the renderings were all we could wish. To these we may add two of the works by new men, namely the Suites by Raff and Grimm. The latter, for strings only, pleased us best, as having so much quiet unaffected music in it; the solo quartet was lovely. Raff uses all the instruments, and his work is strange and novel; a well wrought and elaborate, though hardly an inspiring fugue succeeds the introduction; in the other movements there is great variety and charm of fancy. The Overture by Volkmann, too, if not original, yet impressed us musically, as a spontaneous, wholesome work.

The above, with two or three more short, familiar classical selections, and the rich list of classical Concertos, about sums up the purely and sincerely musical portion of these concerts. But all this was mixed up without much rhyme or reason, (except in Friday's Concert), with elements incongruous; bewildering and startling specimens of modern music of effect, whose chief effect on us, we must say, is to make us feel unmusical,—distracted, discontented, and not nearer Heaven, as true music should; for music is not music if there be not some religion, some sweet victory and soul's peace in it.

And here again we thank Mr. Thomas for such opportunities to hear for once so many of the boasted miracles of men of a new kind of genius. We think our public has learned something by it; that the curiosity of many has been quickly satisfied and in a way not much expected by some; and that henceforth there will be not so strong a pressure upon the managers of the Symphony Concerts to have Liszt and Berlioz and Wagner brought into the programmes. The Meistersinger Vorspiel was found dreary and unedifying; the Prometheus Adagio, coming right after it, was heavenly peace. The "Romeo and Juliet," the "Carnival" of Berlioz were trying to the nerves. Liszt's "Tasso," with its straining after strange surprises, its tantalizing way of starting interesting themes and then snatching them away amid fierce storm and uproar, breaking every promise, baffling every hope, of peaceful and continuous musical contentment, tempts one to characterize his compositions as the music of distraction. Rubinstein's "Faust" portraiture had more of discontent in it than music. And in the noisy Fackeltanz, &c., of Meyerbeer we have all sorts of extravagance; think of that solo on the huge Bass Tuba, wonderfully well played to be sure, but all in tones as big round as a hog's head! Surely it was no fault of the orchestra, every way competent and trained to it, that these compositions failed to charm more than a few persons. Compared with them the Strauss waltzes, even to serious tastes, were welcome because genial and spontaneous. Of course those oft repeated little studies of pianissimo, like the "Träumerei," are always charming to fresh ears.

A great element of strength in these concerts was the piano playing of Miss MAHLIG, who during the week played no less than six Concertos, besides the "Spring Fantasia" of Gade (a work of real beauty), and shorter solos by Chopin, Schubert, Liszt, including two of exceeding difficulty and brilliancy: the "Faust Waltz" and "Tannhäuser March." During the month from her first appearance in Boston this remarkable young artist has played here nearly the whole round of great Concertos: the three greatest by Beethoven, the two by Chopin, the one by Schumann, the Concertstück by Weber (three times), and the one in E flat by Liszt.

This last was the most astonishing feat of performance that we ever witnessed; as for the composition, it has a certain strange sort of interest, more curious on the whole than beautiful. It opens with a very uninviting sort of theme, ungenial as the East wind; and which as obstinately keeps returning despite gentler promises of Spring; there is some delicate and sprightly fancy in the gypsy middle movement with the accent marked by the triangle; and finally the whole thing ends so singularly like the Overture to Tannhäuser that one conjectures whether Liszt did not intend here a compliment to his friend Wagner. The young pianist was singularly happy and effective in all her interpretations, most so in the E-minor Concerto of Chopin, less so perhaps in that of Schumann, though admirable there. The charm of her performance never wears out; so absolutely faultless in the execution, so full of vitality and of the soul of music too, it is as fresh after you have heard it every day for weeks, as it was in the first hearing.

[Here Printer cries "All full!" and so the rest must wait, including (we regret to say) the record of Miss Sterling's fine success as well as Mr. Whitney's, in Elijah.]

Music Abroad.

BACH'S PASSION MUSIC (ST. MATTHEW) IN LONDON. The Orchestra of April 8th has the following:

The sixth oratorio was held on Wednesday last at Exeter Hall, where was given the great "Passione" of Sebastian Bach to a crowded and highly interested audience. To Mr. Cummings was assigned the narrative portion of the gospel, and this gentleman has much raised himself in the good opinion of lovers of good taste and blameless vocalization by the admirable way in which he fulfilled the duty imposed upon him. Mlle. Drasdil with the contralto music, some of which is most difficult, if not appalling, and by her great earnestness and pathos, produced a justly strong impression. The soprano music fell into the hands of Mme. Rudersdorf, and was given in her usual careful and artistic manner. The bass was represented by Mr. Lewis Thomas, and well represented. The whole of the gospel history told forcibly on the feelings of the audience; the hymns were received with warm sympathy, and the terse, pictorial choruses elicited hearty and constant applause. The meditation music, much of which was withdrawn, was received with a consideration and sympathy which fixed the production of this great work as an unmistakable success, and such as to render any excision in future unnecessary. The "Fire Chorus" ("Ye lightnings, ye thunders") came like electricity, and was instantaneously encored amid tumults of approbation. The opening chorus lost most of its fine dramatic character from want of due division of the forces, for the choral should be sung in another part of the hall. Fully enough was done to render it desirable that the Bach "Passione" should be an annual performance and given in a way beyond remark. Great credit is due to Mr. Barnby for the high character of the performances and his zeal and energy as conductor.

LEIPZIG.—Continuation of the programmes of the Gewandhaus Concerts:

17th Concert, Feb. 24. Schumann's fourth Symphony (D minor); Air from Haydn's "Creation," sung by Fr. Murjahn of Carlsruhe; Concerto (No. 3) for Violoncello by Goltermann, first time, played by Emil Hegar, member of the orchestra.—Preludium for Violin solo, by J. S. Bach, orchestrated by Stör, the solo part played in unison by eighteen violins; Cavatina from Rossini's "Barber"; Adagio for the Clarinet, Mozart, played by Herr Landgraf; Songs with Piano, by Fr. Murjahn: a) Romanza from Tieck's "Magelone," by Brahms; b) "Das Veilchen," Mozart; Overture to "Freyschutz."

18th Concert, March 3. Kyrie and Gloria from the Missa Solemnis of E. F. Richter, under the direction of the composer; Schumann's Piano Concerto, by Fr. Louise Hauße.—Symphony, in Canon form, by J. O. Grimm, (MS., first time, the composer directing); Fantasia for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra, Beethoven.

19th Concert, March 10. Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann; Aria from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," sung by Herr Carl Hill of Schwerin; Concertino for the Flute, by J. C. Lobe, performed by Herr Barge; Beethoven's Liederkreis: "An die ferne Geliebte," sung by Herr Hill; Romanza for the Horn, by F. Strauss, played by Herr Gumpert; Songs: "Fluthenreicher Ebro," Schumann, and "Abendruhn," C. G. P. Grädner.—Suite, No. 2, in E minor, by F. Lachner (Introd. and Fugue, Andante, Minuetto, Allegretto, Gigue).

And here are the programmes of the Second Cycle of four Chamber Concerts, also given in the hall of the Gewandhaus:

1. Jan. 15. The "Kaiser" Quartet of Haydn; Trio for piano, violin and cello, in B flat, Mozart; Beethoven's Septet.—(Performers: Kapellmeister Reinecke, piano; Concertmeisters David and Röntgen, violins; Hermann, viola; Hegar, cello; Storch, double bass; Gensch, clarinet; Weissenborn, bassoon; Gumpert, horn.)

2. Feb. 5. Quartet for strings, in A, op. 41, Schumann; Variations for piano and 'cello, op. 17, in D, Mendelssohn; Sextet for strings, op. 18, in B flat, Brahms; Trio in B flat, op. 99, Schubert.—(Frl. Luise Hauffe, piano; David and Röntgen, violins; Hermann and Haubold, violas; Hegar and Pester, 'cellos.)

3. Feb. 19. Quartet in G, op. 77, Haydn; Sonata for Flute and figured-Bass, by Handel, with piano accompaniment by F. David; Quartet in C, op. 59, Beethoven; Hummel's Septet.—(Reinecke, piano; Röntgen and Haubold, violins; Hermann, viola; Hegar, 'cello; Barge, flute; Hinke, oboe; Gumpert, horn; Storch, double bass.)

4. March 5. The whole programme from the works of BEETHOVEN: Serenade for violin, viola, and 'cello, op. 8, (Marcia, Adagio, Menuetto, Adagio and Scherzo, alla Polacca, Andante con variazioni, Marcia); Andante in F, for piano; String Quartet, op. 131, in C-sharp minor; "Kreutzer Sonata," op. 47, for piano and violin).—(Reinecke, David, Röntgen, &c.)

At the Theatre, Schiller's William Tell has been given with an overture and other appropriate music, composed by Reinecke.

At the close of the season of twenty Gewandhaus Concerts, two extra ones were given, one of them in memory of Moscheles, when Carl Reinecke performed the Sonate Melancolique of that celebrated composer-pianist.

The members of Riedel's Verein lately gave a fine performance of Beethoven's Missa Solennis, Op. 123. The solos were taken by Mme. Otto (soprano), from the Royal Operahouse, Dresden; Mme. Krebs-Michalest (contralto), Dresden; Herr Rebling (tenor), of the Leipzig Stadttheater; and Herr Von Milde (bass), from Weimar. Herr David played the violin solo in the "Benedictus," and Herr Papier presided at the organ.

MOSCHELES's funeral took place at Leipzig on the 13th inst., and was attended by an extraordinary number of his friends, admirers, and pupils. It was preceded by a service in the house of mourning. The Revs. Herren Ahlfeld and Valentiner delivered impressive discourses in memory of the Deceased, while the students of the Conservatory, under the direction of Herr Reinecke, sang two choruses by Mendelssohn, and a Requiem by Herr Levi, conductor at Carlsruhe. On the previous evening, the University Vocal Association of the Pauliner had sung choruses by Mendelssohn and Gallus, round the coffin, which was magnificently decorated with laurels and palms. At the funeral, the Town Council, the Committee of the Gewandhaus, several local Association, etc., were represented by delegates. All the Professors and Students of the Conservatory, headed by their director, Herr Schleinitz, attended the ceremony. The procession was opened by the pupils of the Deceased carrying two silver laurel-wreaths, presented by the Conservatory and Müller's School of Music, palm-branches, and garlands of flowers. At the grave, the Thomaner Choir sang something appropriate, and the Rev. Herr Ahlfeld pronounced the benediction over the coffin. A separate musical funeral ceremony was shortly to be performed at the Conservatory.

HERR R. WAGNER will not, after all, direct the Beethoven Festival, at Bonn; so, once more, have Virgil's celebrated lines, beginning, "Fama, malum quo, non aliud velocius ullum," been triumphantly verified. The report, so industriously circulated, that the Committee had selected the chief Prophet of the Future to preside over the festival about to be got up in honor of the great composer of Fidelio, turns out to be nothing more than a delusion, a mockery, and a snare. The Committee have unanimously selected Herr Ferdinand Hiller to the important post. Dr. Hiller will be assisted by the Town Musical-Director, Herr von Wasilewski.

NEW YORK.—The Sun, April 4, has the following remarks on the fifth Philharmonic Concert. They only make us more contented with our own unsophisticated classic programmes, and hardly tempt us to put by our Symphonies in favor of "Symphonic Poems."

A symphony by Liszt, intended to give expression in music to some of the strange and wonderful scenes written of by Dante in his great poem, was played on Saturday evening, at the Philharmonic Concert. The enterprise that leads the directors of the Philharmonic Society to give these modern productions is commendable. It is easy to say that the symphonies of the old masters are better and more enjoyable, but all musically inclined persons are anxious to know what the modern men are about, and the wilder and the more extravagant the music they write is, the greater naturally is the curiosity to hear it.

The music of Liszt to Dante's "Hell" and "Purgatory" is to our thinking the worst that the composers of this school can do. We are thankful to believe that in this symphony they have run their course to its very end and exhausted their powers of perversion. Having lived through that hour of agony during which this Symphony lasted, and escaped with reason not overthrown, we can safely bid defiance to Liszt, Wagner, and their fellow madmen of the school of the future. The principle on which this musical monstrosity was constructed was evidently to find out precisely what effects the best composers had made use of to produce lovely and satisfying results, and to reverse them. It was like playing one of Beethoven's symphonies backward. In the first place it was necessary that the whole composition should be made tuneless, and in the next place, so far as possible, it was to set time at defiance. In other words, the accent was to be thrown on such unexpected parts of the beat that the musicians should seem to be playing in one time and the conductor to direct another. The tortures of the damned were to be illustrated, and this congenial theme gave Liszt a famous excuse for unheard-of bedevilment of his orchestra. Shrieks from the trumpets, cries of shrill anguish from the piccolos, groans of distress from the bass tuba, throbs of pain from the kettle drums, screams of sharp torture from the clashing cymbals, yells of demoniac rage from the trombones, sighs and sobs from the softer wind instruments, were all heard at once in a wild carnival of discord, and as a climax to this orchestral fury the violins were sent wailing and complaining in chromatic intervals from the top to the bottom of the musical scale till it seemed as though Beelzebub, prince of devils, must have stood at the composer's right hand while he scored this work. The admirers of Liszt answer such suggestions of discord by the reply that the truer this statement is the more the genius of the author is demonstrated, for the horrors of the nether world were exactly what he intended to paint, and the more hideous the result the better the picture. The wonder is that Liszt's familiar spirit did not inspire him to compose for each class of instruments in a separate key. The effect of demoniac confusion and horror at which he aimed would then certainly have been attained, and his audience sent howling with anguish out of the house. Even now it is not too late, and Mr. Bergmann, when he next performs this work, might have all the violin parts written, say in the key of C, the second violins in C sharp major, the violas in D minor, the double basses and violoncellos in E flat, and so on through the major and minor scales. The doors might then be closed on the audience, the orchestra tied down to their seats, and all the clergymen of the city invited to witness the result. The picture of the infernal regions that would then be presented would, beyond a doubt, strike terror in the heart of the stoutest sinner. In fact, we know of nothing better calculated to call the obdurate to repentance than this work of Liszt's, for if any person could fully be brought to realize that his punishment hereafter would consist in being compelled forever to listen to the symphony that we heard for an hour on Saturday night, there is, we venture to say, no man living bold enough to contemplate unmoved such a doom, or who would not at once take measures to be rescued from so terrible a fate.

Mme. Parepa-Rosa sang Beethoven's noble aria, "Ah Perfido," in the spirit of exaltation in which it was written. Of all the range of arias written in the Italian mode, there is confessedly none more lofty, noble, dignified, and beautiful than this effort of highest inspiration. The great wear to which Madame Rosa's voice has been recently subjected was apparent in her singing. At first the tone wavered; it was not that steady, round, even and unerring tone to which she has accustomed her audiences, but as we have said, she sang the aria grandly and fittingly, declining with good sense the encore which was tendered her, for what could be sung after this song that would not seem frivolous and weak?

Mr. Carl Rosa played with great delicacy and skill a military Concerto by Lipinski, a Pole, who was a famous violinist, after the Paganini school, forty years ago, and more recently conductor at the Royal Theatre at Dresden, but a feeble composer. The concert closed with Von Weber's ever charming "Euryanthe Overture."

The Foundations of our Present Music.

A Lecture delivered before the Pupils of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music,

BY G. A. SCHMITT.

The subject of this lecture is: The Foundations of our Present Music. Of music which, in our state of society, accompanies us from the cradle to the bier, filling our lives with joy and beauty, participating in each important act of our existence with its sounds of compassion, now resounding loud in hymns of praise, and then, with gentle, soothing tones allaying pain and resolving grief into contentment; of music, which, of all arts the latest sister, once had to tread the rugged path of experiment, of hard work and study, once needed centuries to take a short step in advance, though now we hardly would suspect the laurel on its brow to have been nourished with the sweat of toil.

In endeavoring to trace back to its foundations the proud edifice of modern music, there is nothing more natural than that our eye should seek the ancient Greeks, the nation above all others that has produced in marble such ideals of the human form as sculptors of our day are glad to imitate, but have not surpassed; the nation that has left us a legacy in poetry, such as has not been reached, for childlike truth and naturalness, in these three thousand and more years since Homer wrote or rather composed his Epics; that nation whose dramatists have only been excelled by Shakespeare in our days. Too little has remained of their painting to enable us to form a just idea of their powers in this art. If we may trust the remnants of painting, as we find them on vases, we might say that for them the time had not yet come for a perfect expression of the idea of beauty in this art. For, however beautiful may be the execution of the individual figure in those works, the art of grouping, the secret of comprehending individual thought in a perfect unity of action and expression, was not yet accorded them. Nor need we wonder at this, for various is the task of nations in the ever-changing life of mankind, and not at any time can the most favored of mortals accomplish all things.

If now we turn our eyes to music, as it was practised among the ancient Greeks, we find that what we are accustomed to call music did not exist among the Greeks; for to us, music means the expression of feeling in melody, permeated by rhythm and time and accompanied by harmony. But with the Greeks there was only a slight melody, moving within the limits of six tones, rhythmically arranged, but without time or harmony. What they called harmony, with us is included in melody and rhythm, and their nearest approach to harmony was the consonance of the octave which was sung by the boys above the chant of the men, and was played on their lyre, which for a long time had only four strings.

How are we to imagine music without time and harmony. In 1650 Athanasius Kircher, one of the Jesuit Fathers, and a great authority in musical matters, in the library of the monastery San Salvatore, near Messina, found a manuscript containing the first Pythian Ode of Pindar with Greek notation. There is no doubt as to the authenticity of the notation. By this manuscript we are enabled to form an idea of Greek music, truer and more lifelike than we could have gained from the treatises on Greek music left us by late writers. And on examining it, what do we find? There is a melody, not exceeding six degrees, solemn, impressive, almost sad, which may have moved the Greek hearers at the festive games of Apollo, but which would leave us cold if we heard it without note or comment at our musical festivals. It was the stammering, faltering voice of infant genius. It must have deeply moved mankind in those days, for the allegorical legends of Orpheus, stirring up by the tones of his lyre even inanimate nature, too clearly tell us how deeply man must have been roused even by that primitive music.

Indeed, Greek music would not form a proper subject for discussion in this lecture if it were not for two points, the first of which has rather a negative value for us: namely, that the development of our present music was greatly retarded by the influence of Greek theory. For when Byzantine learned men brought to Rome the treatises on Greek music, some of which are preserved to us, the Church, then emerging from obscurity and persecution, turned to them for instruction, for help. But very little help was there to be found in a theory which gave to eighteen tones, the total extent of Greek melodic knowledge, eighty-five different names; names valid for the same tone when sung, and not valid for the same when played on the flute or the lyre; names, some of which extend to five and more syllables each. Yet the Church possessed one element of Greek music without knowing it, the Chant. And this is the second point for which it is fit that we should look back to Greek music.

It has been zealously maintained that the Christian Church would be quite unlikely to adopt Heathen tunes for worship, that it would rather abhor anything tending to remind its converts of their former religion. But who would doubt that the Apostles at the last supper intoned their hymns of praise in the old accustomed melodies learned in the Hebrew temple; or, who would assert that the Greek congregations of Christians, untutored as they were, would set about inventing new melodies for their hymns when the old tunes were familiar to all? To confirm this view it only needs a glance at the sister arts. In the Catacombs of Rome we find the picture of a graceful young man bearing a ram on his shoulders. This was the well-known mythological representation of Hermes, or Mercury. Did not the Christian Church adopt this picture as the symbol of the Saviour with the Lamb, changing the Heathen God into the Good Shepherd? Did not the statue of Ceres, of Demeter, as the Greeks called her, do excellent service as a Madonna? Had not the winged images of Winds to stand for angels?

Now Christianity found its principal support in those Greek cities of Asia Minor, where the service of the Heathen Gods had been carried on for ages with more pomp and splendor than in the Greek peninsula itself, Corinth perhaps excepted; and it is natural that the solemn chants long in use there should have been carried to Rome.

We find the Popes not slow to provide for this important branch of Christian worship. Thus, a few centuries after Christ, Pope Sylvester institutes a school for singers in Rome; and in the sixth century, St. Gregory regulates the music of the church, ordains the four Church-tones, and gives his name to the Chant that to this day is heard in the Catholic Church. It is a melody, rhythmical, but without time, such as you may hear of Sunday afternoons when the psalms are chanted in the Catholic Church, or on Holy Friday when the Lamentations of the Prophet Jeremiah are sung in the darkened edifice.

How can a melody be rhythmical without time, you ask. We are so accustomed to see the marks denoting time prefixed to our present music that it seems strange that there should have been music without time. A glance at the opening phrase or motive of Beethoven's C-minor Symphony, the fifth among his nine, will exemplify what I mean. You there have three-eighth notes followed by a half note, which has a pause attached to it. There you have rhythm but not time, for it is left to the musical intelligence and the good taste of the conductor to extend that half-note properly. You notice also that this rhythmical motive cuts each of two successive measures in two, filling half of each. In the course of its working up the rhythm is fitted into the time of two quarter-notes. But in the Gregorian chant many syllables are often sung to one tone, and the greater or smaller duration of each tone is only determined by the declamation of the text and accented syllables.

Fortunately for our knowledge of the beginnings of our present music a very important document has been preserved, which gives us an accurate insight into the character of the Gregorian Chant. In the very earliest time of the Church a manner of chanting, called after St. Ambrose, came into vogue, especially in Milan, different from the Roman. St. Gregory, for this reason, found it necessary to lay down the true manner of chanting, and an Antiphonarium was compiled at his command containing the texts of the hymns and psalms together with their notation. This book was kept in a special box, chained to the altar at St. Peter's in Rome. This notation consisted of strange looking square or diamond-shaped dots, often connected with each other by curved lines (fly-feet and horse-shoes they were called by the later theorists), that were written at various heights above the text, so as to indicate to the singers where their voices had to rise or to fall. The length of each note was not inicated, but was left to the natural or acquired ability for declamation; nor was it very certain on which tone the melody had to begin. These marks were called Neuma in the singular, Neumata in the plural.

Charlemagne, who was equally zealous to preserve the songs of his own German people, and to extend the glory of the Church by good music, at two different times sent petitions to the Pope for singers, to teach the uncouth throats of his singers to pour forth such melodies as were then in use in Italy. His petitions were granted, and in 790 we find that two singers, Petrus and Romanus by name, were sent by Pope Hadrian to Metz, in what is now France, where Charlemagne had instituted a school of music for his singers. Another school was established in the monastery of St. Gallen, in what is now Switzerland. Unused to the inclement air of the transalpine country, Romanus, who had grown up under the warm sky of Italy, fell sick, and with difficulty was brought as far as St. Gallen. There, recovering, he received an earnest invitation from Charlemagne to remain, which he did, keeping one of the two copies of the Roman Antiphonarium, which they had brought with them, against the remonstrances of Petrus, who proceeded to Metz. The copy taken by the latter to Metz is lost, but that deposited in St. Gallen is preserved and forms the greatest treasure of the magnificent library of that monastery. The box, in which it is kept shows incontrovertible evidence in its sculpture of belonging to the time of Charlemagne. In this way it happens that we know exactly how one of the main sources of our present music, the Gregorian Chant, sounded in those early days, over twelve hundred years ago. This chant, of course, was sung in unison. In the course of time it was discovered—was it by accident, was it done by design?—that a tone different from the chant sounded well, and accordingly we find that a Benedictine monk in Flanders, Hucbald, who died in 930, lays down laws of harmony which were very simple, and to our present taste very horrid; for of consonances he only mentions two; one of them is the Octave, and the other is the Fifth. Now let any one strike together on his piano the tones c—g, d—a, e—b, &c., playing them in succession, and he may get a taste of the excruciating effect such successions would have on our ear.

History may not only be studied as a succession of events, but, if we look in the proper places, we may find the successive stages of development simultaneously existing. The man-eating Fejee-Islander had his prototype many thousands of years ago in the North of Europe, if we may believe the Danish savants. The music of the Arabs and Hindoos of our day may have resounded in Greece in time immemorial. So even to-day, successive Fifths, introduced by Hucbald in his Organum, as his doctrine was called, may occasionally be heard in Europe, as I can witness, in the hymns chanted on the way by pious pilgrims to the shrine of some miracle-working Madonna.

A hundred years after Hucbald, another Benedictine monk, Guido of Arezzo, near Ferrara, who died in the monastery of Pomposa in 1050, immortalized himself by his improvements in harmony, notation, and especially in the method of teaching singing, so that his name was for many centuries connected by a grateful posterity with all progress in music. To give but one instance: the invention of the harpsichord, our present piano, was ascribed to him, although it was several hundred years after his death that an instrument faintly approaching our household orchestra was constructed. But what he invented is sufficient to excite the admiration even of our advanced age for his genius. First of all, he improved musical notation by drawing lines on which the Neumata were to be written. Indeed before his time some beginning was made in this direction by drawing one red line over the text of the psalm. On, above and below this line the Neumata were written. The Neuma on this line was to sound F. Afterwards a second line was drawn above it, in yellow color, which was to indicate C. Guido added two more, thus gaining room for nine tones, which were not exceeded by the Gregorian Chant. He added one tone below the twenty existing before his time, and calling it by the Greek name Gamma, there being two other G's above, originated the name Gammul, which even in our days is yet used as a synonym for Scale. The next tone after this he called A, and gave to the tones the names of the letters which they have now. Now the Neumata, which heretofore had floated about in space, like Infusoria in a drop of water, received a local habitation and a name; now it was no longer doubtful whether the beginning tone was the first or the third, and the quarrels of the singing masters were effectually put to rest. He also first applied the syllables ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la to the first six tones to assist the memory of his pupils, as singing masters to this day uselessly think it necessary to do. It is remarkable that among these names one for the seventh degree is missing. Whether this tone was held in abhorrence, or what else was the cause we know not. It is a strange coincidence that both in the scale of the Welsh minstrels and in that of the Chinese, the seventh does not exist, and it is probable that Terpander, the Greek musician, when he increased the number of strings on his lyre to seven, also omitted the seventh tone, tuning his last string in unison with the first. Guido also invented the "Musical Hand," giving to each finger the name of one of those syllables, ut, &c., one indeed being hung up in the air above the middle finger. This Musical Hand, after the manner of those days, became the basis of a very intricate system of musical mnemonics, which we have not time to explain. In addition to all these inventions he went one step beyond Hucbald, introducing the harmony of the Third by the side of the consonant Octave and the fearful so-called consonances of consecutive Fifths. From this one man begins the advance in musical art, which needed but one more improvement, the mensural note, the sign by which to express time, as we have it now, to make possible the beginning of that music which precedes our own, and which found its highest development in Johann Sebastian Bach in the last century,—the counterpoint. It is a matter of regret that Guido could not go one step further and invent this measuring of time by means of the mensural note. It was centuries after him before necessity forced man, skillful in inventions, to establish this last element of our present music.

Before we turn our attention to this new and final fulfilment of the appliances needed for our art, it may be profitable to learn from some events in the life of this glorious monk that the progress of all truth is hemmed in by difficulties, that the course of music, as well as of true love, never ran smooth. When Guido, by means of his inventions, was enabled to teach his boys in a few weeks what formerly had been the work of a life-time,—to intonate correctly and to sing in the same way church-tones, whenever they were needed,—his success excited the envy and the enmity of some of his brother monks to such a degree, that he had to flee his monastery for his life. The Pope, John XIX. (1024–1033), hearing of the wonderful monk and of his banishment, sent two special messengers to invite Guido to his court. He read the rules which Guido had prefixed to his Antiphonarium, asked him for explanations, and did not rise from his seat until he had learned to sing a verse, the music to which had been unknown to him before. The favor of the Pope would have placed him on the Bishop's chair, had not the Prior of his monastery, pacified and made to relent by the signal favor of the Pope, invited him back,—and had not the simple monk preferred his quiet cell to the temptations a bishop, in his opinion, was exposed to.

Both Hucbald and Guido taught that certain intervals might be added in a higher part to the chant; it was but natural that some inventive singer should add a melody above the fundamental chant, a chant differing from the original but according with it, after a rude fashion, but still varying the monotony of a single and simple series of notes. Such additions we find shortly after Guido under two names: the one was, Faulx Bourdon, or as we would write in the present French, Faux Bourdon, false Bourdon. This consisted in a succession of chords of the Fourth and Sixth over the chant. And the other was Déchant, Descantus, the Italian Discanto, our Treble. This signified improvised adornments, floriture, as they are called in music now, a florid upper part, left to the imagination of a gifted singer. Meanwhile the necessity of keeping these accompaniments in the proper proportion, as to time, to the principal chant, caused the latter to progress in more measured steps than it might proceed when all the singers sang the same tones to the same words, reciting or declaiming the latter. The Gregorian Chant had to move now in strict time, and so, after the thing had been practically used, the sign, the mensural note, followed as a matter of course.

There were two influences at work in the times immediately after Guido, to facilitate the invention of the Déchant and the introduction of strict time. These were the institutions of the Trouvères in France, and their brothers in art, the Minnesingers in Germany; and the Folk-song, the Volkslied, as it is called in German.

The Crusades, quickening life in all its aspects, exciting the imagination, arousing—by the growing familiarity with unheard of new countries and their strange legends—the poetic faculty to the highest degree, of necessity exerted a powerful influence also on Music. Not the music of the church, that was firm as the rock of St. Peter's; but the music of court life, the tones in which love and bravery were sung. And indeed under the beautiful sky of Southern France, where the almond blooms, where the fragrant blossoms and the joyous leaves of the grape-vine charmingly intermingle with the sombre olive, where the beauty of noble women and the bravery of the knight presented fit subjects for the poet's lay,—there life necessarily was elevated into the Ideal by the art of poetry and of song. They called their art "Art de trobar," the art of inventing; "gay saber," gay knowledge; "gaya ciencia," the joyous science. And those that practised it were noble Lords. The first of these Trouvères was Count Guillaume de Poitiers (d. 1127). The German Minnesingers, also noble Lords, sang their own poems to their own tunes, accompanying themselves on the lute. Not so the French Trouvères; they had their servants (jongleurs they call them), trained in music, perform their pieces. This, and the fact that instrumental dance music was also performed by these Jongleurs, made notation absolutely necessary. And thus we find about the time of the Crusades the Neuma of the church on Guido's four lines supplanted by the black note. While the church still retained the Neuma with its uncertainty as to time, secular music was written with square black notes. The assumption of this note by the church, which took place early in, or immediately before, the 13th century, completed the preparation for our present music. The music of the Trouvères itself was not destined to exercise any influence on the development of music; that was performed in the bosom of the Church. Lovely as the blossom had been, and quickly as it had sprung up, so quickly it wilted, as over night. Many of the tunes of the Trouvères are preserved, and admirable some of them indeed are, even in the light of our own musical knowledge and feeling. Of the instrumental music of the Trouvères, their dance-tunes may have exerted an influence on later music. We find at least traces of them as late as the 15th century. Both the songs and the dance-tunes had the element of time in addition to rhythm fully developed, and in so far led the music of the church, and helped its progress by example.

The second influence, much more powerful than the one just spoken of, was exerted by the Folksong. Indeed for over three hundred years, up to the middle of the 16th century, there was hardly a Mass composed but had for its tenor, its principal part, a Folksong or an Antiphone; and these tenors were as often taken from the Folksong, which the common people sang at their merry-makings, as from the church-music of the Antiphone. Like the text which the preacher takes from the Bible, and upon which he constructs his sermon, so these old composers took a Love or Drinking Song, gave it in slow movement to the tenor, to sing it sometimes through an entire Mass, while the other voices sang their punctum contra punctum, their note of accompaniment against the note of the Folksong, their counterpoint.

[Conclusion next time]

Weber's "Oberon," as given by the Parepa-Rosa Troupe.

(From the Chicago Tribune, April 30.)

If Parepa-Rosa had never done anything more for music in Chicago than to introduce Weber's splendid opera of "Oberon," she would have merited the lasting gratitude of all lovers of music. Any music from the man who wrote "Der Freischütz" and "Preciosa" must always be warmly welcomed, and in producing this she has set the seal upon her great success, and in closing her season crowns it with the best representation of her musical genius. Parepa has, in past seasons, made unmistakable successes in "Trovatore," in the "Marriage of Figaro," in "Martha," and other operas, and especially in her matchless oratorio vocalization, but we think she will be longest remembered in her personation of Rezia, in "Oberon," and that more pleasant memories will cluster around the efforts of all the artists in this great romantic opera than any other. We must not forget Mr. Carl Rosa in this connection. During the comparatively short time in which he has held the operatic baton he has rapidly risen, and, by his untiring zeal and industry, and his quick, accurate musical preceptions, now occupies a commanding position as an orchestral conductor of opera. This was manifested in his production of the "Marriage of Figaro." It is more palpably manifest in "Oberon." The manner in which he controls his players, in which he gives spirit and shading to the instrumentation and enthusiasm and life to the artists upon the stage, shows that he possesses close analytical powers, joined to fervor of imagination, which entitle him to conduct any operatic work. It is no child's play to prepare and conduct such operas as the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Oberon," and the tact and skill of a man who proves himself competent to do it successfully deserve hearty recognition.

The production of such a work as "Oberon" for the first time in this city is no ordinary event, and the occasion, therefore, warrants more detail in description than we are accustomed to give to standard operas which usually form the staple of repertoires. It is now nearly forty-four years since "Oberon" was first produced at Covent Garden, under the immediate direction of the composer himself. Weber wrote it at the request of Charles Kemble, then manager, from a libretto by Planché, who derived the substance of his plot from one of Wieland's poems, not from "The Midsummer Night's Dream," as is usually supposed. In fact there is little sympathy between Wieland and Shakespeare in the story. It does not breathe so much the atmosphere of Titania's Court in fairyland, although fairies figure in it to a greater or less degree, as of the Oriental richness and beauty of the Arabian Nights, and the imaginative grace and fancy of the narratives of Scheherazade, the Princess. The story is somewhat incongruous, and serves better as a vehicle for the music than as a composition possessing dramatic unity and consistency. In this respect it resembles somewhat the story of "The Magic Flute," and the basis of the plot is also similar in that it pictures the tribulations of two loving hearts, exposed to the most severe tests, which only tend to unite them the more closely. The mysteries of Isis and Osiris find their counterpart in the fairy mysteries, and the Magic Flute serves the same purpose as the Magic Horn.

The original poem is the story of a Paladin, who was banished by Charlemagne, and was forbidden to return until he had performed some very difficult feats in the palace of the Caliph of Bagdad. He performed these feats by the aid of Oberon and the Magic Horn. Several other adventures, including the love of the Caliph's daughter, are complicated with these feats, but in the libretto we have only the Bagdad adventure, a shipwreck, pirates, a rescue, and safe return of the hero, Sir Huon. The heroine of the piece is Rezia, daughter of the Caliph, betrothed by her father to Babekan. The hero is a French knight of the Court of the Emperor Charlemagne, Sir Huon, who, having slain the Emperor in self defence, is sentenced to purchase his life by going to the court of the Caliph of Bagdad, killing him who sits on the Caliph's right hand, and claiming the Caliph's daughter as his bride. Sir Huon, however, like a true knight errant, sets out with his squire Sherasmin. Puck narrates this story to Oberon, and brings the sleeping knight and squire to the fairy king. Oberon then conjures up a vision in which the knight sees Rezia, who is lamenting that he sleeps when she is to be sacrificed, and calls him to her rescue. The vision disappearing, the knight and his squire awake, when Oberon reveals himself to Sir Huon, tells him he shall fulfil his task if he is faithful, and gives him a magic horn which will bring him aid when sounded. This vision seems to have been also shown to Rezia, who in the next scene is shown in the Caliph's harem listening to the narrative of the knight's arrival, and his learning of her dream, and vowing to rescue her or perish. In the next act Babekan is seated at the right hand of the Caliph, claims his bride, and she is brought in to be betrothed, when Sir Huon rushes in, sword in hand, slays the claimant and seizes the bride. The Sultan's attendants are paralyzed by the intervention of Oberon, and the lovers are carried by supernatural power to the sea beach near Acalon, where they embark for Greece. Subsequently, to test them further, the vessel is wrecked by the fairies, and Rezia is seized by Barbary pirates and sold as a slave to the Bey of Tunis, who becomes infatuated with her. During the absence of Sir Huon to seek assistance, the pirates land and are carrying off Rezia, when Sir Huon returns and is by them struck senseless. Oberon appears, and deploring the cruel fate which compels him to make Sir Huon suffer so much, summons Puck, bids him guard Sir Huon (whom he has entranced) well and on the seventh day place him before the door of the house of old Ibrahim, the gardener, in Tunis. The fourth and last act commences in a court of the garden of Ibrahim, to whom Sherasmin and Fatima (Rezia's maid,) had been sold as slaves. Puck descends with Sir Huon, who is bewildered at meeting Sherasmin and Fatima; from Fatima he learns that Rezia has that morning been presented to the Emir by the Pirate Captain. In the second scene, Roshana, the Emir's favorite, deposed in favor of Rezia, thirsting for revenge, causes Sir Huon, who hopes he may be about to meet Rezia, to be brought before her, abruptly avows her love for him, and proposes that he slay the Emir and share the throne with her. Sir Huon indignantly refuses, declaring he loves another. Roshana summons to her aid singing girls, who endeavor, but in vain, to fascinate Sir Huon; he is about to force his way out, Roshana clinging to him, when Almanzar (the Emir) enters. In his fury he orders Sir Huon to be burned alive within two hours. Rezia rushes in, claims Sir Huon as her husband, and, as a first favor, asks his pardon. Almanzar will pardon, even enrich him, if Rezia will smile upon him (Almanzar's love); she refuses, and they are both about to be led to the stake, when Puck appears and winds the magic horn; Almanzar is rendered powerless, Sir Huon and Rezia are released; Puck blows a louder blast, Oberon and Titania appear. Oberon greets the happy pair. The clouds shut in and Huon is bathed in all sorts of rosy bliss and ecstasy.

This is the story. As will be seen, it is incongruous enough, and has very little human feeling or sympathy in it, but it serves as a gorgeous setting for Weber's romantic fancy and richness of imagination. The music is not so sensuous as that of "Der Freischütz," because "Der Freischütz" is a popular story, full of that human feeling which touches the heart at once; but it is more ethereal and imaginative, and more fascinating, because it is full of beauty and tenderness, as well as poetic grace. The melodies are very rich, and, in addition to those which are distinctly defined, there are constant melodic suggestions, which add to the grace of the work. The instrumentation is very elaborate, especially in the finales, sometimes very descriptive and, in the purely Oriental scenes, is very richly colored. Occasionally, but not often, you get glimpses of the weirdness and diablerie which are so prominent in "Der Freischütz." The music, however, as a whole, does not possess such supernatural depth, but is more frolicsome and elfish, and at times as perfectly descriptive as Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Of course in presenting such a work, some reductions and transpositions must be made to suit it to the company, but these have been done with excellent judgment by Mr. Rosa, and all the gems of the opera are preserved in their original setting. The leading numbers we will briefly outline, and in doing so, also indicate the manner of performance of them by the leading artists. The overture is familiar to all concert-goers as one of the most beautiful ever written. It recites some of the principal themes of the work, especially the grand Oberon aria and the Puck scene of the third act. The first act opens with a very graceful fairy chorus, which is followed by some melodramatic music accompanying the speaking parts of Puck (Miss Warner) and Oberon (Mr. De Solla) and leading to the Vision which introduces Rezia (Parepa) in a short aria, which she sang with exquisite purity and, at the close, provoked applause with one of her sustained tones of, at least, a minute in endurance. The first recitatives, which were written in by Benedict, follow, leading to a very graceful fairy chorus in B major and introducing Huon (Castle) who sings an aria, "Deign fair spirit," with choral accompaniment. A scene ensues between Huon and Sherasmin (Lawrence), which brings the former to his great aria, "O! 'tis a glorious sight." The original song which was written here by Weber was afterwards, at the request of Braham, for whom it was written, transferred to the third act and given to Oberon. Although the former was Weber's favorite, and the Baute Song substituted in its stead. It is also one of Sims Reeves's favorite songs. It is very descriptive in character and exceedingly trying to the voice, and, although Mr. Castle lacks somewhat in dramatic intensity to do it full justice, nevertheless he was conscientious in delivering it with all the spirit of which he is capable, and deserved the hearty applause which rewarded his effort. The finale now commences with an aria, "Yes, my Lord, with joy," for Parepa, which runs into a duo with Fatima (Mrs. Seguin). The instrumentation is very heavy and Parepa is very heavy, which may account for the fact that the duo lacked balance, and that Mrs. Seguin for once, was outclimaxed. The act closes with an Oriental Turkish march, the clarinets and oboes leading off the theme, and the drums supplying a weird sort of monotone. Parepa takes a florid melody, and the chorus catches up the original theme as an accompaniment to it, and the curtain falls upon a very elaborate ensemble.

The second act opens with a Turkish chorus of the same general character as the finale of the first act, the wind instruments and tympani introducing it. Après of this music, it is easy to see where Offenbach has drawn some of his inspiration. A fighting scene occurs between Iluon and Bubekan (Howard), which is accompanied by more of Benedict's recitative, very illustrative in character. Mrs. Seguin is always fortunate in having some beautiful arias, which is a doubly fortunate fact for the reason that she always sings them well. One of them occurs at this point, "A lovely Arab maid," commencing in E minor and ending in the major, to suit the change of sentiment in the aria, which she sang with so much expression as to gain a very hearty encore. Then ensue a few bars of recitative leading to one of the best numbers in the work, and one of the best quartets ever written, "Over the dark blue waters," sung by Parepa, Mrs. Seguin, Lawrence, and Castle, and sung in exquisite style. The curtain falls upon this number.

The third act opens with a solo for Puck, which gave the new comer, Miss Warner, an opportunity of singing her first song before the Chicago public. She has a deep voice of contralto quality, which is effective in the lower and medium registers only, and running very shrill in the upper. She filled her role very acceptably, and sang quite effectively at times. The wreck scene follows, the accompaniments to which forcibly remind one of the incantation music of "Der Freischütz," many of the phrases being almost identical. The instrumentation of this scene is Weber's, and Weber's only. A beautiful adagio prayer follows for Castle, which he sang very purely and expressively. The sublime aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," immediately ensues. It is thoroughly descriptive, and in keeping with the subject. It commences in a massive manner, picturing the wrath of the ocean, and as the sun appears runs into the same grand chords with which Haydn paints the burst of light in "The Creation," and closes with the final theme of the overture in a grand jubilate. It was a fitting theme and fitting music for the great Parepa to illustrate with her almost boundless resources. She herself is a theme of magnitude, and she never rises to her full height and to the perfect exercise of her great powers until she is singing of oceans, rocks, and mountains, or in the sublimities of such works as "The Creation" and "The Messiah." For once, therefore, we have had an opportunity of hearing her at her best, and her singing was almost like an inspiration. It was a picture of human nature defying the elements themselves. The great singer was never grander, never sublimer, never more in earnest, than when she recited this impressive and majestic apostrophe to ocean, with all the richness and purity of her voice, with all the defiant strength of her generous lungs, and with all the resources of her finished technique. Some more of Benedict's recitative follows. Castle gets killed by the pirates, and coolly picks out a nice soft spot to die in, and then enuses the original Iluon song of the first act, which was transferred to this act for Oberon. It would be better policy to cut it out altogether, beautiful as it is, than to have it as badly sung again as Mr. De Solla sang it. He has no idea of the song, and, if he had an idea, his voice is not capable of expressing it. A delicious little mermaid's song is sung by Parepa behind the scenes, with horn obligato, and sung deliciously. A duo follows, very graceful in character, for Oberon and Puck, with violin obligato, which was not gracefully sung, and the act closes with a very graceful spirit chorus.

We can only indicate the character of the music of the last act from the score, as we had not the opportunity of hearing it. It commences with an aria for Lawrence, which has been written for him by Mr. Howard Glover, from one of Weber's piano sonatas, probably for the purpose of giving the unfortunate Sherazmin one number to sing in his ungrateful score. A beautiful song for Mrs. Seguin, "Oh! Araby, dear Araby," follows and this is succeeded by a duo with Sherazmin, leading to a trio in chorale form, then to the singing girls' scene, which closely resembles the nun scene in "Robert le Diable," and finally to the closing chorus accompanying a splendid concerted effect.

The opera was mounted very beautifully, and some of the scenery, especially the vision of Resia, the view of Bagdad and the port of Ascalon, was admirable in spectacular effect. The costuming, also, was very rich, and, as a whole, the opera may be set down as a great success.

Music Abroad.

ROME. Miss Anne Brewster's letter, of April 19, to the Philadelphia Bulletin, contains the following:

Liszt left Rome for Germany last Saturday. He has finished the music for the approaching Beethoven festival, and he has also completed the Oratorio of Christ this winter during his visit to Cardinal Hohenlohe's Villa d'Este at Tivoli. The celebrated musician selected his own apartment at the villa, a long while ago, and the Cardinal had it furnished especially to suit his remarkably simple tastes. The rooms are on the upper story, far away from all noise. A long corridor shuts them off from the rest of the building. This corridor terminates in an uncovered gallery, which commands a superb view of Rome, the Campagna and the sea. The main door leading to Liszt's rooms has on it in yellow letters the monogram of his name, F. L. His study is a small room with one window, containing a cabinet piano of Boisselot & Co., a writing table, a sofa, and in the deep alcove which leads to his salon there is a book-case. The parlor is also small and plainly furnished, and from it a door leads into his bedroom.

The Abbé has come into Rome several times during the season, and at such times he has held receptions; but I am sorry to say that he has been so overrun with American visitors, that he has conceived a great prejudice against us. Individual Americans he has been very courteous to, and admires them; but Americans en masse are his horror. Our country people are too apt to think their hero worship is excuse enough for intruding upon their hero. If they could only know the sarcastic things the irritated musician had said of them this season, they would be likely to lose some of their admiration. Many of Liszt's American friends, those who have received and enjoyed his courtesies, have refused his invitations this winter, and denied themselves the pleasure of his society, just on account of the indiscreet crowding in of curious visitors to the receptions.

All Rome is on the qui vive for Holy Week, and strangers are flocking in from all sides. These beautiful ceremonies can repeat and repeat themselves, and be always picturesque and attractive, for the greatest artists the world has ever known took old church traditions and developed them into the full flower of picturesque beauty, making of them "a joy forever," to Christian and Pagan. I am sorry to say that the spring is cold and rainy, consequently very unhealthy. If the present disagreeable weather continues, the Holy Week ceremonies will be most difficult to accomplish. The greatest treat of all, however, will be the hearing of the Miserere in the vast Vatican Basilica instead of in the Sistine Chapel as heretofore.

BERLIN. The first representation of Wagner's "Meistersinger" took place here on the 1st of April, in presence of the King and Queen of Prussia. The house was crowded, and in spite of the rule which forbids applause in presence of the Sovereign, unless authorized by the sovereign's example, the theatre throughout the performance resounded with plaudits, plentifully relieved by hisses. During the first act the audience was comparatively calm. Walter's solo, sung with great expression by Niemann, was encored in spite of very violent opposition from a large portion of the audience. But with the second act a tempest burst forth such as, in the musical sphere, the works of Wagner alone seem capable of creating. During the third act the tempest became a hurricane, which attained its climax when the finale was begun. The instrumentation of the closing scene is sufficiently noisy; but such was the roar kept up by the adversaries and partisans of the composer that the orchestra was rendered inaudible, or rather its sound was rendered indistinguishable. The conflict was still maintained after the opera had come to an end, recalls of the principal singers, of the conductor, and of the stage manager being each made the pretext for a fresh engagement.—London Orchestra.

KONIGSBERG.—"What is one man's meat is another man's poison" is rather a homely, not to say vulgar proverb, but it is very true for all that, and its truth has been strikingly exemplified, within the last week or two, by the worthy burghers of this celebrated old town. While the Viennese and Berliners receive Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg in anything but a flattering manner, the good people here consider it such a masterpiece that three performances in one week were necessary to satisfy their "Wagnerian cravings."

LEYDEN. A grand Musical Festival will be held here on the 2nd and 3rd June, when Mendelssohn's

Elijah; J. S. Bach's second Suite; Handel's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day;" and the "Adventitious," by Schumann, will be among the works performed.

PARIS. The recent festival in commemoration of Berlioz is thus described by the Paris correspondent of The Graphic:

"As regards musical fêtes, we have had a commemorative festival of the late Berlioz, which has not been a complete success. Little but the compositions of Berlioz himself was executed, and this erudite music is not universally liked among us. Faure and Mme. Miolan-Carvalho sang without sufficient confidence, and without producing the slightest effect, the duet from 'L'enfance du Christ.' The famous septet from the 'Troyens,' formerly so applauded at the Theatre Lyrique, also fell flat, and the finale of 'Roméo and Juliet,' although very fine, did not awake the audience from the torpor into which they seemed to have fallen. The only pieces of Berlioz which succeeded were the March from 'Pèlerinage d'Harold en Italie,' the overture to the 'Carnaval Romain,' the grand scene from the 'Damnation de Faust,' and among others the solo of Mephistopheles, which Faure executed in a most masterly manner. Mme. Gueymard gained much applause in the air from Gluck's Alceste, 'Divinité du Styx,' and the finale to the second act of the 'Vestale' (Spontini) with much approbation, although Mlle. Nilsson (doubtless fatigued, as on the eve she had obtained a great success in 'Robert le Diable') did not give to her part the necessary set off. In fine, could the shade of Berlioz have been present at this fête in his honor, it would have been astonished and somewhat indignant at a homage which left so much to be desired."

The production of Handel's Alexander's Feast was the chief musical event last week in the French capital. To us in England and America, where Handel's name is a household word, and where his music is listened to with a feeling near akin to devotion, it seems strange that the first performance of one of his works should be an "event" in a city where music is so cheap and so popular as in Paris, but when the natural tastes of the French nation and the thoroughly English character of Handel's works are remembered, their comparative unpopularity is easily accounted for. What success the French librettist has had in his translation of the poem we know not, but the performance, from a musical point of view, is said to have been most successful, the singing of the chorus drilled by M. Bourgault-Ducoudray being specially praised. At any rate, the honor is due to him of having made strenuous efforts to popularize the music of Handel and Bach among his countrymen; and the fact that he has obtained a satisfactory rendering of the Passion of the one and the great oratorios of the other is highly creditable.—Choir, April 9.

MOSCOW. Great activity reigns at present in musical circles here, and hardly a day passes without a good concert being given. The programme of the last concert of the Russian Musical Society comprised: Fragments from the symphony, Roméo et Juliette, Berlioz; choruses from Israel in Egypt, Handel; the Thirty-Second Psalm, Marcelllo; Pianoforte-Concerto in G minor, Moscheles; Russian songs, Dargomyzhsky; and the "Jubel Overture," C. M. von Weber. The last concert of this Society this season was announced for the 2nd inst., when among the pieces to be performed were R. Schumann's Paradies und die Peri, and Herr R. Wagner's Walkyrenritt.

MUNICH. A German version of Racine's Athalie, with Mendelssohn's music, has been performed at the Royal Operahouse with wonderful success. It was produced by the express order of the King, who was present at the performance. Herr R. Wagner had better look to this. If his Bavarian Majesty hears much of Mendelssohn's compositions, his taste for the Music of the Future may become vitiated.

BRUSSELS. Immediately after the first performance of Lohengrin at the Theatre de la Monnaie, Herr Richard Wagner wrote as follows to his pupil, Herr Richter, who conducted on the occasion:—"My dear Friend,—Once more have you held aloft our banner. At Munich, when Rheingold was produced, you did so by courageously refusing to conduct an imperfect performance; at present you have done so, by guiding safely into port my Lohengrin's skiff, past reefs and difficulties of all sorts. On German soil not a voice was heard agreeing with your courageous behavior; an incapable chief, and envious colleagues, impatient to obtain your place, lost no time in raising a cry of high treason, and an indolent public let them do as they chose. May the triumph achieved in the French language compensate you for your sad experience of your native land. I thank you with all my heart; and beg you will, moreover, particularly thank M. Louis Brassin, whose zeal and intelligence so admirably seconded you. Yours most cordially, RICHARD WAGNER. Lucerno, 28th March, 1870."—Hereupon the Berlin Echo observes: "Immediately after the first performance of Lohengrin, at Brussels, R. Wagner addressed to the conductor Herr Richter, who officiated on the occasion, one of his usual bombastic letters of thanks; and the recipient appears not to have lost an instant in publishing the defiant and inflated document, in honor (!) of himself and of its writer. It is, perhaps, no longer any use saying, compassionately, to the great Richard and his partisans: 'Si tacuisses,' when every one of their effusions surpasses the previous one—in impudence. We should not, however, be astonished if, on the first opportunity, the people at Munich prove they recollect the gentle and grateful manner in which they especially are mentioned in the letter."

After copying the above, the London Musical World adds:

The production of Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin at Brussels has established one fact that was not generally known, namely, that the capital of Belgium numbers fewer Jews, and is freer from Jewish influence than any other capital, except St. Petersburg and Moscow, in Europe. We always thought that Brussels could boast of as fair a share of members of the Israelitish persuasion, or, perhaps more, but we were wrong. The local press is almost unanimous in the favorable character of its criticisms on Lohengrin, and that would not be the case if the Jewish element predominated,—unless, indeed, Herr R. Wagner is not quite correct about all he says in his Judaism in Music. The idea however, of Herr R. Wagner's ever being mistaken is, of course, preposterous.

LEIPZIG. The programme of the last Gewandhaus Concert this season contained the following works: "Requiem eternam," from Cherubini's Requiem (in memory of Ignatius Moscheles); overture to Medea, Cherubini; air from Euryanthe, C. M. von Weber (sung by Herr Max Stagemann, from the Theatre Royal Hanover); "Mirjam's Siegesgesang," for soprano solo and chorus, Franz Schubert (scored by Franz Lachner; the solo sung, for the first time, by Mme. Peschka-Leutner); and Symphony, "Ah die Freude," in D minor, op. 9 (L. van Beethoven), the solos sung by Mme. Peschka-Leutner, Mlle. Minna Borée, Herren Rebling and Stagemann.—A rich merchant, Pierre Louis Sellier, has bequeathed 1,000 thalers to the Musicians' Pension Fund, and 500 to the Conservatory of Music.

The members of Riedel's Verein lately gave a fine performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, Op. 123. The solos were taken by Mme. Otto (soprano) from the Royal Opera house, Dresden; Mme. Krebs-Michalesi (contralto), Dresden; Herr Rebling (tenor), of the Leipzig Stadttheater; and Herr Vou Milde (bass), from Weimar. Herr David played the violin solo in the "Benedictus," and Herr Papier presided at the organ.

SALZBURG. At the last Museum Concert, Robert Schumann's complete music to Lord Byron's Manfred was performed for the first time in this town.

BRUNN.—Weinlich's "Lady Orchestra" ("Damen-Orchester") has been giving concerts with great success. The envious and malignant, that is to say: instrumental performers of the male sex who never drew themselves, hint that the nine young ladies constituting the "Orchestra" owe no small part of their triumph to their good looks. Well, what if they do? Why should not beauty be allied with an instrumental performance, just as much as fine scenery, on Herr Wagner's plan, with operatic singing?

CHARLES AUGUSTE DE BERIOT died Wednesday in Brussels. He was in his time one of the most admired violinists in the musical world. Born at Louvain in 1802, he was educated chiefly at Paris, and appeared at concerts in successful rivalry with the great Paganini. At that time the Belgium provinces were part of the Netherlands, and from the king De Beriot received a pension of two thousand francs, of which he was deprived by the revolution of 1830, which made Belgium an independent kingdom.

Six years after this he married Mme. Malibran, who was then at the height of her fame, and whose sudden death at Manchester occurred only a few months after her marriage. De Beriot subsequently became one of the leading instructors in the Paris Conservatory. As a composer, he is known by several concertos for the violin and operatic adaptations, and these are yet favorites with the leading violin virtuosos of the day.—Ecc. Post, April 20.

—The newly discovered compositions ascribed to Papa Haydn, of which mention has been made, are declared by M. André to be the work of his (André's) father, and not of the author of the Creation.

—Herr Lienau, of Berlin, has just published a comprehensive biography of C. M. von Weber, with a catalogue of and critical remarks upon his works. The author is Herr F. W. Jahns.

—Herr Joachim Raff has finished a new opera, "Dame Kobold," which is to be produced at Weimar.

—By special decree, Herr Eckert, chapel-master at the Court of Berlin, has been confirmed in his position for life.

—At the Theatre Lyrique two novelties will shortly be placed on the boards, Halévy's Charles VI., and Flotow's L'Ombre.

—A grand composition, entitled "Beethoven," by Abbé Listz, is announced for performance at the approaching Beethoven fetes in Weimar.

Here and There.

CAMBRIDGE. Miss Anna Mohlig had a Complimentary Concert at Lyceum Hall, in the old University town, on Friday evening, April 22, which gave great delight to a large and cultivated audience. Of course it is not necessary to tell how admirably the lady played, nor how finely Mr. Kreissmann sang to the nice accompaniment of Mr. Leonhard. This was the programme:

Sonata Appassionata (Op. 57).....Beethoven.
Cycle of Songs, "Dichterleben".....Schumann.
a. Impromptu in C sharp minor.....Chopin.
b. Nocturne in F minor.....Chopin.
c. "Soirées de Vienne".....Schubert—List.

Organ Prelude and Fugue, in G minor, arranged for the Piano-forte by List.....Bach.
Songs, a. "Am Meer".....Schubert.
b. "Aufenthalt".....Schubert.
"Traumewirren".....Schumann.
"La Campanella".....List.

A circle of music-lovers, college professors' families, &c., have been enjoying a series of Parlor Concerts by the Listemann Quartet Club. The programme of the third, April 12, was as follows:

Quartet in F major (Op. 41, No. 2).....Schumann.
Chaconne for Violin.....Bach.
With Piano accompaniment by Schumann.
Mrs. B. Listemann.

Adagio in G major.....Joachim Raff.
From the Quartet in D minor, Op. 77.
Quartet in A major, op. 18, No. 5.....Beethoven.

SALAM, MASS. The vigorous young Oratorio Society, conducted by Carl Zerrahn, which won such laurels by its performance of the "Messiah," will give "Elijah" on the 18th inst. The chorus numbers 250 fresh, sure voices; the orchestra will include some 30 of the best Boston musicians; and the principal solos will be sung by Mr. Whitney (as Elijah), Dr. Langmaid, Miss Houston and Mrs. Weston (sopranos), and it is hoped, Miss Antoinette Sterling, contralto.

NEW HAVEN, CONN. The "Elm City" has had a series of classical Chamber Concerts during the past season, wholly by resident artists, including a String Quartet composed as follows: Messrs. Edward Balck and Albert Mallon, violins; Bruno Pope, viola, and Morris Steinert, cello. Also for pianist, Miss Wilhelmina Ives; for singers, Miss Nellie Eastman, soprano, and Mr. J. Sumner Smith, tenor. Here are the first two programmes, which indeed speak well for musical taste in New Haven.

Feb. 17. Quartet in G, Mozart; Song: "I will extol Thee," from Costa's Eli; Sonata in B flat, op. 10, for piano and violin, Mozart, (Messrs. Steinert and Balck); Concerto in G minor, Mendelssohn (Miss Ives, with quartet accomp.); Song: "Hopes and Fears," Mendelssohn (Miss Eastmann); Piano Solo: Schumann's "Kreisleriana," No. 2, op. 10; Haydn's "Kaiser" Quartet (Adagio and Variations; Presto.)

March 3. Quartet in F, op. 18, No. 1, Beethoven; Air: "In native worth" from Haydn's Creation (Mr. Smith); Hymn from Stradella, cello solo (Mr. Steinert); Weber's Concertstück, piano, with quarter; Old English air: "Now Robin;" Fugue for piano, Handel; Adagio, from Quartet, op. 64, No. 3, Haydn.

One who was present writes us:

"The String Quartet although yet young, played well in the first concert. Miss Ives is a good pianoplayer, having a great degree of execution and good conception of classical concert playing. She is the daughter of Mr. W. Ives, an old music teacher of this city, and also his pupil. Mr. Balck, first violin, has lately arrived in our city; he is a pupil of Joachim, and perhaps one of the best solo violinists in this country. Miss Eastman has a pure, good soprano voice, and sings classical songs with good taste and intonation. The other members of the Quartet are old resident musicians and are old quartet players.

"I shall send you the next programme of the concert to take place Friday evening, March 18, when the great Schubert Quartet in D minor, and Spohr's Quintet for Piano with Strings, in E flat, will be formed."

PERTH AMBOY, N. J. We accidentally misplaced a couple of programmes of classical matinees (Feb. 12, and March 21) given by some of the foremost New York artists at the Raritan Bay Seminary for young ladies (Miss M. A. W. Manning principal) They are good enough to be put on record even now.

In the first, Beethoven's Sonata in A, op. 69, for piano and 'cello, was played by Mr. S. B. Mills and Mr. Bergner. Then followed: Cavatina from Maria di Rohan, by Mme. Selma Eckhardt; three Fantasiestücke by Schumann (Mr. Mills); Adagio from a Sonata for Violoncello (Mr. Bergner)—Song: "By rippling brook," Ganz; Piano Solos; Etude, Chopin, and "Fairy Fingers," Mills; "Reverie," composed and played by Bergner; Duet for two pianos on Oberon, Freyschütz and Preciosa, by Lysberg (Mr. Mills and Mr. F. M. Schneeweiss).

Second Concert. Schumann's Trio in F, op. 80 (Messrs. Mills, Theo. Thomas and Bergner); Tarantella (second), Mills; Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, piano and violin; Adagio from Golttermann's Concerto for Violoncello; Romanza from Chopin's E minor Concerto, and Valse: "Soirée de Vienne," after Strauss, by Tausig; Mendelssohn's C-minor Trio.

NEW YORK. Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given at Steinway Hall last Monday evening, by the Harmonic Society. We have had, within five months, from this Society alone, "Judas Maccabæus," the "Messiah," and "Elijah." We doubt whether the season is not too far advanced for the society to produce Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," as promised in their autumn circular. If we consider the great difficulties incurred in producing Oratorio here, and the great personal sacrifices of time and money which a small number of the members have to make, in order to keep the society alive, we must certainly concede that the Harmonic Society have done well, even if they do not perform Schumann's work. Nevertheless, the loss of that wonderful composition—so seldom heard here—is to be regretted. But to expect that a few men will tax their purses and brains in order to entertain unappreciative and ungrateful audiences with one of the highest of musical art forms, is out of the question. Judging from experience, we conclude that Oratorio is not congenial to the taste of New York audiences. Although nothing is more contrary to the true principle of Oratorio than the star singing system, the Society that undertakes Oratorio performances on its own resources will always lose, except, perhaps, with the "Messiah." These views were again justified when we saw the comparatively small paying audience that gathered in Steinway Hall last Monday. It must have been disheartening to the performers. The performance of "Elijah" was creditable, though some of the choruses lacked the requisite precision, spirit, and ensemble. In spite of the best efforts of the excellent musician and conductor, Mr. Ritter, the defect of insufficiently drilled chorus singers could not always be covered. We understand that in consequence of a succession of stormy Mondays—the day of the regular rehearsals—a majority of the members absented themselves.

Hence the bad effect of many of the chorus parts. One cannot help admiring the devotion, the iron perseverance, the enthusiasm with which Mr. Ritter pursues his task; but it might be wished, for his sake, that a more genial and appreciative material was placed at his disposal. The members of the Harmonic Society have themselves alone to blame, if their rendering of some of the choruses of "Elijah" was not up to the mark. Mrs. Hess, with her fine, fresh voice, and good method, is a decided acquisition to our local singers. Mrs. Barry, from Boston, who made her first appearance here, possesses a pleasing contralto voice, used with intelligence and expression. Mr. Simpson's singing, in this Oratorio, is well known. Mr. Becket's performance is not a proper subject for criticism, as he was unwell. Mr. Connolly presided at the organ.—Weekly Review.

PHILADELPHIA. The Post, April 8, speaking of Mr. Jarvis's Soirées, has the following remarks about Raff:

Raff is not to be classed with either Wagner or Liszt. He is not uninfluenced by them, but he rejects their eccentricities, clings to the old forms of treatment, but infuses into them the spirit of to-day. He is very dramatic, deals extensively in crescendo, abounds in climaxes, and is full of melody. He was for many years under Liszt's direct influence, as he was with him during the whole of the Weimar days as his secretary, and then first became known as a composer, but he seems to have kept his own character, and is himself. He now lives in Wiesbaden, and, free from all official duties, is occupied with his compositions, and is ranked as probably the most promising of the young German musicians. It would however be better for his reputation, if he wrote less, for his music is very unequal, and while some of it is of great value, and fully justifies all hopes of him, other compositions are in no manner remarkable. His first opera, "Dame Kobold," is to be brought out in Weimar this month. His orchestral and piano music is rapidly forcing its way in this country; the symphony No. 2, C major, has been given this winter in New York and Brooklyn, while his name frequently appears upon the concert programmes in solo, duet and trio compositions in those cities. In Philadelphia he is not so well known; but last winter Messrs. Wolfsohn and Colonne played a duet by him for the piano and violin that attracted great attention. Mr. Jarvis has this year given a trio, but the programme to-day will give us the most complete and satisfactory idea of his power we have yet had. It includes a piano solo, a duet for piano and violoncello, and trio for piano, violin and violoncello. The solo is a Valse Etude, and is a fine example of his concert music; it is very brilliant, effective, and being carefully written, with great regard to proper shading, demands, to do it justice, the artistic treatment we may expect from the performer. The duet is remarkably beautiful; the melody is striking, and the treatment of the two instruments highly dramatic. The trio will certainly please, and it is difficult to prophesy which of the four movements will be the most popular. All of the music is new, never having been given in the city before. The remainder of the programme is made up of a Romanza by Flotow, sung by Signor Barilli, and a Pologne by Wieniawsky for Mr. Kopta.

Here is Mr. Jarvis's 6th programme (April 18):
Sonata, F minor, appassionata, Op. 57.....Beethoven.
Charles H. Jarvis.
Fantaisie, Violin, Themes from Othello.....Ernst.
Wenael Kopta.
Piano Solo, Faust Valse.....Liszt.
Charles H. Jarvis.
Violoncello Solo, Adagio from Concerto.....Molique.
Rudolph Hennig.
Trio, G major, No. 2, Piano, Violin and Cello.....Raff.
Messrs. Jarvis, Kopta and Hennig.

The hall was uncomfortably crowded with an intelligent and appreciative audience. This was the forty-second soirée given by Mr. Jarvis in Philadelphia, and closed one of his most successful seasons. The performances of this gentleman are always of such a high order of excellence that criticism is likely to degenerate into enthusiastic praise.

There is such an immense and agreeable difference between the Sonata appassionata and the fustian Liszt affair, whose difficulties are appalling and its beauties few, that it is a sufficient indication of Mr. Jarvis's consummate skill to note his very satisfactory reproduction of each. It was only his modesty that prevented an encore of the last. The trio of Raff is a work of genuine merit, and abounding in beauties of the highest order; nothing can be more beautiful than the elaboration of the ideas in the Largo, which is full of a romantic beauty, but is, withal, a trifle too long. The whole composition, in fact, apparently lacks the virtue of condensation, a frequent fault of this composer. It was very carefully played.—Bulletin.

THE AMERICAN MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY, New York, announces its Annual Concert for the 21st of this month. The Grand Orchestra will be under the direction of Messrs. Carl Bergmann and Theodore Thomas. The Committee say in their appeal for aid:

The American Musical Fund Society was founded on the 16th of February, 1849. Its object is "the assistance of Members who are incapacitated by accident or sickness from pursuing their professional calling, for the relief or support of the Aged and the Widows and Orphans of deceased Members, and for the defraying of funeral expenses of Members, their wives and husbands respectively." Donations are frequently made to those who have no constitutional claims on the funds of this Society. The Membership consists of nearly 300. It dispenses at the present time weekly allowances to nineteen widows with fifteen children, and orphans. Four Members receive annual pensions of $250 each. There is an average of eight members who, being sick, receive each $5 per week. The following amounts have been paid for Relief, etc., during the period of the Society's existence—twenty-one years—viz.:
Weekly Relief for the Sick.....$16,152 69
Weekly allowances to Widows, Orphans, &c.....15,347 06
Funeral Expenses.....3,005 75
Pensions.....3,232 20

Music in Boston.

THE EASTER ORATORIOS. A great disappointment was it truly to very many earnest music-lovers that the Handel & Haydn Society, after encouraging the hope, and after several weeks of very interesting rehearsal, did not feel it in them, as the time drew near, to give us that long looked for first performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music, nor even of selections from it. We fear that boon is now postponed indefinitely, for next year comes the Triennial Festival, and Festivals are more attractive and absorbing to the mass of chorus singers than a long stretch of solid, earnest, quiet work upon a purely artistic task in which the labor is its own reward. Doubtless the Society decided wisely; the difficulties were too many for them, under the circumstances, and with so short a time for preparation. The Passion music ought to have a good year's study. Instead of that it was only taken up after Christmas, and with the plan of coupling with it a more familiar and popular Oratorio, which latter soon began to claim its half of each of the few Sunday evening rehearsals,—and who supposed the Passion music could be learned in one hour a week for ten or twelve weeks, with not a few stormy nights to keep more than half of the singers at home! Then there was the difficulty of finding the fit solo singers, with the rare art of recitative so all-important in this music. And then again the elements for the double orchestra, which it requires, were not to be got together on the evening assigned for it, that before Easter, since so many of the musicians were held to service in the theatres; and to have done it on Sunday would have been to sing the Crucifixion on the feast of the Resurrection. Still we cannot but regret that the Society lost, as it must seem to many, an opportunity of gaining for itself new character and strength, in not making it a point to give, now, on some evening before at least a number of the unspeakably beautiful Choral, three or four choruses ("Ye lightnings," the concluding chorus, full of heavenly peace, and one or two of the choruses with solo; besides some selections from the narrative Recitative for Tenor and Bass, which is so wonderfully expressive, and at least one Alto and one Bass Aria, which certainly was not impracticable).—We comfort ourselves with the conviction, that in those few rehearsals the seeds of a sincere, deep interest in the music were sown in the hearts of many of the singers and must some day bear fruit.

As it was—for so the fates would have it—somehow the life and hope of the past winter's Oratorio season seems to have nigh faded out with the last hope of the Passion Music. Three Oratorios only—the most familiar, oft-repeated three in the whole repertoire—make up the year's account. At Christmas the "Messiah," which of course always draws and always interests, (though the fact that it requires to be studied anew now every year, as much as it did thirty years ago, and so still consumes the first half of the winter's rehearsals, leaving the weary half for other study, does make it seem to stand considerably in the way of progress); and now, on the evening before Easter, the "Creation," the nearest to what may be called hacknied of all the Oratorios, followed on Easter evening by "Elijah." The latter work at least was pretty certain to be given well; and yet we are sorry to learn that the Society lost money by these two occasions more largely than they gained by the Messiah.

At the Saturday's performance ("The Creation") we were present only for a few minutes, enough to perceive that the orchestra was to some extent composed of make-shift materials, owing to the untoward circumstance already alluded to, and that the chorus was by no means strung up to its best. Miss J. E. Houston and Mr. M. W. Whitney of course delivered the soprano and bass solos very effectively; but the gentleman who undertook the tenor, though his voice has sweetness, and he sang intelligently, lacked power for so large a place. Indeed the general impression was that the performance was by no means up to the standard of the old Society. We cannot help thinking that the few Choruses and Chorales already rehearsed from the Passion, eked out with a Psalm or two of Mendelssohn, would have gone better, if only for the very reason of inspiring novelty. One cannot be always eloquent with an old story—while it is old; wait a year or two and the happy time may come for its revival,—a very different thing from listless repetition.

"Elijah," on the other, is still inspiring to all singers and all hearers. Coming on a Sunday night, it had the benefit of the accustomed orchestra in all parts; it had also been rehearsed with zeal; the choral ranks were fuller, the audience larger and more eager; and the result was one of the most satisfactory presentations on the whole, that we have yet had of this great work of Mendelssohn. Chorus, orchestra, great Organ (over which Mr. J. C. D. Parker presided), all moved with unity and good precision, and all the strong points told, while there was good light and shade. We recall no sense of unsteadiness anywhere except once or twice in the final, fugued, Amen chorus. We might add, too, that we have heard the grand rush of the violins in the "Rain Chorus" sound more startling and sublime than it did this time.

The central figure of the Prophet stood forth very nobly always both in the recitative and the Cantabile of Mr. WHITNEY, who took this all-important part for the first time. Certainly we have not heard so competent an Elijah here, if we except Herr Formes when he sang it the first time, in his better days. Much was expected of the new Contralto, Miss ANTOINETTE STERLING, from New York, but not more than was realized. This young lady, who some two or three years since sang once in a miscellaneous concert in our Music Hall, creating a sensation by the richness and the volume of her voice, has since enjoyed the best opportunities of instruction abroad, especially with Mme. Viardot Garcia, of whom she was a favorite pupil; and she had already achieved marked favor in concerts in Cologne and London. She delivered her sentences of recitative, as well as the two Arias that fall to the Contralto, and its share in the concerted pieces, with fine intelligence and with great power and fervor. All was simple, earnest and expressive, and the tones in themselves singularly rich and telling; each tone has its interesting shade of color. The higher tones, exceeding the strict Contralto register, vibrate with a clear and penetrating power, if not precisely sweet, yet not un-musical; while in a declamatory sense, they are used with marked significance. Miss Sterling's manner was easy, self-possessed and quiet, though she is capable of strong expression and shows high dramatic quality; and her whole appearance and performance seemed to indicate a generous, enthusiastic nature. Such an impression did she make with "O rest in the Lord," that the Air had to be repeated.

Miss Houston's clear and powerful Soprano more than held its own, telling with overpowering force sometimes, indeed so much so as to put it out of fair relation with the other voices in the Trio and Quartets. But some of her solos were admirably sung, and her whole performance was marked by the same conscientious care and fervor that have always distinguished her. Artistically, in economy of power, in certainty, and above all in even continuity of power, she has gained much. Mrs. J. W. Weston sang the smaller soprano parts, that of the Youth, &c., very acceptably; and Mr. Wm. J. Winc certainly showed no slight improvement both in voice and style in the tenor solos.

Miss ANNA MEHLIG's CONCERT, in the Music Hall, last Monday evening, may be considered the finale of our musical season. And a beautiful one it was, although, coming so late, it had not so large an audience as it deserved. For the charm of this lady's playing is always fresh; it never disappoints. This was the programme:

Trio in E flat, major, Op. 100.....Schubert.
For Piano, Violin and Violoncello.
Songs—
a. Für Musik..... b. Die Harpunde.....
c. Willkommen, mein Wald.....
Prelude and Fugue, in G minor.....S. Bach.
Arranged by Liszt.
Songs—
a. Morgenruss.....Mendelssohn.
b. Die Post.....Schubert.
Andante con Variazioni and Finale, from Sonata, Op. 47.....Beethoven.
Grande Polonaise in E flat.....Liszt.

This, to be sure, was a Chamber Concert in a vast hall, where the music would not have its best effect. All the more remarkable, therefore, that it did sound so well. Even the glorious Schubert Trio (played by Miss MEHLIG with Messrs. EICHBERG and A. SUCK) from first to last was ravishing to the thousand or more listeners; and the Andante and Finale from the "Kreutzer" Sonata were played to such perfection, with such fine feeling and expression, as to sound as good as new. But here, as everywhere, the Bach Prelude and Fugue, as rendered by Miss MEHLIG,—especially the Fugue—produced the great impression. Few had supposed that the Piano could do so much, or that a Fugue could be brought home to them as such "a thing of beauty" and of "joy forever." The Polonaise by Liszt, full of extravagances, yet curiously interesting, exhibited the young lady's power of execution in a most extraordinary light; it seemed a very miracle!

It is needless to say that the Songs found a true interpreter in Mr. KREISSMANN and met with warm response.

THE PUPILS OF THE GIRLS' HIGH AND NORMAL SCHOOL had a delightful hour with Miss MEHLIG, in Bumstead Hall, in the middle of a pleasant day about three weeks ago. We meant to have described it while the impression was fresh, but had no room. The arrangements had been admirably made by the School Committee, who with a few invited friends formed the only outside audience. The young ladies, under the guidance of their music teacher JULIUS EICHBERG, greeted their honored guest with a three part hymn by Mendelssohn and one or two other pieces, well sung with their fresh, pure voices; and she in turn played for them the Schubert Trio in E flat, with Messrs. EICHBERG and HEINDL, besides several solos of Chopin, Schubert, Liszt, &c. Plainly she never was so well pleased with her audience, and was inspired to do her very best. They covered her with flowers, in baskets and bouquets, not forgetting at the same time their teacher, Mr. Eichberg.

Meyerbeer.

With this name for a text, the Philadelphia City Item's "Our own Critic" thus belabors us for a comparison which we have never made.

Mr. Dwight, the editor of that interesting musical weekly, Dwight's Journal of Music, remarks in its last issue that Meyerbeer's Fackeltanz (No. 1, in B flat,) is inferior to one of Strauss' waltzes! This shows how far prejudice can carry a man. The Fackeltanz referred to is the first of four which Meyerbeer wrote for Berlin, where they were received with the utmost enthusiasm. As they belong to "out-door" music—that is music written for processions, (of which the "Torch Dances" constitute an old German custom,) they are scored with an eye for strong effect, and Meyerbeer has introduced into several of them solos for the trombone or bass tuba, which is certainly one of the most remarkable effects we have ever heard, and develops the resources of those comparatively limited instruments in a manner never before so successfully attempted by any composer, and is as characteristic in its way as the use Meyerbeer made of the weak middle notes of the Trombone in the Procession of Nuns in "Robert le Diable," which Berlioz mentions in his "Treatise on Instrumentation." The idea, then, of Mr. Dwight's comparing the Fackeltanz to Strauss' Waltzes, principally because of its tuba solo, is actually amusing. Mr. Dwight ought to (and does) know better—but we suspect that Mr. Dwight, who is an anti Wagnerite, is also an anti-Meyerbeerite, and with a great many Germans, is foolish enough to draw odious comparisons between Meyerbeer and Mozart or Beethoven, all of which is very naughty and unnecessary. Mozart and Beethoven belong to the past—the time of limited instrumentation and unrevealed dramatic effect, with which they struggled and with which they accomplished such wonders as "Don Giovanni" and "Fidelio." But Meyerbeer is King of the modern school. He has been accused of want of feeling, of moderate ideas, (1) of sacrificing everything for effect; Mendelssohn did not like him, and thought he could treat Luther's hymn better than the manner in which it had been elaborated in "The Huguenots"—yet he failed, and his "Reformation Symphony" contains nothing remarkable. "Robert le Diable" never could have lived so long and retained its great popularity if it had not been a glorious work—neither could "The Huguenots," or "Le Propheète," although the latter is inferior to them, or "L'Etoile du Nord," or "L'Africaine," or "Dinorah."

Although Meyerbeer should never have written comic operas, yet "Dinorah" is the work of a master. Nor must we omit the music to his brother's tragedy, "Struensee," which contains the finest overture which Meyerbeer ever wrote; next to it come the overtures to "Dinorah" and "L'Etoile du Nord." And now, pour finir, we should like Mr. Dwight to examine the remaining three of Meyerbeer's Fackeltänze before he compares them to Strauss' Waltzes, or pour s'amuser to glance at the "Overture in the form of a March," which was composed for the London Exposition in 1867, in which "Rule Britannia" is worked up in the form of a fugue. Ah, Mr. Dwight, you ought to be ashamed of yourself. Study Meyerbeer before you condemn him so flippantly; or, if you have done so—there is not only no excuse for your remarks, but you ought to be forgiven for not knowing any better. R. F.

We have not pronounced the Fackeltanz inferior to a Strauss waltz. We have not been so foolish as to think of comparing things so wholly unrelated. We were speaking of the Thomas Concerts and of the large space given in his programmes to things overstrained and noisy, and instancing Liszt's "Tasso," the "Carnival" of Berlioz, and finally the Fackeltänze of Meyerbeer. We thought it a wholesome sign that such things seemed to please only a small portion of a Boston audience; and we noticed further, as a matter of fact, that the Strauss waltzes,—light and unpretending things, but genial and spontaneous—were more welcome even to persons of serious taste. If the "Torch-Dances" were intended for "out-door" music, the Strauss waltzes were not, and, compared with the former, the latter are less disturbing to the harmonious impression of a concert partly classical.

Music in Dresden.

(The following extracts from private letters contain much that is fresh and interesting, in spite of some opinions which we of course do not endorse.)

de Saxe. Rollfuss, pianoforte; Seelman, violin; and Büchtl, cello. Programme was: 1. Trio in E♭ major for pianoforte, clarinet and viola, Mozart. 2. Sonata in A (op. 42) for pianoforte and cello, Carl Reinecke. 3. Sarabande, Bourrée and Corrente from 1st Sonata for violin alone, J. S. Bach. 4. Trio in B♭ major, (op. 97) Beethoven. Just the kind of playing that I enjoy. The Reinecke Sonata is full of fire; begins with a perfect storm of impetuosità in the cello. I should have enjoyed the last movement more if it had not been quite so like "All that hath life and breath" in the Hymn of Praise. The Bach pieces were grand; played as well as can be expected from any but a remarkable virtuoso. The "Corrente" was perfectly irresistible in its fiery impetuosity. The audience was enthusiastic over it. The Trio of Trios, op. 97, was played with great expression throughout, and I enjoyed it as I enjoy hardly anything else in all music. The last presto was perhaps a little wanting in élan, but the fault may have been in me; I am hard to please in last movements. These Germans play throughout with much greater intensity of expression than we are accustomed to in Boston. They, as — used to say, "howl more" than we do. I for one like it, though it takes one aback a little at first. The violinist was perfectly ferocious in the last part of the Bach piece, and it was impossible not to be carried along with him.

If Listemann in Boston is so anxious to play pieces of the Pyrotechnic School, he had better take some of these Bach solos; they are as difficult and in a certain sense as showy as the Ole Bull monstrosities, and have the inestimable advantage of having some music in them, which little article Ole Bull seems to have forgotten to flavor his compositions with (excuse the term as applied to Ole Bull's productions). The more I hear of Bach, the more I feel how great genius knows neither time nor space; his writings are for the most part in now obsolete forms, but you feel at once that he is the equal of any of the composers that have come after him. He was, like Wagner, an artist writing, not for the public of his or any generation, but following out his own artistic ideal as he thought it should be followed out. When great genius is as true to itself as that, its production will never grow old or antiquated. The old fellow must have had a monstrous technique, for his music is difficult enough for any body.

Last evening I heard "Lucia" for 7 1-2 ngr. and enjoyed it ever so much; it is the first bit of Italian music I have heard for a long time. With all his great beauties Donizetti does not seem to me to have the sustained power that Verdi has; he drops his good things too quickly. There is no reason why a thing like the Sextet: "Chi mi frena" should not last 20 minutes at the very least. He seems to know what to do with his melodies still less than Weber; he begins in the most grand style, but after the first two or three phrases he appears to find himself in a muddle and has to begin his coda before he has really settled down into his air. Now Verdi often gets into what might be called a "working out vein," as for instance in the opening chorus and the great quintet in his Nabucco, and in the final trio in Ernani. It is true his working out often is nothing more than prolonging to undue proportions what is properly the coda to his piece, as in the "O sommo Carlo" in Ernani; yet he does manage to make his piece last long enough to produce some effect. Perhaps the grand recitative and duet: "Donna, chi sei?" in Nabucco is one of the very best pieces of writing in all Verdi. Donizetti has done much better in Lucia than in Lucia in this respect, but he has been very happy in his themes in Lucia. "Chi mi frena," the mad scene, and the final tenor air redeem the opera from a deal of sleepy stuff that comes between. I think in general the beauty in Donizetti's airs is of rather a cold, unsympathetic kind; he very rarely has the depth of feeling and tenderness of Bellini or the grandeur or passion of Verdi. I hinted as much one day to Mme. Garcia in Paris; she said she thought so too: "Mais il écrit admirablement pour la voix," and then added, "Enfin, je vois que vous aimez beaucoup Verdi, n'est ce pas?"—which soft impeachment I pleaded guilty to. The performance last evening was very fair. The Germans act a little too naturally for the libretto and the music, and they don't quite give the right sort of climax in many places. The mad scene, though, was most beautifully sung and quite well acted. The last air was a little "too many" for the tenor, but he tried hard, to say the least. The Sextet fell very flat indeed. The recitatives were in general the best part of the performance.

10½ P.M.

I have just come from "Lohengrin." The performance was quite good considering the disadvantage we labor under here. Old Tichatscheck does not look one's ideal of the Knight of the Holy Graal, but he is not so bad for over sixty. The Elsa was also not quite as good in point of outward appearance as could have been desired, but she did not sing badly. The Ortrud was simply splendid; her acting, singing whole performance was A—1. I don't know who she was, as I did not indulge in the luxury of a playbill. The scene between her and Friedrich at the beginning of the 2nd act was one of the finest pieces of acting I have ever seen on any stage; the scene is to me one of the best in the opera, full equal to Tannhäuser's "Erzählung" (narration) in the third act of Tannhäuser. This recitative is better than a great many airs that some operas base their reputation on. It is long, but I was sorry when it was over, even though Elsa's beautiful evening song immediately followed. Ortrud's acting in the following scene with Elsa was great. Her gradually edging up to Elsa, and getting nearer and nearer as a snake does, without apparently taking any steps, and at last seizing her by the wrist with the devil himself looking out of her eyes, was most splendidly done. The famous procession to the Cathedral was taken too fast, as were some of the pianissimo choruses in the first act. The orchestra was also too small to give it its full effect. The chorus really accompanies the orchestra instead of the orchestra accompanying the chorus, and 15 or 20 violins more or less make a great difference in the effect. The intermezzo of dance music between the 2nd and 3d acts is wonderful. I only knew it before from the piano score and was agreeably surprised by it. Old Tichatscheck did himself quite "proud" in the bridal chamber scene, and in many places sang really beautifully. Ah! Vedi Nupoli e poi mori. Hear that duet and then die! Tichatscheck's voice is not up to the famous Erzählung in the last scene; his singing of the beautiful "Kehrt er dann heim," when he gives Elsa the horn, sword and ring, was also not quite up to the mark. The chorus was very good throughout; the thing that was the least well given was the quintet and chorus in the first act: "Mein Herr und Gott." It is very difficult, but also very fine, and ought to have been better sung. Tichatscheck's acting is only to be equalled by Brignoli's! But then Lohengrin only pretty well given is better than no Lohengrin at all. I would not have missed the first and second scenes in the 2nd act and the bridal chamber scene for a good deal.

I must say that I begin to feel that the days of the conventional Opera are numbered.[!] It is the fashion to say, when anybody praises Wagner, "Look at Don Giovanni," and to condemn him as a quack or a madman because he can't (or is supposed not to be able to) write as fine music as Don Giovanni contains. Grant, for the sake of argument, that he can't; I for one am not by any means prepared to say that he can, but I do think that there is something in Wagner that will drive Don Giovanni off the stage.[!] Not for some time yet, as there is a great deal that will have to leave the boards before Don Giovanni goes, but I truly believe that the time will come when not even the Don Giovanni music will float an Opera, that is, an opera in contradistinction to a Musical Drama. Don't for a moment suppose that I think Don Giovanni will ever die. I think that it will live in the concert room as a cantata, just as many of Handel's operas have lived as oratorios long after they had been taken off the stage. This is great heresy, I am aware. [Yes, verily, young friend; but you'll outgrow it!—ED.]

Sunday, 10.30 A. M.

Buon giorno! Cloudy still and the Altmarkt white with snow. The plotting scene between Ortrud and Friedrich still keeps whirling about in my head so that I can hardly think. It looked out of all my arpeggios this morning, and I dreamt of it last night, and the more I think of it the more splendid I think it. The only thing I ever heard that comes up to it is the recitative: "Già fu alquanto avanza la notte" and the following aria: "Or sai chi l'onore" in Don Giovanni; that scene is to me by far the finest, dramatically, in Mozart's opera. There he really seems to have had a presentiment of the Zukunft; he made the old recitative form do its utmost. The scene in Lohengrin can hardly be called a recitative, it is a musical dialogue in which you almost forget that the actors are singing, so naturally do they talk. They never have to wait for the orchestra to get through a passage before they begin a sentence. The orchestra keeps on accompanying their thoughts rather than their musical phrases, but never for one moment obstructs the dramatic action. The orchestra seems to make their state of mind perceptible to the senses; you don't feel like asking whether there is any theme, or melody or working out about it, any more than J. R. Lowell said one feels like asking the Venus of Milo whether she had any "views." You accept it as a whole without analyzing. As a perfect whole it must of course admit of logical analysis, but as an artistic whole it does not force the why and the wherefore down your throat, but only gives you the one impression in all its unity until you set to work yourself to analyze it. It truly is, as Wagner has claimed for it, the drama plus the power of expression that music gives, not Music and the Drama walking side by side, each losing a little of its own individuality that it may agree tolerably well with the other and not quarrel. Two things cannot occupy the same place, though one may be animated by the spirit of the other. Music in its entirety and drama in its perfection cannot be forced into the same space; the form of music must be given up or else the form of the drama, or else both must give up something of their form. This last is done in the conventional "Opera." You have the perfect Music in the arias and concerted pieces, though without any really dramatic action; you have the dramatic part in the recitatives; but in the Musical Drama you have the dramatic action all through, animated by the spirit of music. This is as it should be, for on the stage the dramatic part should always be of the first importance. In the Cantata we have things reversed. There we have "Dramatic Music," that is, Music in its perfection, animated by the spirit of the drama. I do not mean to say that the great composers of operas, such as Gluck, Mozart, Weber, &c. have followed out the principle of the "Opera" to its fullest extent. Gluck saw the ridiculousness of that in the Handel operas, and began the reform. Ever since that day the Opera has gradually become more dramatic until we have the perfect musical drama. Lohengrin and Tannhäuser are by no means entirely Musical Dramas; there is much that is operatic in both of them, and they are called "Opera" on the title page. In "Tristan und Isolde" and the "Meistersinger" we have the pure Musical Drama. Here music is the servant of the text throughout; it loses nothing in dignity by the service, and adds much to the dramatic power of the piece, instead of detracting from it.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Gates Ajar. Song, (with Quartette ad lib.)
3. C to c. J. R. Thomas. 40

"Gone beyond the darksome river;
Only left us by the way;
Gone beyond the night forever,
Only gone to endless day."

Every song by the most popular ballad writer in America, is sure to be pleasing.

What do the angels dream of, mother? 3. Eb to f. Gounod. 30

"What do the angels dream of, mother?
What do they dream in their sleep at night?
When they come home, and their wings are folded,
Weary with many a starry flight."

A semi-sacred song, easy and sweet.

Over the heath. Ballad. 3. Eb to e flat. Turner. 30

"Over the heath, where the rose used to bloom, Withers a beautiful bud in the tomb."

Down Daisy Path. 4. G to g. Lyle. 30

A ballad in the Scotch style.
"A down the Daisy Path I sped,
With footsteps light and free;
Where stars a soft radiance shed,
He waited there for me."

Broken Down. Serio-comic Song, 2. E to c. Clifton. 30

"Once I'd money plenty,
And friends too by the score,
Then fortune smiled upon me
And no one passed my door."

Celebrated Echo Song. 5. D to a. Bishop. 40

With an ad lib. Flute Accompaniment.

Cherubim Prayer. Quartet. 4. D to f. Bortianskago. 35

This effective piece, without accompaniment, arranged by Slaviansky, was sung by the Russian Troupe at their popular concerts, and apart from the concert-room is a very appropriate piece for church-use when well rendered by a quartet choir.

Instrumental.

Fête Hongroise. Caprice Brilliant. 4. Db. Leybach. 50

Op. 26.
A moderate movement in 2-4 time, with a very marked rhythmic accent.

Claudine. Polka Mazurka. 3. C. Arnold de Thier. 35

Easy to execute at sight.

Books.

CLARKE'S SHORT VOLUNTARIES FOR THE PIPE OR REED ORGAN. Wm. H. Clarke.

Boards, 1.50

A collection of easy and pleasing gems for soft and expressive stops for opening service and responses, the arrangement of keys being such that a longer voluntary may be obtained by the addition of the piece on the opposite page.

All the notes throughout may be reached with the fingers alone, without the use of the pedals (which may be introduced at the option of the Organist.) Players who have only Reed Organs will appreciate this arrangement. To those who have examined the "New Method for Reed Organs," this work will need no farther recommendation.

ORGANIST'S PORTFOLIO. Vol. 2. C. F. Rimmbault. Boards, 3 00

Cloth, 3.50

A series of Voluntaries, selected from the works of Ancient and Modern Composers. The first volume has proved a favorite with organists.

WINNER'S DANCE MUSIC FOR FLUTE AND PIANO. 75

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

The Foundations of our Present Music.

A Lecture delivered before the Pupils of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music,

BY G. A. SCHMITT.

(Concluded).

Under these influences of the Déchant, of the music of the Trouvères and of the Folksong, both the latter of which united time with rhythm, the Church at last adopted the mensural note, the nota mensurala, the note which expressed time.

Franco, of Cologne, who lived in the beginning of the 13th century, is the first writer who lays down the rules of the new notation. It might seem as if all the difficulties had now been surmounted. Now time could be measured, the three or more parts knew exactly when to change their tones, and music could now begin in good earnest. But the wisdom of those speculative monks hit upon an expedient to make exceedingly difficult of attainment and intricate, what seemed so simple and so near at hand, an accurate subdivision of time. To us, now-a-days, it seems an absolute necessity to divide a whole into halves and quarters, &c. Not so to them. To them it seemed the more natural way to divide a whole into three parts. And so they did. One whole note with them had three third-notes, and that they called modus perfectus,—the perfect mode. Now, as long as their music was written in three-four, or three-two time as we would call it, all went very well; but when the melody was written in a measure divisible by two, how then? One whole note always meant three smaller ones; so it took two whole notes to make three measures of two-two time, or four whole notes to make three measures in four-four time. That division of time they called modus imperfectus,—imperfect mode. And imperfect enough it was. Still, what with constant counting, by dint of hard calculation while singing, they managed to get along well enough. "Every where man has advice; nothing finds him without counsel," the Greek poet says, even twenty-two hundred years ago. And so these singers were no without counsel. Only it was very hard work, and many a young lady, who with difficulty now unravels the mysteries of quavers and crotchets, and semi and demi-semi quavers, would give up in despair were such calculations presented to her as the singers had to master six hundred years ago. It was not until 1400 that the white note, square, where it is round with us, but of similar value and meaning, was introduced.

Now the way was smooth, and quickly arose upon the Foundations of the Gregorian Chant and the Folksong, aided by the staff of four lines, measured by the mensural note, stirred into beautiful variety by the Déchant and the Counterpoint, that earnest, sublime and beautiful song of the Netherlands. Now in Flanders and in Holland, one after another, those glorious masters of music lived and worked, who, beginning with Willem Dufay (born in 1380), to Orlando Lasso (died in 1594), in uninterrupted succession filled two hundred years with undying song. There, under that leaden sky, were born and brought up such masters as Johannes Okeghem, Josquin des Prés. From there they were called as singers, as music teachers, as chapel-masters, to the Papal court and to all the art-loving courts of Italy and Germany and France; until finally the mantle of their greatness was laid upon one greater than all: the divine master Pierluigi da Palestrina.

When we consider that only in the thirteenth century Franco of Cologne established the principal law of all harmony: that a consonance is produced by the simultaneous sounding of two tones which please the ear; that dissonances are two tones sounding together which displease the ear, and that it is sweet to have a dissonance followed by a consonance,—when we consider that this law, which made true harmony possible, lays down the axiom most important in our music: that all dissonances must be prepared and resolved, and when we consider that but little more than a century had elapsed before Willem Dufay and Josquin des Prés and Okeghem created wonderful works, soul-stirring, heart-moving now and forever, then we cannot help admiring the strength and scope of the human mind, which, when once in possession of the means and instruments to work with, at once strives upward to ideal elevation, leaving far below the noise and turmoil of every day life, and building its habitation among the ever shining stars.

In glancing back, it strikes us as remarkable that two out of the three great theorists, to whom the foundations of our present music owe their strength, were born on the Lower Rhine, in the Low Countries. For, though Franco was born in Cologne, the people there and the Netherlands are of the same branch of the German nation. It is remarkable that for two centuries the musical life of the Occident, of western Europe was fostered almost exclusively by these same Netherlands. Then with Palestrina the glory of being high-priests to the Beautiful was transferred to the Italians, with whom even our Mozart studied and from whom he learned, until in our present day the Germans have produced those immortal masters, Mozart and Beethoven and all the others.

We must not omit to mention at the close of our lecture once more that greatest master of counterpoint, Johann Sebastian Bach, in whom that first period of music, the contrapuntal period, reached at once its culminating point and its end.

And if I may be permitted to add a wish as the expression of an individual desire and longing, it is this, that the Conservatory, before whose friends and pupils I have the honor to speak, may continue to emulate a love for the best music, so that we may soon hear in these rooms some of Bach's Motets, or Choruses from his Passion-music, or his Christmas Oratorios. It would be carrying the privilege of wishing too far, I am afraid, were I to add the fervent wish that, after Bach had been unearthed, as it were, and made familiar, that we might then enter upon the legacy which Orlando Lasso and Palestrina left us, by their numerous masses and other compositions; that we might then hear for the first time, in this our goodly city, those immortal works which moved men to the very depths of their hearts three hundred years ago.

A New Biography of Liszt—Sketch of His Remarkable Career.

[Correspondence of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.]

ROME, Italy, March 11, 1870.—A new biography of Liszt has just appeared, translated from the German. But we in our day can hardly have a true life of this remarkable man. We may have exact dates as to his birth; when he composed this or that piece; but the events of his singular and romantic career can hardly be told while he is alive, and he looks as vigorous as if he might live some thirty years more. The private life of an artist who had royal princesses for the mothers of his children could hardly have a correct account of it written during his lifetime. What a career he has had! His reputation began when he was only fourteen. Precocity of genius is more common among musicians than among literary or scientific men. There are exceptions—Pascal, for example, who, at fourteen, "invented mathematics," as his father expressed it, and arrived at the 32d proposition of the first book of Euclid without ever having seen Euclid, just as Mozart composed a symphony in his boyhood.

Liszt's success was so great in Germany when he was only fourteen, that Adam Liszt, his father, like the elder Mozart, took his wonderful son to Paris. As they had a powerful letter from Prince Metternich, to Cherubini, they counted much upon his protection. Cherubini was then the Director of the French musical Conservatory, which he (Cherubini) had just established in Paris under the patronage of Louis XVIII., and had made it the leading establishment in Europe.

Strangely enough, Cherubini received the father and son very coldly. Adam Liszt had the boy subjected to a rigorous examination before Cherubini, Paër, and all the great artists in Paris. It was not only satisfactory, but the audience expressed surprise and admiration. Notwithstanding, Cherubini refused to admit young Liszt into the Conservatory, on the ground that he was a foreigner! Cherubini himself was an Italian. The biographer thinks the reason of this strange coldness was jealousy. This could hardly have been the cause. There must have been something in the manner of the boy which made him antipathetic to Cherubini. The biographer says: "Precocious talents always give offence to talents on the decline." Precocious talents are apt to make children very disagreeable and presumptuous. There is always a consciousness of superiority about a prodigy, which is offensive and rouses one's antagonism. I fancy this was the reason of Cherubini's indifference. Cherubini ought, however, to have been more forbearing, for he had memories of mortification which troubled his youth. The first Napoleon treated him disdainfully. But in resenting unconsciously his own wrongs on his successors, he only followed out the instinct of the old Adam which is in all of us, and which Sheridan hit off so capitably in The Rivals.

"Sir Anthony rates master," cried the servant, "master abuses me—I'll go and kick Boots."

But time makes amends for all wrongs, if we could only wait patiently. Louis XVIII. rewarded Cherubini for all he had suffered; and the very Conservatory whose doors were closed on Liszt so insultingly in his youth is only too happy to accept any applicant, on any terms, rigorous as are its rules, at a simple request from Liszt;—this I know to be a positive fact. Liszt has less of this vindictiveness of matured reputation than most distinguished men; he does not resent the wrongs of youth on younger artists. 'Never was there a kinder man than Liszt to unacknowledge and aspiring talent in man or woman. So kind is he, that he is apt to be deceived, and to accept the false for the real in his desire to give encouragement.

Faër and Reicha, who were present at the examination of young Liszt, interested themselves in his affairs, and not only gave him good counsel but efficient service. The gifted boy was soon brought out by the "best society" of Paris. Indeed, like Mrs. Jarley, Liszt has always been the pet of the "nobility and gentry," and royalty has done more than smile on him. He was presented to King Louis XVIII. and to the royal family. The Duke of Orleans, Louis Philippe, took him under his especial protection.

We have all heard of some mysterious event which produced a sad effect on Liszt in his youth. He had a dangerous illness; indeed his death was reported throughout Paris. The biographer says it was an unfortunate love affair, which nearly ruined him, as a similar one we now know hastened Keats's death. But Liszt was made of stronger stuff than the young English poet who said so sadly, "The very thing which I want to live most for will be the great occasion of my death." Love, which was such a tragedy to Liszt's youth, became the gay comedy of his manhood, and, like Goethe, he bids fair to play the gay Lothario into his old age. The biographer does not give the name of the cause of Liszt's tender trouble, the "soft impeachment," nor does he give the reasons for the separation. The affair is wound up tantalizingly with these commonplace words:—"Insurmountable obstacles opposed their happiness." Liszt's strange conduct, after his recovery, is well known. He fled from the world, gave up his music entirely, occupied himself in works of charity and pious reading. Like the little girl in Punch, he found his doll stuffed with bran and wanted to be a nun.

Paganini it was who drew him out of this morbid retirement into the world. The great violinist exercised a powerful influence, in many ways, over the young man. Then followed a brilliant career, unparalleled in the history of artists; for even Raphael had not such social success—such bonnes fortunes, as the French express the sort of admiration that was given to Liszt. It was a peculiar epoch in Europe; music reigned triumphant; a concert or a play was an event, and occupied as much place in minds and thoughts as politics do now.

It is a remarkable fact, too, that many leading statesmen of Europe, in the present day, are fine musicians. Music and statesmanship seem to go hand-in-hand, especially in England and France. Emile Ollivier—whose first wife, by the way, was Liszt's daughter—not only plays well on the violin—so a friend of Liszt tells me—but has composed some fine concertos for that instrument. Richard, Minister of Foreign Affairs in the French Cabinet, is also a musical virtuoso. Through Richard's influence, Balfe has been named by the Emperor of France Knight of the Legion of Honor. And Mr. Gladstone, the English Premier, is a well-known amateur.

To return to Liszt's young manhood. Paris had at that time a perfect constellation of musical celebrities, such as are rarely assembled at one period. Just run over in your memory a few names. Besides Liszt and Paganini, there were the composers Rossini, Spontini, Donizetti, Bellini, Meyerbeer, Auber, Halévy, &c.; the singers Malibran, Grisi and Persiani, Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache, Mario, &c. Every night some new masterpiece of composition or execution was heard. Music turned all brains. Young girls abandoned their homes, wives their husbands and families, to follow celebrated pianists or violinists. Beautiful and noble women—women of the highest rank—used to steal Liszt's gloves, cut them up into strips, and with the cherry-stones they took from his plate after a supper or dinner, make necklaces and armlets, which they would wear on their handsome throats and arms with more pride and exultation than they did their family diamonds. A pretty set of unprincipled, ill-regulated fools, to be sure! "That time is over and will never return." For the honor of womanhood it is to be hoped not. Delatry, a clever musical writer, in a late article of his, when speaking of this very period, says: "Liszt is one of the rare survivors of this marvellous epoch. He is in the prime of life: in the full possession of his talents. There is still the same fire, the same verve, and the same spirit. Liszt is still young in heart and genius.

"I have applauded Liszt at Paris, Dresden, Berlin, Basle and St. Petersburg during the most brilliant phase of his artistic career. In 1862 I met him again at Rome. He lived in the Via Sistini, in the apartment that was formerly occupied by Leopold Robert, the graceful creator of the Moissons (Harvesters). He had in his salon a wretched spinnet, which his magical fingers transformed into an Erard piano. He selected me sometimes for the happy confidant of his thoughts and inspirations. His servant had orders not to let any one enter, and there, in the little but very comfortable parlor, I have passed long mornings or long evenings, which I found always too short, listening to 'Naples and Venice,' the 'Sistine Chapel,' 'St. Francis walking on the Waves,' the 'Source,' 'Ave Maria,' 'St. Elizabeth,' and other works of the master, even as he created them.

"Once seated at his instrument, he could not be drawn away from it. When he had exhausted his own repertoire he seized on Beethoven, Schumann and Chopin, three of his favorite authors. Beethoven and Schumann are to him the Dante and Goethe of music; Chopin, the Schiller. With each master he changed style and coloring. He was terrible, and sometimes even savage in Beethoven, for he interpreted freely the last compositions of this master, which are so profound and intricate. When playing Chopin's music he was soft and plaintive—especially in the Nocturnes, whose tender notes recall the fable of the song of the Swan. When the great artist, fatigued in soul and brain more than in back and hands, rose up from the piano, great drops of sweat stood on his deeply furrowed brow."

Liszt is nearly through his winter's work—the music for the great Beethoven festival. In a few weeks he will leave the Villa d'Este, near Tivoli—his friend Cardinal Hohenlohe's place, and return to Rome for a short time previous to his leaving for Germany. Sgambati intends then to give a grand classical concert, at which his celebrated master will be present. Hans von Bulow and Carlo Ducci give a fine concert at Florence the 14th of this month. I met Carlo Ducci in Naples in 1857, when he was quite a young man; he was very handsome, and played remarkably well. He has now quite a reputation in Italy.

ANNE BREWSTER.

Easter Services in Rome.

THE MISERERE.—PALESTRINA'S MUSIC.—THE DISPLAY ON EASTER.—SGAMBATI'S CONCERT.

The same lady writes under date of April 21:

Easter passed off finely. The Miserere, as sung in St. Peter's, surpassed by expectation. I heard them last year in the Sistine Chapel. The surroundings of that famous old chapel, of course, add a great deal to the effect of every service performed in it; but there is something sublime in the impression produced by the grand ecclesiastical music of Palestrina and the composers of his school when heard under the vast dome and huge naves of St. Peter's.

On Holy Thursday Allegri's Miserere was sung; this is considered the best. Bai's and Bainsi's were sung on Wednesday; Mustafa's on Friday. The Lamentations, by Palestrina, were sung each day. On Holy Thursday I was lucky enough to reach St. Peter's in time to secure a seat on the top bench of the Grand Penitenciar's chair, which was not only favorable for hearing, but, as it overlooked the crowd, and was only a few steps from the Baldachino, it commanded a view of the interesting ceremony of purification of the High Altar, which took place after the Miserere was finished. Usually the Grand Penitenciar sits in his chair on Holy Thursday, but this year, as the Tenebre were sung near the High Altar of St. Peter's instead of in the Sistine, Cardinal Panbianca, who is the Grand Penitenciar, sat in one of the side chapels of the south nave. The chair stands against one of the sides of that large colossal pier of the dome, in the niche of which is placed the St. Veronica statue. Every step and available ledge of this huge chair was filled. It looked like a great honey-pot swarming with flies.

When the Miserere of Allegri was written, it was considered so fine, so perfect, that it was decided no others should be composed; it should be the Miserere par excellence. But after a while the prohibition was set aside, and now every Roman chapel-master composes a Miserere. These which are sung during Holy Week, at St. John of Lateran, are often compositions by the chapel-master of that church and other modern writers; they attract large crowds, and some visitors stoutly maintain the heresy that they are finer than those sung by the Papal Choir, which are the orthodox old ones.

Music, after all, is a thing of habit and taste for the majority, more than of education. Ecclesiastical music of the Palestrina period and style requires not only culture for its appreciation, but a peculiar kind of culture. The listener must be familiar with the music and know something of the age in which it was written. It is very unlike any music to which modern ears are accustomed; it has neither melody nor rhythm, and little expression, so far as the meaning of the words go; and yet the general expression is fuller and richer than in any modern music. It is remarkable for noble, dignified simplicity; the chords move along grandly; the figured parts cross and recross in a most marvelously complicated way, and yet there is no confusion. It addresses itself more to our thoughts than senses, and is strictly devotional.

This style of composition, however, is a music of the past; it can never be revived in our day, except as a curious remnant or relic of a religious age which seems almost gone. Like the language of the church to which it belongs, it is almost a dead tongue. The musical school which has produced it requires studies of stronger, more earnest discipline than pupils are willing now to give, because they are not especially pleasing—studies of phraseology, intonation and vocal mechanism. Certain parts of this music also were composed for voices of an exceptional and rare nature, and if sung by voices of another character the effect of the music is not the same. This kind of voice is growing more and more uncommon; thus every year is lessening the life of this music. In fifty years, probably in less time, the very tradition of it may be lost.

Music alla Palestrina sounds as old to the ears as the Pope Pascal I. mosaics or the paintings of Simone Memmi and artists anterior to Perugino look to the eyes, and yet it is not so very ancient. Jean Pierluigi, known as Palestrina, was born in 1523 and died in 1594. His best and most celebrated works were written between 1555 and 1571. Allegri, whose Miserere is so famous, was born in 1560, and died in 1652. He was of the same family as Correggio. The great painter, however, had been dead twenty-six years when his musical kinsman was born, for Correggio's period, it will be remembered, was from 1494 to 1534.

Avila, whose choruses of the Passion are celebrated, and which are sung at St. Peter's on Palm Sunday, lived at the end of the sixteenth century. In 1580 he wrote his Office of the Holy Week. He was a Spaniard; his true name was Vittoria. His music is sometimes attributed to him under his family name—sometimes under that of his birthplace, Avila. His motets, which are beautiful, are sung at St. Peter's all through the year, and a Credo by him is very fine.

Thus from these dates it will be seen that the classical period of religious music was long after the corresponding one of painting. The most brilliant epoch of painting can be considered as embraced between the birth of Leonardo da Vinci, in 1452, and the death of Titian, in 1576. Ecclesiastical music had its birth just as the great epoch of painting was closing. Bai and Bainsi, whose church music is also much admired by the Palestrina devotees, lived nearer our own times. Bai was chapel-master of St. Peter's in 1713. Bainsi was born in 1775, died in 1844, and was chapel-master twenty-five years. He was the master of Mustafa.

Bainsi was a remarkable man; he was devotedly attached to old ecclesiastical music; searched out numberless treasures among the piles of ancient music collected in the archives of the Sistine, St. Peter's, St. John of Lateran, &c. Bainsi, also wrote a long, laborious life of Palestrina, which is a mine of information to the reader who may be curious for that port of musical knowledge. This book is now out of print, and very difficult to obtain. Sgambati, the celebrated Roman pianist, friend and pupil of Liszt, owns a copy; to his courtesy I am indebted for this book, which has been of great service to me.

Easter Sunday ceremonies, benediction and cupola illumination were, as usual, very fine. Monday night there were superb fireworks on the Pincian hill. Through the kindness of Lanciani's sister, Countess Vespignani, I had a seat in her private loggia. Her husband designed the main piece, a representation of the New Jerusalem, as described by St. John in the Apocalypse. Then there were magnificent pyrotechnic displays of the most brilliant kind. Last evening the city was illuminated. Many of the designs were similar to those of last year. One of the most effective, and at the same time the most simple, was the Pantheon. A huge cross blazed in front of the bronze door, and the whole space inside of the pillars of the façade was illuminated with Bengal lights. The foot of the Ripetta was like a fairy scene. On the opposite side of the Tiber there was a temple of fire with a Virgin enshrined in it; and the little streamers, hung with large parti-colored lamps, went up and down the stream; every little while Bengal lights threw the most magical light over river, shore, little fleet, buildings and trees. The Ripetta or Scrofa (for the street which leads down on the right from the Porte del Popolo has both names) was brilliantly illuminated its full length, with every imaginable design and religious emblem; and from time to time, at various points, Bengal lights and fireworks flashed out.

The Fountain of Trevi was one of the handsomest points. Bengal lights made this superb façade of sculpture and water look like some enchanted spot. Every Piazza had its attraction. The main streets of Rome are famous for their fine architectural terminations; at each end there is an obelisk, a column, a gateway, or remarkable building. Last evening these were each and all outlined and studded with lamps. The obelisk and columns towered up and seemed to tremble and vibrate in the night sky, as the wind agitated the flames of the lamps. The Spanish steps leading up from the Piazza di Spagna were more than beautiful; the steps were blazing with light from base to summit; each broad stone stair hung with lamps, and on top, in front of the Trinità del Monte Church, the obelisk of red granite which used to stand in the Circus of Sallust was one solid shaft of flame. The Pope went through the city and enjoyed the fine show as much as we did. The Piazza of St. Peter, the obelisk and colonades were gemmed with lights. Bengal lights gave a superb effect to the architecture and fine fountains.

Yesterday was a very rich day to some of us. In the afternoon Sgambati gave one of his delightful classical matinées. He played the Sonata Appassionata for one of his solos. He and Pinelli played Schumann's Grande Sonate, opus 44, piano and violin. His other solos were Liszt's Etude, 23, and Scherzo Fantastico. Pinelli played Joachim's Romance du Concerto Hongrois, with string and piano accompaniment, and the matinée closed with a Mendelssohn Concerto for violin, with accompaniment.

Sgambati's execution is so fine to my ears that I am glad to hear the enthusiasm of others over his playing. I feel assured then that I am exaggerated in my admiration. He is passionate, concentrated, scholarly, and full of originality. This distinguished young artist is constantly receiving offers of fine positions in various parts of Europe, but he loves Rome so dearly he cannot uproot himself. However, I am afraid he will not remain much longer in the Eternal City. When Sgambati leaves Rome, one of its greatest attractions to the music-lover will be gone. Next Monday there will be another matinée, and in a few days he will give a grand Beethoven Symphony.

De Beriot.

Charles Auguste de Beriot, born at Louvain, the 20th February, 1802; died at Brussels, the 8th April 1870, was descended from an old and highly esteemed family.* Having been left an orphan when he was nine years old, he found, in M. Tivy,† a professor of music, at Brussels, a guardian and a second father, as well as a master, who exerted himself zealously to develop the boy's aptitude for music. He had attained a certain degree of skill upon the violin, his progress having been so rapid that he was able to perform publicly Vioti's Concerto in A minor (letter H), before he was nine years old, exciting thereby the admiration of his countrymen. Nature had endowed him with a most delicate ear for correctness of intonation, and this was combined in his playing with naturally elegant taste. Being, moreover, of a meditative turn, and finding in those around him no model whom he could imitate, he sought in himself the principle of the Beautiful, of which he could have no notions save those due to the spontaneous action of his own individuality. This is, perhaps, the proper place for investigating the causes which gave rise to the report bruited about, that De Beriot was a pupil of Jacotot. This fact, accredited by the author of L'Enseignement universel, and by the declarations of De Beriot himself, needs some little explanation. The general attention of the inhabitants of Belgium had been, for some years, directed to the results, which appeared to have been obtained by Jacotot's method; the progress made by those who studied it was said to be something marvellous in every branch of learning. De Beriot determined to see what advantage he could derive for his purposes from the practice of it. He had some interviews with the inventor, but scarcely learned more than two things, namely: that perseverance triumphs over all obstacles, and that, generally speaking, men are not sincere in their determination to do all they can. The young artist felt the full force of these propositions, which his intelligence perceived how to turn to account. Such is the way in which De Beriot was a pupil of Jacotot. He could not have been so in any other fashion, for it is not sure that Jacotot could have decided whether the violinist played in tune or not. However this may be, a fortunate moral and physical organization, an education well begun, and the most carefully regulated exertion, were not long before they rendered De Beriot a highly talented artist, who merely wanted to be brought into contact with talented men in other lines, in order to obtain finish; introduce a proper co-ordination in his efforts; and enable him to acquire a character of originality.

De Beriot was nineteen when he quitted his native city and went to Paris, where he arrived about the commencement of the year 1821. The first thing he did was to play before Vioti, then director of the Opera. After listening to him attentively, the celebrated artist said: "You have a fine style; exert yourself to improve it; hear all men of talent; profit by everything, and imitate nothing." This advice seemed to suggest his having no master; but De Beriot thought he ought to take lessons of De Baillet, and, for this purpose, entered the Conservatory. But he was not long before perceiving that his talent possessed a peculiar character of its own, which could with difficulty be modified, except at the price of its originality. He remained, therefore, only a few months in the classes of the Conservatory. He returned to his own private direction, and soon afterwards played, with brilliant success, at a few concerts. His first Airs variés, compositions full of grace and novelty, were published, and increased his incipient reputation. His way of performing them added an inexpressible charm. All those he published constituted for a long period the usual repertory of a great many violinists.

After shining in Paris, De Beriot proceeded to England, where he found a no less brilliant reception, especially during his subsequent visits. In London and some other cities of Great Britain he gave concerts, at which his fine talent was enthusiastically applauded. Besides being repeatedly engaged at the Philharmonic Concerts, he was engaged moreover for some of the musical festivals given annually in the principal English towns. On his return, already possessing a brilliant reputation, to his own country, he was presented to King William I., who, though caring little for music, felt the necessity of ensuring the independence of a young artist who promised to prove an honor to his native land. He bestowed on him, therefore, a pension of 3,000 florins, and the title of first solo violinist in his own private band. The Revolution of 1830 deprived De Beriot of these advantages.‡

From the moment that the artist's talent began to show itself, it went on developing itself; on attaining maturity, it was distinguished by a combination of the most precious qualities, namely: a most beautiful tone; invariable correctness, a quality in which Lafont was his only rival; unusual elegance of taste; a personal style; and, finally, a certain charm, in which he was never surpassed, and perhaps never equalled by any one. Critics, who never forfeit their rights, formerly reproached De Beriot with combining a slight degree of coldness with his purity; their criticisms were useful to him, for warmth and vigorous bowing became no less remarkable in his play than correctness and taste. Complaints were also made that, restricting the flight of his talent to composing and executing Airs variés, he confined himself within too narrow limits; he cleared himself, also, from this reproach, by composing concertos which he played at various concerts, and in which he exhibited conception and execution on a grander scale than previously. Having been appointed professor of the violin at the Conservatory of Brussels in 1845, he composed his later concertos for his pupils, throwing into each of them charming ideas and touches, as remarkable for their elegance as for their brilliancy. It has been said that this music, so favorable to the talent of those who execute it, is much less difficult than it appears. I do not know whether this observation is to be considered a criticism, or whether it is not rather an eulogium. Having become the friend of the celebrated Mme. Malibran, De Beriot travelled with her in Italy, England, and Belgium. In 1835, he became her husband.§ The numerous opportunities he enjoyed of hearing this inspired lady appear to have exerted the most happy influence on his talent. At Naples, where he played at a concert in the Teatro San Carlo, he achieved a most enormous success, a thing very rare with the Italians, who being passionately devoted to singing, bestowed, at that period, as a nation, very little attention on instrumental music.

Having permanently taken up his abode at Brussels after the death of Mme. Malibran-de-Beriot, he did not appear publicly for several years.* In 1840, however, he made a tour in Germany, stopping some time at Vienna, where he gave concerts. Unfavorable changes in his health, changes recurring at various periods, at length caused him to take the resolution of playing no more in public, though his talent was still in its full power. He no longer played except to his pupils, and some few privileged friends, who still admired the fulness and the charm of his style. Unfortunately, some more serious shocks to his constitution, at an age which is not one for resisting infirmity, obliged him, in 1852, to resign his post as professor. Paralysis of the optic nerve had suddenly deprived him of sight, and the hopes he at first entertained of being cured had not been realized.

De Beriot's principal works are: Nine Concertos; "Airs Variés;" Studies; Sonatas and Duets; Trios; a Cantata, executed at the Brussels Conservatory of Music, in April, 1853; &c.

De Beriot's last work, the most important of the productions he wrote at a ripe age, is his Méthode de violon en trois parties, Paris, 1858, one vol., large 4to. The first part contains the elements and treats of the positions; the second contains the theory of bowing, and its various applications; we find in it also instructions relating to harmonics. The third part treats of style. Each of the parts contains an ample collection of studies to enable the student to carry out the precepts.

De Beriot was a member of the Royal Academy of Belgium, and of the Musical Academy of Rome; Officer of the Order of Leopold; Knight of the Iron Cross; of the Oak Crown, of Holland; of Merit, of Saxo-Coburg, &c.

The solemn funeral service was celebrated on Tuesday, the 12th inst., in the parish church of St. Gude, in the presence of a large crowd of persons, connected mostly with art and literature. The son of the deceased was chief mourner. Among those present on the sad occasion was M. Henri Vieuxtemps, the most illustrious of all the virtuosos reared in the school of the great master; MM. Fétis, director of the Conservatory; Guéret; Ch. Rogier; the Prince de Chimay; Van Soudt; the Chevalier L. de Barbure; the Chevalier van Elweyck; Soubre, director of the Liège Conservatory; and P. Benoît, director of the Antwerp Conservatory; MM. De pont, Dameron, Bles, Ad. Samuel, Boeselet, Artôt, Duhem, Guéris, B. Fauconier, Mailly, and other distinguished artists, both of Brussels and other places.

* By a royal decree of the 16th April, 1853, his claim to belong to the aristocracy was formally acknowledged. His arms were: "D'or à trois têtes de renard de gueules—Cimier: une tête de renard de l'écu.—Ed. Guide Musical."

† Jean François Tivy, born at Foleux (Hainault), the 26th April, 1773; died at Louvain, the 14th December, 1844.—Ibid.

‡ Which did not prevent his setting to music "La Marche des Belges," "a patriotic song, words by Boquet, dedicated to the brave defenders of liberty." De Beriot discreetly kept in the shade this gift of his life, an act to which he was indebted for the Iron Cross, that he never wore.—Ed. Guide Musical.

§ There was only one child by this marriage: M. Charles Wilfrid de Beriot, a talented pianist, at present established in Paris. By his second marriage, with a sister of Thalberg, De Beriot had one son, an officer in the Belgian army, who died some years since.—Ed. Guide Musical.

* Or, more accurately, eighteen months. De Beriot made his re-appearance in public on the 18th December, 1837, at the concert of the Philharmonic Society of Brussels, on which occasion two medals were struck off, one being for the illustrious violinist, and the other for his sister-in-law, Mlle. Pauline Garcia (Mme. Viardot), who then made her debut in a career which she afterwards pursued with such brilliant results. The two subsequently joined in a tour through the Belgian provinces and Germany, and, on the 16th December, 1838, the anniversary of the concert at Brussels, they played at the Théâtre de la Renaissance, Paris.

The Candle Symphony.

It is no rare occurrence to see some of the gravest and the most severe musicians—musicians who, as a rule, are distinguished for their grand inspirations—abandon themselves, in fits of caprice, to the most diverting instances of musical buffoonery. In the midst of an old book comprising different works by Carissimi, in the midst of psalms, and of motets written in the severest style imaginable, the reader is greatly astonished, and even greatly delighted, at coming across such pieces as the "Capuchin's Beard" (Venerabilis barba capucinarum); "An Ass's Will," with an imitation of the testator's melodious voice; the "Lesson in the rudiments, or the Declension of the pronoun, Hic, Hæc, Hoc;" "The Barlesque Requiem," in which a grave voice slowly pronounces the funeral words, while the soprano sings the following anything but poetic lines.—

"Quand mon mari vient de dehors Ma route est d'être battue."

We all know the admirable bit of musical buffoonery written by Mozart to ridicule his set of amateurs at Prague. Berton, the author of Montano et Stéphanie, published a small collection of canons, in which the most profound science is applied to the treatment of the most comical ideas. Les Héralcutes et les Démocrates, a canon, with double chorus, in which one set lament and complain to a sorrowful and devout melody, while the second set sing "la bouteille et son jus divin," is a work of only a few pages, but the hand of a master is as apparent as it would be in a work of greater compass. Who, however, can fancy Haydn, the most learned, the most serious, and the most methodical of composers, with his frilled shirt front, his lace ruffles, and his venerable perruque, seated at his table writing works that give him the right to the title of the prince of burlesque composers? Never, however, was a title more deserved.

Haydn's musical plesanteries are numerous; some are exceedingly strange. The "Ox Minuet" is celebrated. We know that Haydn endeavored to imitate in it the lumbering gait and movements of the patient animal just named. For some time a rivalry existed between Haydn and Steibelt. The latter's symphonies carried off the palm, even in the opinion of the English, from those of the great composer. Haydn was annoyed at the preference thus shown to his rival. One day he had an explanation with his friends on the subject. "Steibelt!" he said, with an accent of profound contempt, "I will crush him!"

How shall we make the reader understand in what manner Haydn was resolved to crush Steibelt? We read, in a chronicle of the Middle Ages, that a man who was possessed, and whom the devil would not allow a moment's respite, went to consult a famous exorciser. The latter ordered the poor wretch to seat himself in a butt of water, with only his head above the surface. He then went through the usual forms. The devil was conquered, but fearing to meet the irritated face of the exorciser, he knocked out the bottom of the butt and fled obstreperously. It was with an explosion of this kind that Haydn determined to crush Steibelt. So, when, in the midst of an admirable piece, in which the master had exhausted all the resources of his genius, the formidable low C of the bassoon was unexpectedly heard, every one was seized with an uncontrollable fit of laughter; the imitation was perfect, and Steibelt was dethroned.

The Candle Symphony boasts a rather curious origin. The musicians of some petty German prince or other were very unpunctual at rehearsals; they came late, and frequently blew out their candles and went away before the rehearsal was over. The following is the plan of it:—The first piece is written in a very beautiful style; the andante with the mutes is delicious; the minuet is lively and rapid; next comes the finale, consisting of two movements, the first in duple time, and the second, andante amoroso, in triple time. The last part then commences. From its very beginning something eccentric, unusual, out-of-the-way, greets, now and then, the ear; a horn disports out of its own proper domain; a clarinet allows sounds to escape from it which appear but little consonant with its mild and melancholy character. Is it possible that Haydn's genius is deserting him, the audience must have thought. Suddenly a horn indulges in a most execrable solo, and then, humiliated by the phrase allotted to it, blows out its candle and slowly steals off. The confusion continues. The clarinet, also, puts out its light, and escapes in its turn. The horn in A, lost up in the very high notes, quietly drops down to the middle A, and imitates its fellows. The double-bass endeavours to hold its own against the storm, and runs furiously up and down the four strings. But, very slowly, utterly worn out and exhausted, the terrible instrument ceases its rumblings and disappears. The violoncello does the same; the flute follows: the tenors and the violins hurry off, and out go their candles. The harmony, so powerful a short time previously, is now nothing more than a vague and confused murmur; it is the distant noise of the sea; the murmuring breeze;

a humming-bird flying past; the flight of a gnat; and then nothing at all. The first violin, left by itself, extinguishes the single modest light in the orchestra, makes a low bow to the spectators, and retires, like a captain who does not abandon the fight till all his soldiers have deserted.

Such is the Candle Symphony.—London Musical World.

Musical Correspondence.

Further Extracts from the Diary of a young man of the "Future."

DRESDEN, APRIL 9. (Saturday Evening). I went to the rehearsal at the Hof-Theater, of Beethoven's Mass in D and Symphony in C minor. Sunday evening was the performance. The Mass was as well given as a composition of such difficulty is ever likely to be. The soloists were Mme. Otto-Alvarleben, Mlle. Nanitz, Herr v. Witt, and a Bass, whose name I forget. He undertook the part at the last moment, as Scaria was suddenly taken hoarse and could not sing. Mme. Otto-Alvarleben is a true artist and she led the quartets grandly. Her voice has too little of the ready timbre to be very sympathetic, and her utterance is indistinct, but she sings very understandingly, especially in such music, and is as firm as a rock. Nanitz's beautiful voice and expressive singing made me as wild about her as ever. Von Witt and the basso both did very well. The chorus sang well in tune and with precision, but their position on the stage was unfavorable, and it was merely from their greater power of sostenuto that they could be distinguished from the solo-singers. All effects of volume and power was lost. I enjoyed the Mass greatly, especially those parts in which the "9th Symphony spirit" is let loose. Impossible as Beethoven's choral compositions are, they thoroughly repay careful study, and are worth a thousand failures or half successes in performance. T. and I usually wade through Liszt's two-piano arrangement of the 9th Symphony two or three times a week, and I am ready to shake hands with Richard Wagner or any other enthusiast about it. Talking of Wagner, I have just read his pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren." He has a disagreeable way of shoving himself into the front rank in everything he writes, but the pamphlet is full of fine thoughts. What he says of Mendelssohn seems to me the justest criticism (sit venia mihi haeretico) I have ever read; though I can't feel the justice of what he says of Schumann. I sympathize with him heartily in his remarks on the "anti-effect" school, and wish the same gospel could be preached from every musical pulpit in Europe and America,—especially Boston.

Thursday morning, at half-past six, Messrs. L., D., T., H. and myself started for Leipzig to hear the public rehearsal of Bach's "Passion" in the Thomas-kirche. It was my first hearing of the work, and I was enough delighted, really delighted with the music to have satisfied the most enthusiastic Bachite. There is enough melody in it to have founded a whole host of Donizettis! [And what wonderful dramatic power is displayed in the recitatives and choruses! I know of nothing in all oratorio writing that I should rank as high as the opening chorus; except perhaps "And the people of Israel sighed" in Handel's "Israel in Egypt." Franz's orchestral additions do not seem to me to be entirely in the spirit of the original, especially in the choruses. Bach's choral writing is so fine, and the voices are so grandly used that any orchestral effect seems worse than superfluous. Besides, the passages where Bach himself has made play with his orchestra and used the instruments to some dramatic purpose, (as for instance in the recitative where the "veil of the temple was rent in twain") lose half their effect when contrasted with Franz's more vigorous orchestration. But it seems to me that Franz's scoring of the songs cannot be too highly praised. David's playing of the violin obligato in the air "Erbarme dich" was the most perfect piece of obligato playing. J. Kietz of Dresden conducted. One feeling was very strong in my mind after the rehearsal, the same that possessed me after my first hearing of "Lohengrin," namely: that no two composers are so much alike in spirit [!] as Bach and Wagner. A.

April 26. I have just got back from Berlin where I have been spending a week. The grand object of my trip was the last performance of the "Meistersinger." On Wednesday evening we crowded ourselves into the "Steh-parterre" and were fully repaid for four hours' standing. The cast was, as far as I can remember: Hans Sachs, Betz; Walther, Niemann; Eva, Mallinger; Magdalena, Brandt. Beckmeiser and David I forget. The work deserves all the good that has ever been said of it and infinitely more. Lohengrin is little in comparison with it. As for the "dreariness" that some people find in it, I can only say that there are those who find the 9th Symphony tiresome, and that people have been known to yawn over the slow movement of the 4th. I see as much "dreariness" in one as in the other and no more. If perfect beauty and grace of melody, if the most wonderfully beautiful and rich orchestration, and above all if the most sparkling wit and humor, both dramatic and musical, are "dreariness," then is The Meistersinger a most dreary production. The performance was good, very good, considering the difficulty of the work, and yet it was just that degree of excellence that makes one uncomfortable that it is not perfect. Mallinger and Betz left nothing to be desired, but Niemann is far from being the ideal Walther. He sang his first song, "Am stillen Herd," splendidly, but in the finale of the first act: "Fangt an; so rief mir der Wald," he was too boisterously ecstatic and did not come up to any fine conception of the music. The dream song in the third act, "Morgenlich glühend," does not lie at all in his line, and he gave the most mystical, dreamy, sort of songs without any mystery, dreaminess or tenderness. Nevertheless he was very fine in all the melodramas, and his acting was capital. His love-making with Eva was the most perfect thing of the kind I have ever seen on the stage. The way Eva and he rush into each other's arms, and he lifts her off the ground to kiss her, and the way she holds his hand in one of hers and strokes it and pats it with the other is simply perfect. The great quintet went very well, only one could not help the feeling that the singers were not quite sure of their parts. The intonation is very difficult, and the movement is so slow that any little want of aplomb is felt rather painfully. But it is a most glorious composition. The chorus in the third act: "Wacht auf," deserves all that Schuré has written about it. There is nothing more beautiful in Bach. [!]
—Taken as a whole the "Meistersinger" impressed me more as a production of the highest order of genius than anything I have heard for a long time, and I should not hesitate to rank it with Fidelio, Don Giovanni, Cherubini's Medea, or any of the great masterpieces of dramatic music. [!]

Sunday evening we went to hear the 400th representation of Don Giovanni. It is strange how a man who could write the finale of the second act, and Donna Anna's recitative: "Fu alquando avanza la notte," should have been contented with such very undramatic numbers as the duct: "Fuggi, crudele, fuggi," or the quartet "Non ti fidar." Coming, as it did, so soon after the Meistersinger, the dramatic poverty of the opera was painfully apparent, great as the music is.

The performance was pretty good as a whole, though I know of no opera that loses so much by translation in German. The concerted pieces were horribly butchered with the exception of the sextet: "Sola, sola," which for some unknown reason was very well given; none of the singers, for a wonder, shirking their parts in the tutti. Frau Voggenhuber sang "Or sai chi l'onore" most splendidly, better than I have ever heard it sung, and far, far better than either Parepa or Tietjens. Betz was by no means up to the part of the Don, though he sang conscientiously and with a certain amount of clumsy jollity. "La ci darem" and the serenade were the numbers he sang best in. Lucca's Zerlina was enchanting. Her voice is one of the most beautiful I have ever heard; reedy and sympathetic as a voice can be, at times almost like a muted viola. Her conception of the character was entirely "paysanne," with a good dose of coquetterie thrown in. She sang the part in Berlin dialect, using mir for mich and vice versa. This sounds rather clasp, but it was really a charming piece of "couleur local." When encored in "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai carino," she repeated them in Italian, and you cannot imagine how much better they sounded. Both in singing and acting Lucca's Zerlina leaves Patti's far behind. The mise en scène was gorgeous. The ballroom scene was for once a ballroom, with no end of silks and satins and jewelry, and in the last finale, instead of the Don's sitting down to a solitary ham-sandwich and macaroni, which always seemed to me the most dismal and un-Don-Juan like proceeding, he shared his galantine and champagne, (and a good deal of it) with a very fascinating and gay crowd of demi-monde and cavaliers. In honor of the 400th performance the opera was given entire, with the exception of the scenes after the "Höllenfahrt," and the duet: "Per queste tue manine."

Music Abroad.

London.

ORATORIO CONCERTS.—The performance of Bach's "Matthew Passion" music at the sixth of these concerts, on the 6th ult., at Exeter Hall, was an event which cannot be dismissed with the usual formalities of conventional criticism. Assuredly it must help forward the cause of musical progress in this country; but it will be by taking us back, and showing us how at one time sacred art, unfettered by the crushing effect of popular applause, was moulded solely by the requirements of the subject which it illustrated; and how artists became priests in a faith which their God-like nature enabled them to glorify and ennoble. That Bach throughout his life worked with the utmost reverence for his art can be doubted by none acquainted with any of his compositions; but with what reverence he worked for his religion can only be appreciated by those who have well studied his "Passion-Music," according to St. Matthew, which is unquestionably the finest of his settings of this subject, although three out of the five which he wrote are also known. The admirers of the "sensation" school, to which modern music is rapidly drifting, must have found little to gratify them in the performance of this fine old specimen of the product of an age in which effect was never sought for at the expense of art; but those who placidly yielded themselves to the influence of music, apart from the time in which it was written, were so ardently impressed with the sublimity of the work that even the applause, which they liberally bestowed, appeared scarcely suitable to express the feelings induced by listening to a composition so utterly unlike those to which they had been accustomed. That this effect upon a mixed audience could be foreseen is perhaps too much to expect; and it may be from this reason that Mr. Barnby, anxious to make the work successful, omitted several pieces, amongst the most important of which was the Choral which ends the first part. His experience must, we are sure, have now convinced him that in future performances these may be safely restored. Every part cut out from a work, one of the great merits of which is its perfection of construction, is detrimental to its effect. Mr. Barnby is a teacher of the public, and loses his power when he defers to his pupils; let us trust, therefore, that the same enthusiastic admiration of the composition which led him to present Beethoven's Mass in D precisely as its author wrote it, will prompt him to give us the inexpressible pleasure of hearing the "Passion-Music" next season in the same entirety.

Mr. G. A. Macfarren's able analysis of this work —with which we trust our readers are well acquainted—will absolve us from the necessity of any description of its wonderful details. Let those who believe Bach's music "antiquated" account for the overwhelming effect of the double chorus, "Have lightnings and thunders in clouds disappeared," (which was re-demanded with an enthusiasm which overcame the conductor's well-known dislike of encores), for the amount of spontaneous applause bestowed upon the chorales, or for the attentive manner in which the final chorus (usually the signal for a general rising) was listened to and appreciated. Many of the songs, too, and short recitatives appeared more deeply felt by the majority of the audience than is usually the case in our modern sacred compositions, even when the room is resounding with the loudest demonstrations of approval. The rendering of the choral portion of this work reflected the utmost credit upon Mr. Barnby and his well-trained body of singers. The chorales were sung with a decision and pathos of expression which we have never heard equalled—the chorus already mentioned, "Have lightnings and thunders," tested the powers of the two choirs with a success which astonished even the most ardent worshippers of Bach; and the more quiet choruses were given with a clearness scarcely to be expected by those who knew the excessive complexity of the writing. The solos were excellently given by Mme. Rudersdorff, Mlle. Drasdil, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The beautiful air "Jesus Saviour," was exquisitely sung by Mme. Rudersdorff; and amongst the pieces for the contralto which produced the most profound impression we may mention the pathetic air "Grief for sin," and the solo with chorus, "See the Saviour's outstretched arm," both of which were rendered with a religious fervor, by Mlle. Drasdil, which proved that she is fully capable of taking the highest place as an exponent of sacred music. Mr. Cummings had evidently made an earnest study of the solos given to the Evangelist, all of which he delivered with the utmost artistic feeling, the Recitativo "Now Peter sat without," especially eliciting a spontaneous burst of applause. The music assigned to Mr. Lewis Thomas is important, but not calculated to produce much effect. Everything he did, however, was done well; the air "Twas in the cool of Eventide," receiving the utmost justice. The orchestra was thoroughly efficient; and a word of praise must be assigned to Herr Strauss, who played the violin obligato to the air "Have mercy upon me, O Lord" with much delicacy and refinement. Mr. Barnby conducted with real intelligence, the more to be commended from the fact of his having no model upon which to base his reading of the work. Mr. Thorne presided with much skill at the pianoforte, and Mr. Docker showed a wise reticence in the management of the organ which we should like to find more extensively followed.—Mus. Times.

MR. MANN'S BENEFIT CONCERT. "Benefits" are sometimes given on very small provocation. They are, not unfrequently routine affairs, in which the slightest possible sympathy exists between the person complimented and those who compliment. The benefit concert given in Mr. Mann's name at the Crystal Palace on Saturday had no connection whatever with this class. Between the Crystal Palace conductor and the Crystal Palace audience there is a more than ordinary tie. Each is indebted to the other for favor received or pleasure conferred; and both have at heart a common interest. Saturday's proceedings were, therefore, exactly what they pretended to be, while the crowd drawn together, we may hope, made the "benefit" something more than a benefit in name. Even those who, like ourselves, frequently differ from Mr. Mann on questions of musical faith and practice will be glad of this result. On the whole, he is undoubtedly doing much for music. If proof were wanting, it would be found in the list of works performed during the past winter. The list in question begins with twenty symphonies, of which seven are by Beethoven; Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Schumann contributing two each. Following the symphonies, come fifty-two overtures and orchestral pieces, the composers most largely drawn upon being Mendelssohn (10), Beethoven (6), Weber (5), Mozart (4), and Schubert (4). As showing impartial selection we may place opposite to the works of these masters others by Berlioz, Raff, Reinecke, Rubenstein and Wagner, which have been presented, let us hope, that the public may, by a knowledge of that which is weak, incline to that which is strong. The concertos and other instrumental solos number twenty-three; Beethoven and Mendelssohn again headed the lot, followed closely by Bach and Weber, Ries and Patti bringing up the rear. The catalogue ends with eight vocal works of importance, to which Beethoven and Mendelssohn, yet again, most largely contribute. Of these one hundred and three works, twenty-one were played for the first time at the Crystal Palace, the number being made up thus:—Four Symphonies, by Mozart, Bennett, Hiller, and Cowen respectively; eight overtures, &c.; seven instrumental solos; Rossini's Messe Solennelle, and Sullivan's Prodigal Son. The names just mentioned show that regard has been paid to native talent, and, fairly considered, the entire list must give satisfaction. Anyhow, there is no denying that in the department of orchestral music it stands alone, and claims the highest honors of successful labor. "The Saturday Concerts"—so runs a note at the end of the catalogue—"will recommence on the first Saturday, in October next." To lovers of classical music it would be hard to make a more grateful announcement.

In drawing up his programme Mr. Mann was careful to aim at the gratification of varied tastes as far as consistent with his general plan. For the popular taste he provided a selection of vocal music ranging from songs by Schumann downwards. Mlle. Reboux sang Rode's air with variations and Ardit's valse, "L'Estasi" (both utterly unsuited to her voice and style); Mme. Florence Lancia gave "Ardon gl' incensi;" Mr. Vernon Rigby was heard in "Come, ye children," from Sullivan's Prodigal Son, and two of Schumann's songs (scored for orchestra by Mr. Mann); Signor Urio contributed Mercadante's "Bella adorata;" and Signor Mongini, "M'appari" (encored) and "La donna è mobile." The orchestral music requires more notice. In the first place it was played by an augmented band of 100 performers, and played to perfection. Rarely has such an orchestra been brought together; still more rarely has it been used to such purpose. Next, the works chosen were in great part admirable, wholly interesting. Mozart's overture to Der Schauspieler Director led the way, and was dashed off in a style harmonizing with its agreeable and spirited character. The entire opera—a "Comedy with Music" Mozart himself called it—was written with special regard for particular circumstances and particular voices. Therefore it has become obsolete; the overture alone remaining. Nobody fears for this relic, at least till the "future" comes which is to bring the apotheosis of Herr Wagner. Then, not only the overture to Der Schauspieler Director, but also much other music will have a place on the upper shelves of dusty libraries. Beethoven's seventh symphony, so often played under Mr. Mann as to be among the works with which his audience are most familiar, calls for neither description nor criticism. In justice, however, we must dwell for a moment upon a performance of more than usual merit. The orchestra rendered the symphony with the precision of a machine, plus the artistic insight which can discern and the artistic power which can express the composer's idea. No more remarkable effort has been made during the season.

Weber's Concertstück in F minor, played by Mme. Schumann, was a contribution to the popular element in the programme. Everybody knows this much used—often ill-used—work, and a recall for the artist was the certain result, especially as Mme. Schumann exhibited all her distinctive qualifications. Bach's violin prelude in E major was given in peculiar and questionable form. Fate has made grim sport of this work. Bach himself adapted it as an organ solo with orchestral accompaniments leading to his anthem, "Wir danken dir, Gott." This was played at the Crystal Palace three years ago, with the solo relegated to the violin. On Saturday the prelude appeared as arranged for a number of violins with new and entirely different accompaniment by Herr Stür. How next, we may ask, will the unfortunate work be treated? By way of comfort, the programme assures us that "nothing can subdue the astonishing vigor and entrain of the original." From this comfort may undoubtedly be derived; nevertheless, we can hardly agree with the policy of playing tricks upon great works simply because their greatness cannot be hidden. Herr Stür's version of Bach, though executed with much spirit, produced little effect. Some ballet music (MS.) from Mendelssohn's Wedding of Camacho, played for the first time in England, was agreeably interesting, and the concert fitly ended with a masterly performance of Weber's overture to Oberon.—Mus. World.

SACRED MUSIC IN PARIS. The usual performance took place during Holy Week in the principal churches of Paris, almost every school of sacred music being represented, from the severe style of the ancient church writers down to the modern works of Rossini and Gounod. At S. Roch on Good Friday "The Passion" of Vittoria and the "Seven Words" of Haydn were performed with great success, under the direction of M. Vervoitte, and on Easter Sunday the Mass was one of Cherubini's. Haydn's work was also performed at S. Geneviève, the singing of the choir being unusually good. At S. Eustache the the modern taste was gratified by a performance of the Stabat Mater of Rossini, under the able direction of M. Hurand. At S. Severin on Easter Day the Mass was the second of a set by M. Henri Covin, the choir-master. Of the mass by M. Dubois performed at the Madeleine, the critics speak in the highest terms. Among its special beauties are the final fugue of the Gloria, and the instrumental prelude of the Offertoire, in which the solos for the violoncello and the horn are remarkably effective.

At the Imperial Chapel at the Tuilleries many eminent vocalists took part in the services. On Maundy Thursday Mlle. Nilsson, Mme. Guymard, and the chorus of the Conservatoire sang in the Mass, and on the evening of the same day these artists performed the Stabat Mater. M. Cohen, the organist, played a "Virgo Virginum," adapted from the airs in La Muette. M. Anber, the director of the Imperial Chapel, conducted the orchestra for the first time for sixty-two years. On Good Friday the services were sung to the music by Pergolesi and Palestrina; on Easter Eve the chief work was a "Regina Coeli" by Cherubini; and on Easter Day several of Marcello's psalms and the "Laudate Dominum" by Adolphe Adam were given.

The Society of Concerts of the Conservatoire, now in the forty eighth year of its existence, gave, according to custom, a concert on Good Friday, which is better described by the French "spirituel" than by any English term. The programme included Beethoven's Symphony in A; Mozart's Symphony in G minor; Mendelssohn's Overture to Ruy Blas; a motet by J. S. Bach: the "Sanctus" and the "Pie Jesus" from Gounod's "Requiem;" and the finale of the second part of Haydn's Creation. On Easter Sunday the same programme was performed before an equally crowded and enthusiastic audience.

At the Theatre Italien the Stabat Mater of Rossini was given on Maundy Thursday, followed by several morceaux from the works of other authors, Mlle. Krause singing the "Ave Maria" first to Gounod's setting, and secondly to Schubert's. A selection from the Redemption of M. Alary was also performed. On Easter Eve Rossini's "Messe" was given, Mlle. Krause taking the soprano music.

In the form of musical lectures M. A. Elwart gave an interesting sketch of the most celebrated composers of sacred music, including Pergolesi, Lesueur, Bellini, Kastner, Schubert, Cherubini, and Rossini, from whose works some excerpts were performed.

The "Seven Words" by M. Dubois, the chapel-master of the Madeleine, filled the programme of M. Padeloup's concert at the Cirque Napoleon. This work, which was first heard in 1869 at the church of S. Clothilde, where the composer formerly directed the choir, is most favorably spoken of. The most effective numbers are said to be the soprano air "Father, forgive them," the "third word" set down for the tenor, and a magnificent piece of unison for all the strings in the orchestra.

At the minor churches also special efforts were made to provide music suited to the season, but to offer even a brief chronicle of the works performed would occupy more space than we can spare. What we have said will however be sufficient to prove that in Paris as in Rome the music of the Holy Week is full of interest, and that no time or trouble is spared to make it worthy of its sacred object.—Choir (London.)

BOSTON, MAY 21, 1870.

Old and New.

The spirit of our age in all its manifestations, of business, pleasure, Art, religion, is one of great uneasiness; and we, perhaps, are the uneasiest people upon earth. Particularly so in matters of taste, where we have no deep foundations of culture to make us calmly, quietly progressive. The musical taste with us forms no exception. We stretch out our arms to every novelty, and become so blasé with the excitement of all latest fashions that, after all, we have to own that there is nothing quite so new and fresh and sure to quicken as the old standard master works of times when Art was more sincere and genius not all eaten up with egotism. Our own city, during the past five years, has furnished a good lesson. For five years we have had "Symphony Concerts," into the programmes of which nothing that was not standard, nothing questionable, or merely experimental, has ever been admitted; and for the first time we have seen a steady increase of success from the outset. When has there ever been such sure and permanent support for anything miscellaneous, sensational, catering to the taste or idle curiosity of any one and every one? Is it not practically demonstrated, that purity and high consistency of programmes is the first essential condition of any permanent success in serial concerts?

Meanwhile the New York Philharmonic Society, the oldest and most respectable of the Orchestral Societies in this country, seems to have been teaching the same lesson lately by holding up examples to be shunned; running after strange Gods: Wagner, Liszt, &c.; introducing the "sensational" element into its programmes, and catering to caprice. The vigorous, new administration worked to a charm for a while; concerts and rehearsals were thronged by all the votaries of Fashion. Another season is just over. But it appears that, after all, the music lovers are already weary of the "Future" coveted so eagerly by some. There has been much complaint and falling off in the attendance. The following comments on the last concert, taken from Watson's Art Journal,—though some of the sentences are not in the best taste, and some not quite intelligible—doubtless express a pretty common feeling among the truest music-lovers, and therefore among the only class who can be counted on in any city for the permanent nucleus of an audience for serial concerts of the highest order:

The last concert of the present season of the ancient and renowned Philharmonic Society, took place at the Academy of Music last Saturday evening. It was not very largely attended; the audience was fashionable and numerous for another concert, but barely three-fourths of the usual Philharmonic audiences. We shall not presume at this moment to speculate upon the causes of this very perceptible diminution in the numbers present at some of the concerts of the present Philharmonic season. We may touch upon this point possibly, in our review of the past season of the New York Philharmonic Society, and what it has done for art in its integrity. At this moment we can only say, that the past season should have been a success, for Dr. R. Ogden Doremus was always on hand, to lead on the ladies, who vouchsafed their services to the society, and to give away the material substance of the society to generous hearted volunteers; garnishing the gifts with honeyed words of figurative and mellifluous extolment. That Carl Bergmann was always there with unlimited powers to ride his hobby to death, and to thrust down the throats of the confiding, but oversimple subscribers the mad musical monstrosities of Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner. We cannot blame Mr. Bergmann, he is a German and is naturally impelled to sustain the honor of his people. It is, of course, the dominant musical intelligence of the great American nation, it rules the opera in the Bowery. It is the arbiter of taste in our private salons; it elevates and enlivens our funerals, and it animates our parades; it is the saltatory elements which deadens (!) the delicate and infinitesimal feet of our dainty and spiritual American maiden. It nauseates with bad music the unnumbered audiences of our multitudinous theatres. It makes and unmakes managers, and in short, it does pretty much as it pleases, and nobody can say it nay!

For all this we are very much obliged, and we recognize the force of the stand taken, for we, being an easy, but self-sustained people, must submit, carelessly, to the control of somebody, and as the great Irish nation condescends to exert a gentle and imperceptible influence over our politics, so our aesthetic German citizens kindly consent to take and hold us by the ears through an exquisite concord of sweet and sensuous sounds.

Still, with all the advantages we have mentioned, we cannot but look upon the past season of the Philharmonic Society as a comparative failure on the whole. It is true that the great and much-to-be-worshipped amateur element has condescended to stoop down and mingle, in an aristocratic way, with the more professional, but we have not observed any elevating result arising therefrom. The condescension was, of course, overwhelming, but we would humbly and falteringly remark that, while the coalition, which was spontaneous and complete as oil and water, was very damaging to the society, it was infinitely more so to the amateurs.

Of the last concert, we do not care to say much. Schumann's symphony in C is the least interesting of all his works of that class. It is very much spun out, very labored, stiff, and possesses even less spontaneity than his manner usually exhibits. It was fairly played, but its performance was by no means up to the Philharmonic standard. Gade's overture, "Reminiscence of Osean," should have been called "a Mendelssohn," and a diluted reminiscence at that. Wagner's chorus, from his "Meistersinger," possesses some beautiful points of instrumentation, and some tender and impassioned phrases, how arrived at is a mystery profound; but the good that is in it is quite overshadowed by the fearful vocal and instrumental riot, which grows wilder and more furious the more the officer in command waves his baton in the vain endeavor to harmonize the conflicting elements. As a writer for the voice, Wagner outrages every vocal principle, and refuses to recognize registers or compass; what he requires to be done must be accomplished although the larynx split! His needs are imperative, and poor humanity must suffer in throat and ears.

As if to offset the raving of Wagner, Liszt, in his coldest and most uncompromising mood of musical asceticism and melodic barrenness, is introduced on the same programme! We shivered to the bone when we heard those blatant ravings with which the selection from his oratorio of "Elizabeth" commenced, and listened in a state of blank despair, as the horrors of mechanical, soulless, devil-inspired musical discord multiplied. We looked around and we found the same hopelessness, combined with a stolid expression of resignation upon every face—no, not on every face! One countenance beamed with supernatural brightness, glowing with a sort of rare ecstasy, which could hardly be surpassed, even by the application of hot iron to the soles of the feet. Thus Bergmann stood, and seemed to drink in melodic rheumatism and harmonic gout at every pore. It is upon such food that he lives and grows fat! Gott in himmel, wot a beebles!

Beethoven's Concerto and his great Fidelio Overture No. 4, redeemed the audience from insanity; they were finely performed. Miss Anna Mehlig, in the Concerto, displayed all those fine points which we have credited her with in previous articles. She was very cordially called, and played, in admirable style, Paganini's Campanella, varied by Liszt, when temporarily sane. And so ended the Philharmonic season of 1869-70. A review of its achievements would certainly paint a moral, if it would not adorn a tale.

Now, mingled with the wholesome truth of the above there are, to be sure, some things smacking of unreason. The sneer at the German influence in our music seems wilfully blind to all but the more coarse and vulgar kind of German musicianship; and that is more apt to be Italian or French in its inspirations, than to be genuine German. Surely the writer will not deny that the best German influence among us has been a good one; for that would be denying Beethoven and Mozart. Then again, we do not think him just to Schumann. The English prejudice peeps out there; but not in so virulent a form as we have sometimes met it, where Schumann has been classed in the same category with Liszt and Wagner,—which is almost equal to the wild ingenuity of our young friend's discovery of a resemblance (in spirit too!) between Wagner and Sebastian Bach! Nevertheless, mutatis mutandis, it is evident that the musical heart of the great body of true music-lovers, after listening to those specimens of Liszt and Wagner, would say Amen to the general tone of the remarks which we have copied. And we have heard more than one prominent member of that same New York Philharmonic Orchestra privately confess, and in sad earnest, to the same conviction.

Well, here too, in our own smaller city, with our smaller and less perfect means of execution, we have been abundantly contented with the good, alone, until Thomas came with his fine orchestra, and mingled Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, Meyerbeer, &c., in the same programmes with Mozart and Bach and Beethoven; when, very naturally, not a few listeners, mainly of the class who have no settled tastes, confounding the splendid virtuosity of the performing orchestra with the subject-matter served up to them with such piquant flavoring, began to grow restless after change in our own select, staid, and (as they now for the first time suddenly discovered) "monotonous" and all too proper programmes. And here for a moment—we trust but a moment—presents itself a critical problem in our concert question for the next coming future. Per contra, let us not be alarmed; there is an offset to whatever danger may lie in this restlessness, in the comforting fact that the "Tasso" and the "Romeo and Juliet" and the noisy Fackeltänze, &c., notably failed to please or interest more than a small portion of the public in any of Mr. Thomas's Boston concerts; and that the delight with which a piece from Beethoven or any familiar classical master was welcomed after such bewildering and stunning novelties, was manifest in every face, as well as in the marked preponderance of applause. Perhaps the introduction of one or two such alien specimens into the next winter's concerts may be the surest way to confirm this experience beyond a doubt, and lay forever these disturbing ghosts.

Salem Oratorio Society.

It was something out of the common, and betokening a rare interest, for a crowd of Boston music-lovers, teachers, singers, &c., to be wending their way last Wednesday evening down to Salem to hear an Oratorio. But the young Society, organized only about three years since by earnest amateurs residing there, and full of fresh material and enthusiasm, under the direction of our CARL ZERRAHN, had already become famous for the excellence of its chorus-singing, as shown in its first public efforts (the Creation and Messiah). This time they essayed Elijah. From the moment of setting foot in the old town the air seemed full of expectation and excitement; it was like the pilgrimage from London to the Festival at Birmingham,—of course in a smaller way. The enthusiasm of the singers seemed to pervade also the crowded audience that sat awaiting the withdrawal of the curtain behind which the vocal ranks were hidden until all was ready, and did away the sombre impression of the homely and unmusical looking Mechanic Hall. The best life of the social, comfortable old town was all there; and it was evident, as soon as the choir was revealed to sight, that its elements were drawn mainly from the best life of Salem; the younger members of refined families, full of enthusiasm and desire to learn and do their best, constant and zealous in rehearsals, without the numerous distractions of our Boston life, so that their Oratorio meetings are ever kept in mind and heart as a great resource, and that engagement loyally made paramount to others.

We have no room or time (in the last hour before going to press) to report of the performance as we would. But if our readers could have overheard the lively comparison of notes among the returning party in the midnight train, they would feel quite sure that the whole performance must have been one of uncommon excellence. And indeed it was so. We speak for the whole party when we say that never in this country have we heard such chorus-singing.

There were about 250 fresh, pure voices—nearly all of them young people, at least in the Soprano and Alto,—remarkably well balanced; prompt, decided in attack; no dragging and drawing in their utterance, but all crisp and positive and clear; and every voice told; you knew that there were no dummies. The four parts were each distinctly felt in all the harmony, lending great clearness to the fugued passages. Such precision, spirit, careful light and shade—so nicely graduated that it did not seem mechanical, but the result of a fine common instinct of expression—we have seldom heard from any massive choir in Boston. Particularly were we struck by the perfection of the rendering of several of those rapid choruses, like: "Yet doth the Lord see it not"; "his wrath will pursue us," &c., and "The fire descends from heaven," where all the voices ran along with crisp, clear outline, such as we have not heard in our own Music Hall.

The broad, full, even flow of the plain, massive harmonies ("His mercies on thousands fall," for instance), was not less admirable. And we know not when we have heard "Thanks be to God," and those other graphic and exciting choruses: "Behold! God the Lord passed by," that of the "Bery chariot," &c., more vividly and effectively brought out, so far as singing was concerned. The pianissimo was sometimes so beautiful, that it seemed a pity that the orchestral accompaniment could not be equally subdued.

The principal solos were by well-known Boston artists. We need not say how grandly Mr. WHITNEY gave the music of Elijah, nor with what power and fervor the soprano parts were rendered by Miss HOUTON. Dr. LARSEN, with his sensitive, and well trained voice, and cultured style, brought out the beauty of the tenor solos very satisfactorily; and Mrs. D. G. HALL, whom we had been accustomed to consider a soprano, (at least mezzo), bore the Contralto duties well, singing "O rest in the Lord" with much expression. The Quartets and the Angel Trio, too, were sung to admiration.

There was no Organ, and the performance as a whole, of course, had not the massiveness of our Handel and Haydn presentation of such works. But, until we shall hear better (which we do not expect to do very soon), we shall have to point to Salem for a model of good, true chorus-singing.

Mlle DE LA MOTTE'S "MUSICAL" we were not able to attend; but we have known enough of her teaching to have no misgiving in adopting the following account of it, which we find in Thursday's Daily Advertiser:

THE CHILDREN'S MUSICAL PARTY GIVEN BY Mlle DE LA MOTTE, at her residence in Hancock street, yesterday afternoon, was in every respect interesting and unique. Only the younger portion of the lady's pupils took part in the entertainment, but the programme was so arranged that the comparative proficiency and attainments of the different classes might be exhibited, from beginners of the year to young ladies quite well advanced in skill though not in years. It is but simple justice to say that the results exhibited are surprising. One can hardly trust the evidence of his senses when he sees little bits of girls sit down, or perhaps we should say, set down—to the pianoforte to play with evident enjoyment and interest, and with decided success, veritable compositions of Haydn and Beethoven, and Clementi, of decided difficulty. And the wonder is not likely to be diminished by listening to a genuine sonata of Beethoven, performed by sweet young girls of twelve or thirteen years. The point, however, to be especially noticed in the results of Mlle de la Motte's instruction is the remarkable touch which she succeeds in imparting to nearly every one of her pupils without exception. This is wonderfully strong, vital and elastic, and when once it is gained, it would seem that a great part of the pupil's work is accomplished. The effect was most impressive as one clever little scholar after another exhibited the same extraordinary power in making the instrument, as it were, speak and sing; and it was delightful to see that the desired result had been reached without undue stimulating and without any austerity of rule. It is manifest that Mlle de la Motte possesses the power of easy and cheerful government as well as remarkable skill in musical instruction.

Closing of a Well-Known Concert Room.

CHICKERING'S HALL, haunt of devout music-lovers, scene of nearly all our choice chamber music for ten years (almost), redolent with memories of Beethoven and Bach and Mozart, of Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, is no more! Business crowds Music out. On Monday evening of last week the "Chickering Club" (of part-song singers) fitly gave the last concert in the dear old place, which was listened to with delight, of course, by their invited friends, yet with a sad interest. The Journal, of May 10, thus reviews the history of the Hall.

With a private musical entertainment given last evening that favorite place of resort for concert-goers, Chickering's Hall, situated at 246 Washington Street, ceased to be occupied for musical purposes. It will henceforth be devoted to business uses, having been leased by Messrs. Jordan, Marsh & Co., together with the remaining rooms occupied by the Messrs.

Chickering & Sons, and soon to be vacated. For nearly ten years Chickering's Hall has been open, and it has been celebrated as one of the handsomest, cosiest and most comfortable concert rooms in America. Small in comparison with our other halls, elegant in design and finish, and admirably adapted acoustically to musical effect, it has possessed an air of geniality pleasurable alike to artist and listener. The musical public will sincerely regret to part with the place. About it cling many delightful memories, for it has been the scene of many of the most brilliant triumphs which grace our musical annals. Nearly all the great artists who have visited Boston during the past decade have played or sung there in public or private concerts, and it has been, of course, as largely favored with the presence of our local artists. All the chamber concerts given in Boston during the period mentioned have taken place there. Not infrequently the hall has been brought into use for other purposes, such as private amateur theatrical exhibitions, dramatic readings, lectures, etc., and for quite a period a religious society (Rev. Mr. Blaikie's, Presbyterian) worshipped there on Sundays. No element of money making, however, entered into any contract made by the proprietors with those desiring its occupancy, and all parties have enjoyed its use free, or nearly so. By their generosity in this connection, the Messrs. Chickering have contributed very largely not only to the enjoyment and profit of our musical citizens, but also to the enrichment of several local charities in whose behalf special entertainments have been given. In bidding adieu to Chickering's Hall of the past, however, there is a consolation in knowing that the enterprising firm contemplate having a larger and fully as elegant a concert room in their new and more commodious quarters at the corner of Washington Street and Hayward Place.

Chickering's Hall was completed in the fall of 1860, and although a sort of impromptu opening took place in October of that year, on the occasion of a rehearsal of the Handel and Haydn Society, Col. Thomas E. Chickering at that time making an appropriate speech of welcome, it was formally dedicated by a concert on the evening of the 3d of November. There was a brilliant audience of musical people present, and Mrs. Harwood, Messrs. Dresel, Lang, Leonhard and Parker, Miss Mary Fay, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club and the Orpheus Club took part in the exercises. A week later Mrs. Harwood gave a concert, assisted by Mrs. E. A. Wentworth, Mrs. Jenny Kempton, Mr. Eichberg, Mr. Dresel, Mr. Bendelari and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and in the course of the same season concerts were also given by the Quintette Club, Mr. Dresel, Mr. Eichberg, Miss Fay, Mrs. Kempton and others. The Quintet Club continued to give their annual series of chamber concerts at this place until the present season, during which their pleasant entertainments have necessarily been omitted on account of the absence of the Club in the West. The famous Chickering pianos have, of course, been frequently heard here, and among the artists who have played here from time to time the names of Gottschalk, Teresa Carreno, James M. Wehl, Edward Hoffmann, Oscar Pfeiffer, Otto Dresel, B. J. Lang, Hugo Leonhard, J. C. D. Parker, Miss Mary Fay, Ernst Perabo, Carlisle Petersilea, John K. Paine, G. E. Whiting, Filomeno, Miss Barnetche, John L. Hatton, Miss Alice Dutton, Hermann Dann, James M. Tracy, Miss Alide Topp and Miss Anna Mehlig will readily suggest themselves. Camilla Urso, Carl Rosa, Mme. Varian, Mme. de Villiers, Miss Adelaide Phillippe, Mrs. Barry, Miss Ryan, the lamented Miss Anna Whitten, Miss Houston, Miss Barton, Miss Ridgway, Mrs. Hall, Habelmann, Brignoli, Dr. Guilmette, Mr. Rudolphsen, Barnabee, Kennedy, the Scotch vocalist, Dempster, the Obreys, and a host of other musical artists have also appeared here, and in most cases given concerts on their own account. Dr. Tuckerman, Mr. Henry Carter, Max Strakosch and others have also given musical entertainments, and some of the annual musical reunions of Mrs. Lang, Mme. Gabrielle La Motte, Mrs. Foster and other teachers have also taken place at Chickering's Hall. The Parker Club, formed in December, 1861, has always held its musical meetings here, and the rehearsals and private concerts of the club of gentlemen who took part in the entertainment last evening have also here had a place. March 2, 1867, Miss Phillippe, Brignoli, Ferranti, Sarti and Docatelli, with Mr. S. Behrens as musical director, gave the opera of "Don Pasquale," and on the 4th of March, 1868, Mr. Eichberg gave his opera, "The Two Cedis," with Miss Julia Gaylord, Mr. Barnabee and others in the cast. In the season of 1861-2, and again in that of 1862-3, Messrs. Kreissmann, Leonhard and Eichberg gave some choice classical concerts, and Mr. Eichberg gave a course of orchestral soirees in 1861. Nearly one-half of the ninety odd concerts of the New England Conservatory of Music have taken place at this hall, and the Boston Conservatory has also given some of its concerts here. During the present season two series of concerts have been given by Mr. Perabo, and others by the Listmann Quartette, Mr. Petersilea, Mr. Parker, Mr. Tracy and others. The Harvard Musical Association, the Harvard Glee Club, the Handel and Haydn Society, and the Orpheus Musical Society have in times past occupied Chickering's Hall for musical purposes, in some form or other, and the Cæcilia Society, a German singing association organized last fall, has also made its headquarters here.

The amateur dramatic performances referred to to have included some of the most brilliant and fashionable efforts in that line. The Belmont Dramatic Company and other aristocratic amateur theatrical organizations have at different times called together select audiences for the benefit of various local charities, or during the war for the aid of our soldiers and sailors. The list of those who have given dramatic or poetic readings would be very numerous, and it would include many eminent names. It has been a less favored place for lectures than for musical entertainments on account of its limited accommodations, but Ralph Waldo Emerson has delivered some of his celebrated discourses here, and the voices of other eminent men have also been heard within its walls, while a distinguished representative of the other sex—Miss Kate Field—made her first essay as a lecturer here a little over a year since.

But of the concert last evening, which closed this brilliant series of artistic gatherings. The affair was of a private character, and we do not, therefore, feel at liberty to speak of it so fully as we might under different circumstances. The entertainment was given by a private singing club well known in musical circles, under the auspices of the Messrs. Chickering, and the hall was crowded to its utmost capacity by a brilliant audience, which combined many well-known citizens and patrons of music, representatives of the musical profession, critics, etc. All of these were present by invitation, no tickets being sold. The interior of the hall was very beautifully decorated with a profusion of flowers and growing plants. Hanging baskets were at the windows and on the walls, and the platform was transformed into an exquisite floral bower. The programme consisted of a number of part songs, which were magnificently rendered by the Club, and a piano solo by Mr. J. C. D. Parker. The singing was exceedingly fine, and the music was of a character seldom heard at our public concerts, for the reason that male choirs of native voices are not numerous. The Club, which numbers some ten or a dozen voices, includes several gentlemen who are well known as soloists, and others who, although talented vocalists, have neither the leisure nor the inclination to appear in public. The programme was as follows:

The Warrior's Prayer.....	Laebner.
The Night.....	Abt.
Champagne Song.....	Schroter.
a. The Dreamy Lake.....	Schumann.
b. The Rose.....	Gade.
Always More.....	Seifert.
Piano Forte Solo.....	J. C. D. Parker.
Evening Song.....	Naeter.
a. Serenade.....	Petschke.
b. Spring Song.....	Durrner.
Hunter's Joy.....	Astholz.
Early Morning.....	Abt.
Chorus from "Edipus".....	Mendelssohn.

The chorus by Seifert, the Hunters' Chorus, by Astholz, and Mr. Parker's piano solo were encored. At the close of the final chorus it was announced that the first music heard in the hall was "Old Hundred, and it was thought appropriate to have the same sung as the final piece. The audience were invited to join with the Club in the hymn, and did so with grand and impressive effect.

Messrs. Jordan, Marsh & Co. will proceed to occupy the hall this morning, but Messrs. Chickering & Sons will not remove from their warerooms until their new quarters are in readiness.

TRIBUTE TO A BOSTON ARTIST. We take pleasure in reproducing for our readers the following account, from Watson's Art Journal, of the "Exhibition of Jardine's great Organ in St. George's Church," New York.

The sudden and severe storm on Thursday afternoon, somewhat thinned out the audience on this occasion, but still several hundred persons were present, who braved the unpropitious weather, to listen to the grand organ splendidly interpreted by Dr. J. H. Willcox of Boston. The following artists assisted in the programme: Mmd. Manzocchi, Mr. S. B. Whiteley, M. William F. Williams and Dr. J. H. Willcox.

Dr. Willcox made his selections almost entirely from the modern organ repertoire, the exception being a lovely allegretto by Haydn, which was played with infinite grace and a delicately varied treatment. The other selections were an Offertoire by Battiste, a Communion by Wely, and a closing overture by Auber. In all these Dr. Willcox displayed his thorough knowledge and mastery of the instrument; he has a fine touch, his execution is clear and rapid, and he has a broad grasp of the instrument. His combinations are more numerous, more varied, and better contrasted, than those of any organist we know now, or remember to have known or heard. This may be accounted for by the fact, that Dr. Willcox is a practical organ builder, and thoroughly understands the character, weight and quality of each stop; so that he can calculate to a certainty their relation to each other in combination, as regards assimilation or contrast. This is, of course, only a part of the secret of his success; the rest will be found in his naturally fine taste, and his high artistic instinct, which control his knowledge in the reproduction of beautiful forms and fancies. In his selected pieces he was eminently successful; but the highest development of his powers was found in his extemporaneous performance.

In this department Dr. Willcox is, as far as we know, without a rival in this country. It is true that his lucubrations do not take the highest form of improvisation, such as has been recorded of some of the great lights of the strict school of organ playing. Dr. Willcox is confessedly a disciple of the modern organ school, notwithstanding his devotion to his old master Dr. Edward Hodges: but while his predilections, and his genius are with the Romantic, he has a fine appreciation of and a deep sympathy with the quaint, rich harmonies and the deep religious sentiment of the music of the mediæval Church.

It is this happy combination of the two schools, which invest the improvisation of Dr. Willcox with so much interest. But in addition to this he is rarely given to the commission of platitudes. His subjects, though generally modelled upon the Italian form, are fresh and bright in their character, and if not always original have at least, a certain idiosyncrasy which stamps them with the mark of individuality.

Dr. Willcox is not always equal to his own standard; sometimes he is chilled by an indifferent audience, and he locks up his best thoughts in his own heart; but we have heard him play when he knew that his audience watched him and could follow him with critical accuracy, and we have heard him start with a fine imaginative subject and work it through the romantic or dramatic form, with rare sequentiality, and with an amplitude of imagination which not only proved the extent of his resources both in melody and harmony, but also gave evidence of a fertile imagination, and a high feeling for the æsthetic in his art.

We now must touch upon the most questionable number of his programme, namely, his representation of a storm. This effect has been tried over and over again in the orchestra, and has always been criticized as of doubtful propriety, although the effects are so pronounced, that we think they are admissible in an orchestra. Dr. Willcox has conceived a very clever and effective storm effect. He presents a vivid, true picture, and he makes his effects, not by securing the aid of mechanical additions, but by exceptional use of the legitimate resources of the organ as existing in the regular schedule. His storm movement consists of a sort of a Siciliano movement, descriptive of the calm, but sensuous beauties of the country. It is a pastorage, and following the sounds of animated nature comes the rustic dances and games. In the midst of this the threatening of distant thunder is heard, and the storm breaks out in lashing fury; while the storm rages the grand power of the organ is developed to the utmost, but as it dies away, the faint murmur of a prayer is heard, which gradually swells out into a prayer of thanksgiving. The whole scene is beautifully conceived, and is worked out by Dr. Willcox with admirable skill, and with fine artistic perception. It was a performance of rare excellence and aroused the audience to a high pitch of excitement, and it became almost a question whether to award the highest praise to the conception and execution of the organist, or to the magnificent resources of the organ. Suffice it to say, that Dr. Willcox made a marked and positive success, which was in every way deserved.

Mr. Whitley acquitted himself with much credit; his treatment of the slow movement being specially worthy of mention. Mr. Jardine displayed several of the prominent and beautiful fancy stops of the organ to great advantage, and Mr. Wm. F. Williams brought out the exquisite Vox Humana stop into brilliant relief. Taking the exhibition altogether, Jardine & Son could hardly have desired a more thorough and successful trial of the entire resources of one of the noblest organs yet erected in the United States.

"Le Nozze di Figaro."—Mozart and Meyerbeer.

(From DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, Dec. 25, 1858. Written after the first performance of "The Marriage of Figaro" in Boston.)

Our "Athens" could scarcely pass muster as a musical city so long as it remained a stranger to this world-famous opera. It was almost like living in ignorance of one of the best plays of Shakspeare;—an ignorance, in this case, converted into bliss for some two thousand people—the largest and most cultivated audience of the season—on Friday evening. It was perhaps well that we were forced to wait until this master-work of genius could be put before us with such completeness and fidelity. Its floating fragments of immortal melody, which have mingled themselves in all our lives more or less from childhood, could now be brought together in their original connection, in a live and perfect whole, that would not disappoint.

For our public it was one of the best of lessons to have two such works as the Huguenots and the Nozze di Figaro make their impressions on us in immediate succession. No two works could be in greater contrast; it was the most imposing type of the extreme modern tendency in music—the music of effect,—brought side by side with one of the perfect instances of the pure, spontaneous process of creative genius, in an opera which for three quarters of a century has held its place as "classical" for just that reason. It was the comparison of a gorgeous, grotesque, bewildering and exciting romance of a Victor Hugo or a Eugene Sue with anything as quiet, sweet and genuine as "As you like it." The advantages of the modern work are all external, on the outside, extrinsic, properly speaking, to pure musical inspiration; advantages of form and treatment, due to improved means and mechanism, rather than to vital quantity and quality of music; the advantage of imposing combinations, new orchestral coloring, the dramatic employment of masses on the stage, great stage effects, rare studied contrasts,—and above all, dramatic intensity of well chosen subject and ingeniously elaborated plot. Meyerbeer's vast combinations are built upon a minimum of melody. Musical thoughts, as such, do not seem to come unbidden with him. He has no unfailing fount of inspiration to draw from. He is blessed with few real melodies. His poetic or dramatic theme, when he has chosen it and reflected on it and filled his mind with it, does not take possession of him in such an intrinsically musical way as to become fused in his imaginative consciousness, and so transmuted into a spontaneous perfect flow of tones. On the contrary, armed with all technical skill and knowledge in the art, with a tenacious, comprehensive brain, he studies out appropriate and striking settings of each situation and each least phase of his text; he does this with consummate judgment, only always with prime reference to effect upon a public; determined first of all that it shall strike; for he is not that willing, consecrated votary to truth for truth's sake, that he can be content to hide a talent where only the divining rod of sympathetic understanding in a few shall own its presence. He will run no such risk. He will make less gold go farther. So he constructs us an immense romantic melodrama, in the literal sense of that word, a grand historical picture in music, splendidly illustrating all the scientific and material resources of our modern music, impressing us with a sense of power, startling us with contrasts, taxing our every faculty of attention, interesting us intensely for at least once, but wearying heart and brain, and making us feel that, after all, a violence has been done to the living peace and freshness of our souls, that we have been subjected to a rude tumultuous stimulus ab extra, but have not tasted that divine refreshment, have not breathed that life-giving atmosphere of what is called repose in Art.

Now Mozart consciously attempts far less, but Mozart is unspeakably more, higher and finer than all that. For Mozart was a man of genius, one who wrought wholly by the spontaneous processes of genius. Melodies, fresh, beautiful, divine, such as are of no age, but in all ages speaking like a native language to all hearts, were his almost without the seeking,—so beautiful, that what he thought to utter in tones, came back to him a hundred times more beautiful and more significant than he had meant it:—ever the true poet's experience; and such surprises to oneself, probably, are just the only real poetry, and have the only right to go forth to the world as poems. The same, in the highest sense, with music.

The "Marriage of Figaro" is quite as genuine and Mozartean, but not as great a work as Don Giovanni. It is a lighter and an earlier effort—if such a felicitous creation can be called an effort. He had a lighter, nay an altogether poorer subject to deal with; one which lacked the supernatural and the tragic element afforded by the story upon which that crowning masterpiece of his complete musicianship was founded. What a plot indeed, for a nature so sincere as Mozart! Out of Beaumarchais' sceptical and sneering comedy, then all the rage, and even acquiring a certain consequence among the political signs of the times before the French Revolution by its smart satire on the unbelief and untruth of the whole social fabric,—a plot of miserable intrigues and tricks, in which every one of the eight or ten characters is intriguing against every other almost; a mesh of complicated love relations, in which each lover forfeits any interest you once begin to take in him, by showing himself insincere, jealous and at the same time false:—from such a picture of the prose side of life, Da Ponte made him the libretto. What was there in all this for one like Mozart? The characters, at least the principal ones, cannot interest us. They are in fact our old friends of the "Barber of Seville." The Count is Almaviva, and the Countess is Rosina, and Figaro, now on the eve of marriage, intrigues upon his own account to baffle the designs of the false Count upon his own pretty, bright Susanna, my lady's maid and confidant. Rossini, afterwards, brought just the right genius to the treatment of the first stage of this story. His music, so sparkling and facile, full of original and never failing melody, a music almost witty, delicious to hear, but never much in earnest, genial, but external, is in the very spirit of such comedy. Moreover, the libretto of the "Barber" is broad farce, lending itself more readily to comic music; whereas "Figaro's Marriage" is genteel comedy, abounding in the wit of conversation, hardly admitting of translation into anything so much sincerer and deeper as a Mozart's music must be. But therefore, and in spite of this, let us admire the genius of our dear Mozart all the more:—that he could transmute such a plot into so exquisite a musical midsummer's day.

He treats the subject in his own way, as he only could, by the necessity of his genius, which is perfect freedom. He is child enough, and has enough genial zest of humor, to make the exquisite comedy of the thing sing itself out to very ecstasy, while, at the same time, Shakspeare-like, he is continually getting very much in earnest, and idealizing these sportive amours of a day in melodies that spring from the sincerest depths and soar up to the heavenliest heights of real love. Indeed it seems as if we felt in such an opera of Mozart just the highest mission and symbolic sense of music:—the suggestion, through whatever low and common net-work of relations, of an ideal, pure, harmonic life; his music lifting every character to an unwonted sincerity; touching each emotion with a glow of holier inspiration; making these poor intrigues and alliances to typify a social whole of pure spontaneous spiritual interchange, entirely pure and free and vital,—a blessed after-world of innocence and love.

Look now at the characters and at their songs. Susanna, the fascinating, cunning, roguish, pretty lady's maid, could not, were she the liveliest of comediennees, act her part so humorously that the music would not lend a finer touch of delicacy and sparkle to it; her rapid recitatives are the ideal perfection of natural language; they are what talk might be with perfect organs in a perfect medium—"fits of easy transmission," as the electricians say. Then she is such a good sympathetic creature—so the music makes her—so kindly amused with little Cherubino's confessions. But Susanna really loves Figaro, and when on the eve of their union, after baffling the Count's designs, she sings Deh vieni, non tardar, can you conceive of any melody of love more heart-felt, pure and heavenly? Mlle. Piccolomini sang this with much fervor and beauty, while in the general presentation of the part, with all its archness, she was charming—thoroughly alive in all the action, (sometimes too much so), wearing the rhythmical chains of the music with most natural ease and grace. Her recitative was particularly neat and delicate; her small voice always musical and telling.

The Countess—(how changed from our Rosina, who is just what Rossini's music makes her, sparkling and charming, but external, without passion.)—is the one serious person of the play, though not above intrigue, and hardly interesting as the play-wright makes her. But what depth of longing tenderness, of sadness chased by gleams of golden hope, those lovely airs of hers reveal: Porgi amor, and Dove sono! Are there diviner melodies, unless you seek them also in Mozart? Mme. Ghioni appeared to better advantage in this part, although wanting in action and of marble coldness of features. She sang the music conscientiously, and with fair voice and expression, being greatly applauded in Dove sono. Her voice blended beautifully with Susanna's in the duet Sul aria, where she dictates the note,—a duet of such natural and unalloyed simplicity of melody, that the whole audience were entranced.

Let us thank Beaumarchais for giving Mozart a character so after his own heart, as the page Cherubino. What a charming part indeed! and Mme. Berkel had just the pretty figure for it, and enacted the bewitching boy to a charm. Her voice is thin, but her artistic conceptions were all good, and she sang with unction. He is a boy of some thirteen years, in whose breast the first vague stirrings of the master passion are just beginning to be felt, filling him with delicious and alarmed surprise. He finds every beautiful woman having a mysterious attraction for him, poor rogue; and the little songs he writes and sings to Susanna and his mistress: Non so più cosa son, and Voi che sapete, are his confessions, as serious and touching as they are delightfully comical. Oulibicheff sees in Cherubino Don Giovanni in the bud. By the music of the two operas this is quite transparent. Nay, we may go further and say, Cherubino is Mozart. But this thought we have no room to develop.

Figaro, now major-domo of the Count, has in Mozart's treatment a finer and more intellectual kind of humor than Rossini's barber. Besides, he has an earnest side; he loves Susanna, and it is with an honest glow that he boasts his wits a match for those of the Count. How finely Mozart's music fits both sides of him! That dainty, cunning strain: Se vuol ballare, &c., is the melodic motive of the character. The song Non piu a ulrai is the prototype of Rossini's Largo al Factotum, and not reached by that. Formes sang and acted it to perfection, as indeed he did the whole part. Figaro also has a very earnest air in the last act, where he suspects Susanna; and where there is real passion Mozart, like a bounteous creator, is no respecter of persons, but gives him his best to sing; the servant now being as much man and having as much use for music as his lord.

Count Almaviva, baritone, the central personage in all this, stands for the dissolute vices of the great, exposed and satirized. But Mozart will not let a momentary, superficial passion end with that; it goes hard with him to give up the game; he finds that he is seriously in love with Susanna; the duet: Crudel perché, is one of the most touching and impassioned love strains; he is better than he would be in it, for love and music are divine when they are real. And in his soliloquy before the wedding, where he vents his chagrin at being thus outwitted by Figaro, Mozart has given him a grand aria, with splendid orchestral accompaniment, altogether in his most noble and dramatic style. Sig. Florenza sang his music well, with a rich and manly voice; and looked the Count well, in his quiet attitudes, but in the intense parts is given to strange crouching postures and grimaces.

Of the minor characters we can only say that the small part of Don Basilio, (the only tenor in the opera, strange to say,) was well done by Mr. Perring, so far as singing goes; and that Signora Morra, as Marcellina, Herr Mueller as the gardener, and Herr — as Dr. Bartolo were quite acceptable.

But the charm lay in the opera as a whole. Its concerted pieces are as fine as its songs; especially that septet finale of the second act. Mozart's finales are quiet and unpretending as compared with those of Meyerbeer or Verdi; but whereas these latter are most artificially imposing, a tenor and soprano shouting in unison, while other voices put in mere phrases of accompaniment, properly belonging to bassoon or contrabasso or what not in the orchestra, in Mozart's finales each voice sings in character, phrases which seem as positively dictated by the personal as by the contrapuntal complication. The chorus, it is true, he uses unambitiously; it is a chorus of peasants, and they sing peasants' music, natural and simple festive strains. How quaintly beautiful that dance music! But it is all one continuous and living whole; a world of heavenly music; and it all floats charmingly upon a summer sea of instrumentation, which is so full and delicious that one is tantalized by the desire to listen to the orchestra alone. Ever at the right moment, each turn of thought, or feeling, or situation is met at once, as if by heavenly accident, by just the fittest instrumental phrase that mortal brain could possibly invent. The orchestral accompaniments afford such felicitous and sympathetic background, that it is as if the whole world took the color of our own passing thoughts and moods.

The performance of the "Marriage of Figaro" in Boston must have made its mark, and will be productive of great good. It was "experiencing" music, as some say of religion.

Weber's "Oberon."

[From the able analysis, written by Dr. James Facer, for the programmes of The Church Music Association, New York.]

Oberon, the Elfin King, having quarrelled with his fairy partner, vows never to be reconciled to her till he shall find two lovers constant through all peril and temptation. To seek such a pair his "tricksy spirit," Puck has ranged in vain through the world. Puck, however, hears the sentence passed on Sir Huon, of Bourdeaux, a young Knight, who, having been insulted by the son of Charlemagne, kills him in single combat, and is for this condemned by the Monarch to travel to Bagdad, to slay him who sits on the Caliph's left hand, and to claim his daughter as his bride. Oberon instantly resolves to make this pair the instruments of his re-union with his Queen, and for this purpose he brings up Huon and Sherasmin, asleep before him; enamours the Knight by showing him Rezia, daughter of the Caliph, in a vision; transports him at his waking to Bagdad, and having given him a magic horn, by the blast of which he is always to summon the assistance of Oberon, and a cup that fills at pleasure, disappears. Here Sir Huon rescues a man from a lion, who proves afterwards to be Prince Babekan, who is betrothed to Rezia. One of the properties of the cup is to detect misconduct. He offers it to Babekan. On raising it to his lips, the wine turns to flame, and thus proves him a villain; he attempts to assassinate Huon, but is put to flight. The Knight then learns from an old woman that the Princess is to be married next day, but that Rezia has been worked on, like her lover, by a vision, and is resolved to be his alone. She believes that fate will protect her from her nuptials with Babekan, which are to be solemnized on the next day. Huon enters, fights with and vanquishes Babekan, and having spell-bound the rest by the blast of the magic horn, he and Sherasmin carry off Rezia and Fatima. They are subsequently shipwrecked; Rezia is captured by pirates in a desert island and brought to Tunis, where she is sold to the Emir, and exposed to every temptation, but remains constant. Sir Huon, by the order of Oberon, is also conveyed thither. He undergoes similar trials from Roshana, the jealous wife of the Emir, but, proving invulnerable, she accuses him to her husband, and he is condemned to be burned on the same pile with Rezia. Here they are rescued by Sherasmin with the magic horn, Oberon appears with his Queen, whom he has regained by their constancy, and the opera concludes with Charlemagne's pardon to Huon.

Weber's overtures, though they may be thought to be the first in point of estimation, were always the last in their production, for they take the chief characteristics from the Opera itself, leading the mind to embrace, as it were, the general action. This property it is, that makes them so acceptable to the public, not only in their proper place, but as Orchestral music. The overture to Der Freischütz, before we have seen the piece, raises trains of indefinitely wild images and emotions, stimulating the mind to wander in search of the meaning of such "mysterious harpings." When the Opera has been heard, the book lies open—the connection is manifest, and associations are established, as full of fiery shapes as the drama itself.

Of such a kind is the overture to Oberon. It is in D major, and opens the main subject of the piece at once by a solo for the horn, which forms the symphony of the vision of Sir Huon, and indeed gives the second title to the piece, being one of the great magical agents. This consists of five bars only, and a few notes lead to a short trait from the chorus of Fairies, taken by flauti, &c., which presents to us these wayward agents of the night. A martial strain from the movement played in the Court of Charlemagne (the last scene), introduces the hero, and we are to gather his success from the union of this passage with a part of the trio, which is sung before the lovers embark for Ascalon. These, with their transitions and a passage from Rezia's scena in the second Act, carry us on to Puck's invocation of the Spirits. Here we have the preternatural cause of the shipwreck and subsequent distresses of the lovers, portrayed to us, and these musical themes, variously wrought, form the rest of the overture, which concludes with the melody from Rezia's scena, and, like the story, happily. If we say that this composition does not equal the overture to Der Freischütz, it cannot, we presume, excite the least surprise, for when the genius of the musician produced anything so darkly mysterious, so finely descriptive, so linked together by unity of plan and execution, so rich in its combinations, so powerful in its dominion over the soul? The overture to Oberon is certainly wonderfully original in conception, and gains upon us by repetition; but neither the traits of melody nor the harmonical combinations are sufficiently beautiful or frequent to enchain the mind of the hearer, like that earlier work with which it cannot escape comparison.

The piece itself opens with Oberon's bower. The stage is filled with "the pert fairies and dapper elves," who trip in such wild, yet soft and measured movement, that never do moonbeams fall on daintier Sprites. The music of this chorus is amongst the happiest conceptions in the Opera. The parts are syllabic and melodious, and the light strains for the dance intervene as symphonies. Nothing, certainly, can be more elegantly descriptive.

We cannot say as much for the song of Oberon ("Fatal Vow"). It portrays the anguish and dark passions which vex the spirit; but too darkly, as it seems to our notion of the subject, for a being so shadowy and elvish. Nor are we particularly impressed with the Vision. It would be a simple melody, but is quaint, and appears rather the off-spring of thought than feeling. The first fairy chorus—"Honor and Joy to the True and the Brave"—is very effective. It is interspersed by solos for Oberon and Sir Huon; and one—"The Sun is Kissing the Purple Tide," for the former, has one of those traits of melody which are scattered like flowers on our path here and there. The chorus is at last wrought into an allegro, the fairies singing an incitation to Sir Huon, while the Knight has a separate subject (a bravura), running against the syllabic floral part. There are certainly both force and effect throughout. In the English edition of the work, there follows an aria d'abilità, written for Mr. Braham, which we must consider to be anything but worthy of the composer. To our ears, the introductory and concluding parts are noisy and vulgar. The andante, in the middle, is smooth; but cannot redeem the movements between which it stands. In his treatment of this song, Weber has adopted the syllabic method; and in this, we are told, Mr. Braham curiously indulged in the license of musical embellishment. It has, therefore, been decided to omit this scena, and to substitute that written for the German stage, which embodies one of the leading and most charming motivi in the overture.

The scena which follows for Rezia ("Yes, my Lord, my Joy, my Blessing!") is agreeable, though not, perhaps, of the highest cast. But there is a fault in this song which is common to the author. It is too long—repeats too much, and even where there is diversity, that diversity is not sufficiently varied. We have called this a Scena; but the air, in truth, is only the introduction to the finale of the first Act. A dialogue duet succeeds, in which the bass, by its mysterious movement, becomes the principal feature, and especially by the transition to G minor near the close, before the parts unite in the allegro vivace.

The melody of this may be accused of lacking the lightness and grace that render soprano duets effective. But in the chorus which follows, the genius of Weber is to be recognized. The combinations to the words commencing,—

Fatima. Hark, lady, hark! on the terrace near, etc.

Rezia. Oh, my wild, exulting soul! &c.

are most judicious and striking.

The charm lies in the continual recurrence of a passage which appears with uncommon force in the various parts of the accompaniment. With this passage, it is to be observed, commences a transition, very finely brought in from the key of E flat to C natural. The soprano at the close has a separate melody, which is principal and brilliant, while the choral parts move on under it. The finale parts of this are among the happiest in the entire piece. The martial but sombre melody of the march is perfectly characteristic.

The subject as it proceeds, calls into more vivid action the preter-natural agency which the composer delights to illustrate. The music, therefore, rises. It opens with a chorus, "Glory to the Caliph," which commences in B minor, and changes afterwards very effectively into C major. It is also remarkable for its rhythmical iteration of two quavers and a crotchet, which conveys the accent almost throughout. It reminds us of a part of Preciosa, but is nevertheless very much of the same character as the preceding chorus, to which it bears an analogy, by being sung by the slaves of the Caliph. "A Lonely Arab Maid," a song for Fatima, consists of an Andante in E minor, and a movement in the major.

"Over the dark blue waters" is amongst the most attractive pieces in the Opera. The opening (Allegro con grazia) consists of two responsive solos in duet, first for the bass and tenor, and secondly for the soprano. Its style accords with the marginal direction, for it is at once free and graceful, with an originality in the structure of the passages, that interests the ear while it engages the attention. When the four parts come in, it rises to the more animated movement, which is taken as the principal subject of the Overture, and which here, in its first natural position, is very exhilarating. In the rolling bass passage towards the end, Weber gives a strong proof of his regard to instrumental effects—for it occurs to us that many composers would have transferred so much of it, as the voice could execute, to the vocal part.

We now arrive at a portion of the Opera, where, it may be literally said, appear those "fiery shapes" which have formed the delight and fame of the composer. The scene is the invocation of Puck to the Spirits, whom he summons to raise a storm and sink the vessel in which the lovers are embarked. It begins with a recitation, more powerful than the general tenor of Weber's writing in this species. Then follows an allegro pesante, commencing with the following lines:

Whether ye be in the cavern dark,
Lighted alone by the diamond spark, etc.

The musical effect is drawn from the modulation, which is unusually frequent. But when the Spirits answer the call, the stage, nay, earth and air seem to be peopled with ideal shapes. The mountain which forms the entire flat (to use a theatrical phrase) at the back, is divided into countless cells, from which issue all the pigmy inhabitants, while the stage itself is filled with the airy creation of the spirits of other elements. The movement is a rapid presto, but the vocal parts are syllabic. There are one or two striking proofs of the character of deep thought, which are so peculiar to Weber. To the demand,

We are here! we are here!
Say, what must be done? etc.

Puck replies—

Nay, nay, your task will be at meet
To wreck a bark upon this coast, etc.

The Spirits answer—

Nought but that? Ho, ho, ho, ho!
Lighter labor none we know.
Winds and waves obey the spell!
Hark! 'tis done! Farewell! farewell!

The passage that we would cite is the first line, "Nought but that." Upon these words Weber has put all the orchestra and the singers into unison, obviously to display the simplicity and easiness of the allotted task—and again in the words, the voices are in unison, and in slow protracted notes, each occupying a bar, to declare the solemnity of the purpose, while the trembling of the instruments conveys the first effect, as it were, of the agency upon the surrounding objects. This is certainly very masterly and very expressive. The storm then rises, and the orchestra is made the vehicle of the elementary confusion. Like the sea bird in the tempest, the composer seems to delight in the flash of the lightning, the roar of the thunder, and the heavings of the ocean, while he rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm.

Winds and waves obey the spell,

The lovers must now be considered as shipwrecked on a desert island, and we have first a most expressive, beautiful tenor solo, the Knight's prayer for aid. (No. 1, "Ruler of this awful hour.") Next (No. 2) comes Rezia's famous Scena, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," constructed on the same general plan with Agatha's in the Freyshütz, and well worthy to be ranked with it. As descriptive music (not imitative music—an important distinction, often forgotten), it is almost unrivalled. Justice can be done it only by a voice of great compass and power, inspired by a degree of intelligence and feeling unhappily rare; and every measure of the orchestral work is a study. Immediately after the Scena, the heroine will be understood to be suddenly abducted by a crew of circumambient pirates, who were cruising in the very bark which she had welcomed (in her final Allegro) as coming to her rescue. They carry the lady off, to be sold as a slave to the Emir of Tunis, having first cut down and overpowered Sir Huon. To him appears the Fairy King, who throws him into a magic slumber, for his more convenient transportation to the same Saracen City. The "Mermaid's Song" (No. 3) follows. As it does not advance the business of the drama a single step, we must suppose that it is sung to give pleasant color to Sir Huon's dreams. But we are too thankful for so delicate and spiritual a melody to inquire into its "raison d'être." Had either Shelley or Coleridge been a composer, he would have written something like it. Mendelssohn has, very adroitly, borrowed from it one of the loveliest phrases in his Midsummer Night's Dream Overture. This beautiful Aria leads up to a Duet for Puck and Oberon, "Master, say our toil is o'er," and a brilliant Chorus of Mermaids and Fairies (No. 4) which, though characteristic of Weber, have something of the sparkling clearness that is peculiar to Auber's best music.

Opera plots are seldom remarkable for lucidity or coherence, and the plot of Oberon is no exception to the rule. So we shall not attempt to set forth its complications in detail. Suffice it to say, that we next find Sir Huon's Squire (Scheramin) and Rezia's confidante (Fatima) transported, somehow, to Tunis, and living happily together as slaves of a certain citizen of that town. Their semi-comic music, though admirably suited to the stage, is omitted, because it might fall flat in the concert-room. Sir Huon is sent up through a magic trap-door to join them, by the infallible Puck. Rezia is brought to Tunis by her pirates. Knight, squire, and confidante unite in a lovely terzetto expressing their determination to rescue her (No. 5). Meanwhile, the Emir's wife, or Queen, having fallen desperately in love with Sir Huon, endeavors to win his affections, and brings her whole corps of Saracen Ladies of Honor to bear upon him, but he remains true to Rezia. Their Chorus for Soprani and Alti (No. 6) is wonderfully fresh and brilliant, without a trace of the unhealthy sentiment with which sundry more recent composers would have defiled it. The scene is interrupted by the Emir himself. He condemns Sir Huon and also Rezia (who "drops in" opportunely) to instant death. They are saved, of course, by Oberon's horn, which sets the Emir and all his myrmidons dancing in spite of themselves, and so enables the lovers to make their escape. Next comes a very splendid March (No. 7), in fact, a kind of intermezzo, to give time for the changes of scenery, &c., required by the Finale of the Opera, when Sir Huon fulfils his pledge by presenting himself with his bride before Charlemagne; and this March reproduces, in new forms, some of the loveliest phrases of the Overture. The final Chorus (No. 8), "Hail to the Knight!" might have been written for a Gloria in Excelsis. Indeed, there is little really fine, grave, and earnest music in opera, symphony, or sonata, that does not embody, in substance, the sentiment of words to be found somewhere in the Liturgy and Offices of the Church.

Oberon was its composer's last work of magnitude. It was brought out in London, 12th April, 1826, and received with enthusiasm. Weber died on the 5th of the following June. All his great works were therefore produced within only four years. The Freyshütz was first played in Berlin, 1822; the exquisite little Gipsy Opera, Preciosa, at Dresden, in the same year; and Euryanthe, at Vienna, in 1823.

Oberon proves that the composer died too young, and that the resources of his genius were still unexhausted. Comparisons, we know, are odious; but in command of musical language, and in variety, this Opera seems to rank above the Freyshütz itself, though the latter, because of the unusual intelligibility of its plot, and a certain fragrance, as of the forest and the mountain glen, with which it is permeated, will always be the more popular of the two.

Wagner on Conducting.

FROM FREDERICK HILLER'S Musical Letters.

Some time since, Richard, the Wagnerite, hurled, from his high and holy see in Switzerland, an anathema against the Jews; in his latest bull it is the higher and lower musical clergy who, for their boundless depravity, are laid under interdict. There are, it is true, plenty of heretics among them who do not believe in the infallibility which their prosecutor claimed for himself immediately he had left the Gymnasium. The schism which, in consequence, has been in course of development for a period of years, will not, however, be productive of any serious dangers either to Church or State.

The bull in question, Ueber das Dirigiren (On Conducting), affords any reader not concerned in the matter the diversion of a sort of Dante-like walk through hell—innumerable sinners suffer the most terrible of all punishments, such punishments, indeed, as even Dante himself never beheld: they are annihilated, struck out utterly from the book of the living. For who could ever live and work on, if Wagner had once pronounced his condemnation?

Joking apart, Wagner has published another pamphlet, bristling with examples of incorrectness and of injustice. Stupid young louts, on whom any one may impose, if he unites with a little cleverness a great deal of impertinence (p. 67), will regard it with amazement. More sensible people will say that it contains a certain amount of truth. But when a man runs everything down, he must, in this imperfect world of ours, be sometimes right. I know nothing so beautiful as to be without its weak points—not even woman—not even Wagnerian music is free from them.

The train of thought (?) in the pamphlet is somewhat as follows:—Conducting has hitherto been left "to be carried out by routine, and to be judged by ignorance." (No examples are adduced—we might mention Spontini, Weber, Spohr, or Mendelssohn). The manner in which music is presented to the public is not, however, a matter of indifference, since, naturally, it is only by means of a good performance that the public can derive a correct impression of a musical work. (Very naturally!) According to Wagner, everything connected with this matter is in a very bad state in Germany, a result attributable "most of all to the prejudicial qualities of the conductors." The old German Capellmeister "properly so-called," were "sure, strict, and more especially gruff, but respected." These gentlemen were, however, as far as regards training of the orchestra "for complicated modern orchestral music, unfitted for their task, and did not do what they should have done towards properly re-enforcing the orchestra, especially in the quartet." But they had "a sufficient justification in the unworthy mode of instrumentation, followed by Italian operatic composers, whose works were more highly esteemed than those of any one else, even by the Intendants of the large theatres, in consequence of the creditable taste of their respective Courts." Succeeding conductors did not, however, do any better. How should they? They generally reached their "good posts" (?) by simply moving up, "by shoves," or, sometimes, by "the protection of some princess's waiting-woman, etc." They necessarily were "altogether destitute of merit in consequence of their unworthy servility towards their ignorant chief, and their lazy musicians, but this was the very thing by which they raised themselves into universal favor." In more recent times (Heaven only knows how many more recent and most recent times there are, according to Wagner) conductors, also, were "berufen."

"These are our Music-Bankers of the present day, who have sprung from the school of Mendelssohn, or been recommended to the world by his patronage." Such individuals possess intelligence, good tone, and have, moreover, done something for the "elegant style of performance." "But the first thing in which these gentlemen are deficient, is that energy which can be given only by self-confidence reposing upon strength really their own. For, in this case unfortunately, everything: vocation, talent, education, nay faith, love, and hope, is artificial." To these more modern conductors belong, strange to say, above all, Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn themselves, who did not do as much as they ought to have done in Berlin. "Why did their strength desert them? It would seem, because they really possessed no strength. Then how must matters stand with their shadowy imitators?"

Wagner declines to enter minutely, for the present, into what has been effected by conductors who busy themselves with opera, "because the latter—and they derive a mournful right to act as they do from the miserable manner in which this branch of art is cultivated in German theatres—is regarded as an obnoxious daily task to be performed with sighs." He takes his instances from the concert-room where he never experienced any save unsatisfactory impressions. It was "from the singing of Schröder-Devrient" that he "derived his best notions with regard to the tempo of Beethoven's music, and the style in which it ought to be played." Another sublime revelation was vouchsafed him by the performance of the Ninth Symphony in Paris. The tempo, in the fullest acceptance of the word, is for him "the foundation on which a good performance is based, but who recognizes the fact?" Wagner has, it appears, suffered the most mournful treatment as regards his own music, and the various instances of this are narrated in the most exhaustive manner. Thus, though the prelude to Die Meistersinger, when he himself conducted it, entranced a small number of friends at Leipzig, it was destined under Reinecke's conducting-stick, to be hissed at the Gewandhaus. The time of this piece, together with the overture to Der Freischütz, and a few observations upon the mode of performing the Symphonies of Beethoven, and even (mirabile dictu) of Mozart and Haydn, are the vehicle by which he explains his views on conducting, the said views consisting principally in the opinion that an Adagio must be sung with a deal of tone; that an Allegro must have fire infused in it; and that a tempo intended to be quiet must not be scampered through—and culminating in the assertion that the correct manner of performing modern works (Weber's overtures, for instance) "does not consist in a stubborn adherence to the time, but in doing justice to the separate parts, which frequently contrast with each other."

"Dragging," Wagner goes on to say, "is not the characteristic of the elegant conductor, but scampering through and hurrying a piece is." This again results from the influence of Mendelssohn.

"Si Cain a tué son frère, C'est la faute de Voltaire."

Poor, poor Mendelssohn! Wagner is unable to stomach him, and we can easily understand why. But what can we say to the following? "Referring to conducting, he told me personally, on several occasions," Wagner states, "that too slow a tempo was worse than any other, and that he himself always recommended that the tempo should be taken a little too fast; that a really good performance, however, was always something unusual; but that the conductor could deceive his audience by only taking care that not much of the performance was heard, and this was best effected by not remaining long over it, but getting quickly through it." Any person who had only a superficial acquaintance with Mendelssohn, can imagine the way in which he advanced jokes of this sort.

* Berufen signifies "invited, summoned;" also, "having a call, a vocation." In which sense Herr Wagner employs the word, I leave the reader to decide. The effort of doing so will afford him much amusement, if he is fond of riddles.—TRANSLATOR.

We can imagine, also, his look, when Wagner, with his ceaseless flow of language, talked to him about the right tempo of one of Beethoven's minuets: and when Wagner "seemed as though he was looking into a perfect abyss of superficiality, on a complete void," he perceived only the mere shadow of the impression which the composer of Rienzi must have produced on the composer of the Midsommer Night's Dream. I myself, unfortunately, had but few opportunities of becoming acquainted with Mendelssohn as a conductor. But the supremely conscientious artistic carefulness which was inherent in him, and which grew to be a sort of religion, is apparent in the smallest of his songs. If, now and then, he took the tempo quicker than others would have considered appropriate his fiery temperament probably caused him to do so. Certain pianoforte pieces, too, of his own, he played at a demoniacally rapid rate, but correctly and beautifully notwithstanding—and so, most assuredly, he expected from his orchestra only what it could completely master, and what he himself felt was true and right.

It is not to be denied that, in certain particulars, relating more especially to the mode of performing Beethoven's Symphonies, Wagner is correct in his assertions; but he is mistaken in believing that we must have recourse to the oracle at Lucerne, to learn these things. The bombastic fustian, in which he frequently envelopes the simplest observations, is insupportable, while his self-glorification frequently becomes downright ridiculous. "Perhaps I am the only conductor," he exclaims, "who has ventured on reading the adagio, properly so called, of the third movement in the Ninth Symphony with due regard to its pure character as well as other things." Perhaps others, my respected Herr Wagner, venture to do the same thing, and perhaps they succeed in the attempt.

Despite all the "ignorance and insipidity of the musicians into whose hands the destiny of musical matters in Germany, and the utter indifference of German art-officials have allowed the conduct of high German musical interests to lapse, and who now feel secure in their places and dignity," there are some "really honest as martyrs of pure classical music." These Wagner proceeds to subject to a somewhat strict investigation. In the case of some he finds "squint-eyed envy united with helplessness;" in that of others, "honest intellectual narrowness, becoming dishonest from anger only." In the modern camp there is "a great deal to be concealed, and a great deal that should not be observed." We find in it "Gebildetheit,"* but no "education," and consequently a want of "true intellectual freedom," which held even Mendelssohn "for the earnest contemplator, beyond the pale of what belongs to our German art." (!!) "These elegant musical leaders interdict themselves from giving the reins to their 'Gebildetheit,' because they knew it could lead as far as Offenbachian scandal," and a deal more nonsense of the same kind."

*Perhaps the German neologism "Gebildetheit" may be rendered by a somewhat similar barbarism: "Educatedness" in English—and perhaps it may not. I again leave the matter entirely in the hands of the riddle-loving reader.—TRANSLATOR.

Wilhelm Friedemann Bach.

The immortal Joh. Seb. Bach left as an inheritance to the musical world ten sons, all of them more or less great artists and celebrated composers. His eldest and favorite son, Wilhelm Friedemann, was the only one who had the desire, till his melancholy death, to emulate his distinguished father. Wilhelm Friedemann was born in 1710 at Weimar, and died in 1744 in Berlin. Instructed by his father, he developed in earlier years his great abilities and talents as a performer on the piano and organ, and also in the theory of music, to such a degree that everybody admired him, and Father Bach himself, who was not so easily satisfied, looked forward to the highest results of his favorite son. His compositions were vigorous and profound, and he executed his musical inspirations on both instruments with a mastery which took every one by surprise. His diligence in the sciences, also, which he pursued at the "Thomas-Schule" at Leipzig, was cherished by his tutors with great expectations. After leaving the college he studied the law and mathematics—the latter science he preferred, and adhered to it under all circumstances to the end of his life. In 1733 he received a vocation as organist at the Church of St. Sophia at Dresden. In 1747 he was appointed director of music and organist at the church of St. Mary at Halle, on the Saale. After this appointment he was known and called "The Bach of Halle," "Der Hallesche Bach." But this, also, proved no place of abiding for him; he resigned in 1767, and returned to Leipzig without an engagement. His life at this period became a restless and fugitive one. Notwithstanding he was nominated Chapelmaster to the Grand Duke of Hesse Darmstadt, he never obtained an active appointment at the Court. Living as a private individual, sometimes at Brunswick, Göttingen, and Berlin, he died at the last named town, on the 1st of July, 1784, in poverty and total debility.

In looking at his character we cannot be surprised to learn his sad fate. All distress he brought upon himself by his rudeness of mind, his inflexible and artistic pride, his prodigious absence of mind, and his peevish and quarrelsome disposition. Given to drinking, he violated as a civil citizen all order, and broke their privileges very often. With such defects the greatest genius could not prosper. His father's unassuming and modest mind turned in him to pride, and instead of improving his talent with efficacy he relapsed, and when inspiration failed he tried to replace it by strong drink. Altogether he presented the picture of a modern proletarian artist; and highly endowed as he was, yet the proud hopes and great expectations his father and brothers cherished in him, alas, perished. His contemporaries have acknowledged him to have been one of the greatest organ performers and fuguists, and also one of the profoundest literati in the science of music in Germany. His excellent brother, Philipp Emanuel, asserts of him that only he was able to replace his father, Joh. Seb. Bach—the highest praise that could be bestowed upon him; but nevertheless he was despised by the public in general, entirely through his own faults. From his earliest days he gave signs of absence of mind, which he would have been excused for in later years, under the plea of being absorbed in his art, if he would have restricted himself, which he never made any attempt to do. The consequence was the circulation of a great number of very amusing anecdotes, which, however, turned out very seriously for him. During my residence in Berlin to study under Professor Zelter, who was personally acquainted with the brothers Wilh. Friedemann and Phil. Emanuel Bach, the professor often spoke of their fine compositions and exquisite performances on the piano and the organ, to which he had listened and when in good humor related traits of Wilh. Friedemann's absence of mind. Some of the following anecdotes I relate as told by Professor Zelter:—Friedemann being obliged to go out on business, and expecting during his absence the visit of a friend, wrote with chalk in large letters on his door that he would be at home at such and such a time. Returning earlier than he anticipated he knocked at his door, read his own handwriting, and went away to abide the fixed time. He called one evening on his friend, Joh. Fred. Doles, and not finding him at home sat down and ate his supper, which stood on the table, and put the knives and forks afterwards in his pockets. His friend coming home later, and seeing his repast gone, said to him that he hoped he had enjoyed the supper. He seriously denied it till convinced through the knives and forks peeping out of his pocket. As organist in Halle he very often forgot to go to church, and when his landlady reminded him that it was time, as the church bells were already ringing a long time, he went, entered the church at one door and left it by another, to go home again to resume his fantasias on the piano. Once on Whitsunday he made up his mind not to be behindhand with his duties, and went early to church and seated himself in one of the pews, with the keys of the organ in his pocket. In the meantime the congregation assembled, but he remained there sitting long after the church was filled, and every one was expecting the organ prelude; at last the congregation became impatient, looking up to the organ; he did the same, and tossing up his head exclaimed, "I wonder who will play the organ to-day." Sometimes, when in good spirits, he played on the organ very long during Divine service, and once, being reprimanded for it by the elders of the church, threw up his appointment, preferring to live in the greatest poverty. Leaving Leipzig with a small bundle under his arm, containing all he possessed, he fell in with a merry company of strolling musicians from Prague, and became one of the party. Near Brunswick they made a call upon a rich proprietor of an estate, who was a lover of music and an admirer of Ph. Em. Bach. The major domo told them to perform in their best style as his master had a celebrated artist as a visitor. Having played some pieces, Friedemann seated himself at the piano and played magnificently. At once a voice called out, "this must be my brother Friedemann or the devil." The brothers embraced, and Friedemann cried like a child for joy that his brother had recognized him by his playing.

Notwithstanding the high estimation he held his brother Emanuel in, they disagreed, Friedemann's morose behavior estranging from him his best and sincerest friends. Both brothers remained strangers till death. His brother Christian, called "the Bach of London" ("Der Londoner Bach"), hated and despised him. Stubbornness and drunkenness made his great and superior abilities unserviceable. When drunk he did nothing at all, and when sober he disliked composing, and preferred to extemporize on the piano, or to indulge in useless and sophistic disquisitions. This is the reason that only a small number of his works are known. Those published are—a Sonata in E flat major, Halle, 1739; Sei Sonate per Combalo—the first in D major, Dresden, 1745. The other five remained unpublished. He advertised many of his compositions, but the public, who did not like him, gave no support to his undertakings. Other works composed by him are—a Treatise on the Common Chord; 14 Polonaises; 8 Fughuettes; Music to the Advent Season; 5 Concertos for the Piano; 4 Fugues for the Organ with two Man. and Ped.; two Sonatas for two Pianofortes Concertante; Music for Whitsuntide; "Lasset uns ablegen," with Hautboys, Trumpets, and Cimbales.

His published and unpublished works are exceedingly scarce, and the musical public is greatly indebted to Mr. J. W. Davison for his spirited undertaking, in having edited, under the title, "Revivals," two beautiful fantasias of Wilh. Friedemann Bach, works which speak for themselves, and which not only advance the refinement of the divine art of music, but also restore our great ancient masters to the stage they must occupy if the better taste for music should predominate. Mr. Duncan Davison has published them in a superior and elegant style, giving homage to the great composer. Lastly, we cannot bestow enough praise upon Mme. Goddard, our unrivalled English performer on the piano, for the rendering and conception she has devoted to these two compositions, worthy her interpretation, which will give her the satisfaction of being the first to bring this distinguished composer (after having been so long a time nearly forgotten) again before the public.

Music Abroad.

London.

A WEEK OF MUSIC.—The present week deserves a notable place in the history of the season. It has been surfeited with music, as though concert-givers had resolved upon bringing all their force to bear upon it. In proof, let us just run through the record—beginning with the operas.

At Covent Garden on Monday, Don Giovanni was performed, with Mme. Patti as Zerlina, and Mlle. Tietjens as Donna Anna. On Tuesday, Mme. Pauline Lucca appeared, as Marguerite in Faust. On Thursday the opera was La Sonnambula, with Mme. Patti as the heroine; on Friday La Favorita was given; and for to night Le Figlia del Reggimento is announced. Adding to these five performances the four given at Drury Lane, we have to mention Faust on Monday, with Mlle. Reboux as Marguerite; Lucia on Tuesday, serving for the first and welcome appearance of Mlle. Christine Nilsson; and on Thursday Mozart's L'Opera del Cuore and Weber's Abou Hassan. It will be remembered that these novelties were set down for performance two weeks ago, and that they were twice postponed—as though the Fates were determined upon doing their part towards the musical congestion under which the week now closing has labored. Of course the operas are none the less welcome because deferred; it would have proved better for them, nevertheless, had they come at some other time. Finally, as regards the lyric drama, we have to state that Robert le Diable is announced for to night, with Mlle. Nilsson as Aïce—first time in England. Here, then, are nine operas, a number which should leave small margin for concerts. Concerts, however, have followed each other in quick succession, as though their rivals counted for nothing. Let us pass them in review.

On Monday the Philharmonic Society gave its fourth concert, whereat were played two symphonies (Haydn in D, and Beethoven in F, "Pastoral") two overtures (Oberon and Le Siège de Corinthe), with Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

On Tuesday The Prodigal's Return, a new oratorio by the Rev. H. F. Limpus, Minor Canon of St. George's Chapel, first saw the light in St. James Hall. We may have to speak about this work in detail, and criticism in a mere enumeration would be out of place. Enough that the music leaves one in no doubt as to the source whence Mr. Limpus obtained his inspiration. Handel is the composer's model, and considering what models find most favor just now, we congratulate him on his choice.

On Wednesday, Rebekah, a scriptural idyll in two scenes, the work of Mr. Joseph Barnby, was brought out in St. James's Hall, along with Handel's Alexan- der's Feast. Here, again, we have to resist a temptation to be critical. It must, nevertheless, be said that Mr. Barnby did not go to Handel for his inspiration, and that the music was well performed and well received. Also on Wednesday took place the annual concert of Mr. Walter Bache, a gentleman who is in the forefront of English adherents to the spasmodic modern school, and who very consistently fills his programme with the spasms of modern composers. Much of a doubtful, or rather not doubtful, sort was done on the present occasion: and we sincerely hope that those present were able to bear up cheerfully against it. Also, on Wednesday, Mr. Henry Leslie gave the first concert of his "summer series," and should have had the co-operation of Mlle. Christine Nilsson. Unhappily, that favorite artist was too ill to appear; but her place was taken by Mme. Sinico. Rossini's Stabat Mater, and a selection vocal and instrumental—including Mendelssohn's pianoforte Concerto in G minor, magnificently performed by Mme. Arabella Goddard and the orchestra—was presented to a large and fashionable audience.

On Thursday there was no concert of importance, and on Friday nothing of more moment than certain "benefits" took place. The week ends this afternoon with the first Crystal Palace summer concert.—Mus. World. May 14.

CRYSTAL PALACE. The following Compositions have been performed in the Twenty seven Concerts of the Winter Season, 1869-70. Those with an asterisk prefixed were played for the first time.

CONCERTOS AND OTHER INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS:—Beethoven—Pianoforte Concerto, E flat (Mr. Hallé); No. 1, C major (Herr Reinecke); Romance for Violin and Orchestra (Mme. Norman Neruda); Andante in F, for Pianoforte; Allegro from Violin Concerto (Mr. Carrodus). Weber—Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat (Mr. Paner); Concertstück for Pianoforte, F minor (Mme. Schumann). Mendelssohn—Pianoforte Concerto, G minor (Mme. Auspitz-Kolar); Rondo Brilliant, E flat, Pianoforte and Orchestra (Miss Zimmermann); Concerto for Violin (M. Sainton); Organ Sonata, No. 1, F minor (Mr. Archer); Organ Sonata, No. 4, B flat (Masters Le Jeune); Rondo Capriccioso, Op. 14 (Mme. Schumann). Bach—Prelude and Fugue, Organ (Mr. Archer); *Organ Prelude and Fugue, S. Ann's (Master Le Jeune); *Violin Prelude in E. Bennett—*Caprice in E (Op. 22) for Pianoforte and Orchestra (Mme. Goddard). Benedict—*Fantasia for Pianoforte on Der Freischütz (Mme. Goddard). Max Bruch—*Violin Concerto (Herr Joachim). Schumann—Pianoforte Concerto in A, Op. 54 (Mme. Schumann). Vieuxtemps—Adagio and Rondo (Mme. Norman Neruda). Ries—*Adagio and Rondo for Violin and Orchestra. Piatti—*Concerto for Violoncello.

VOCAL WORKS:—Handel—Acis and Galatea. Rossini—*Messe Solennelle. Mendelssohn—Lobgesang; Walpurgis Night. Beethoven—Mount of Olives; Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage. Macfarren—May-Day. Sullivan—*Prodigal Son.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE. Mlle. Nilsson appeared on Tuesday night as the heroine in Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor." A most brilliant audience had crowded the theatre, and the entry of the accomplished artist was the signal for a perfect furor of applause. The execution of the "Regnava nel silenzio," was received with most enthusiastic plaudits, the sparkling brilliancy of the last movement in particular being wonderfully effective. The exquisite refinement and abandon displayed in the love scenes with Edgardo could not be surpassed; and the excited passion of the scene when the marriage contract is signed—in the "Chi mi frena"—especially when she tore the bridal wreath from her hair and dashed it on the ground, was truly sublime. In the "Alfin son tua" and the following music Mlle. Nilsson displayed the greatest histrionic power, no less than the most extraordinary vocal skill, and all in the best taste and with most appropriate expression. Her concluding notes were followed by long continued bursts of applause and by enthusiastic recalls. Mlle. Nilsson's first impersonation of the season was quite equal to her former triumphs.

Last night, the two novelties which have been postponed twice through the indisposition of Sig. Gassier, were produced to a most critical audience. Fragments of the music of Weber's "Abu Hassan" have been familiar to most, but few would imagine the charming freshness of the operetta in its entirety, or the admirable symmetry displayed throughout both in detail and as a whole. The principal parts were Fatima, Mme. Monbelli; Hassan, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini; Omar, Signor Castelli; and The Caliph, Signor Raguer. The singing of the ladies was most charming. Mme. Monbelli progresses steadily in dramatic power, and this is now the only thing needed to place her on a level with our very best artists. She was enthusiastically applauded. Mme. Trebelli gave her best interpretation to the lovely music allotted her, and produced such an effect in one song, that she was compelled to repeat the first movement. This air "Darò una festa" is the gem of the work, but all is beautiful and appropriate. Signor Castelli made the most of his part without overstepping the limits of good taste.

Of the "Oca del Cairo" we may observe shortly that if it be not literally an opera by Mozart, all the music is Mozart's and worthy of its composer. The plot is of the slightest. The characters were allotted as follows; Fabrizio, Signor Gardoni; Don Beltramo, Signor Gassier; Pasquale, Signor Trevero; Lo Schiavo, Mr. Lyall; Giocinta, Mme. Corsi; Oretta, Mme. Sinico; and Isabella, Mlle. Pauline Lewitzky.

We are compelled to defer our notice of the piece, but a word or two on the debut of Mlle. Lewitzky is necessary. This young Russian lady is a pupil of M. Wartel—the instructor of Nilsson and Trebelli—and she possesses natural qualifications of the highest character; her voice is pure and capable of the most refined expression, her manner graceful and unaffected. Her training, doubtless, has been good, and she may fairly aspire to reach the highest eminence in lyrical art. The reception was most cordial, and her charming singing of "Come il bacio" at once enlisted the sympathies of the audience. We can only further observe that, thanks to Signor Arditi, the music of "L'Oca" went exceedingly well, and that the production of the two operas reflects the greatest credit on all concerned.

COVENT GARDEN. On Saturday Mme. Patti made her first appearance for the season: the opera being "Il Barbiere." The selection of a part like Susanna for the entrée of the charming singer needs no justification: for her piquancy and prettiness in the role are beyond all description. Mme. Patti's appearance at the balcony was greeted with a storm of applause warmly repeated when she entered for the cavatina, "Una Voce," and sang with the old accustomed brilliancy, the roudades with which the air is embellished. Her voice is in excellent preservation; her manner spontaneous, fresh, and full of charm; her execution admirable. In the less scene she gave "O luce di quest' anima," and as an encore "Home, sweet home" simply and touchingly sung. Throughout the opera the applause sufficiently demonstrated the hold which the fair artist possesses on her audience. Signor Mario made his first appearance for two years, and was received in the kindly fashion of English audiences when an old favorite returns. His Almaviva is a known impersonation: the quietude and ease of his demeanor were again exhibited, and the infraction which time has made in his voice as cunningly disguised. Sig. Cotogni was the Figaro—a better assumption than before, and well applauded after the "Largo al factotum." Sig. Ciampi, Sig. Tagliafico, and Mlle. Beaumeister made up the cast. The conducting of Sig. Vianesi was, as usual, extremely careful.

Monday was a field night. "Don Giovanni" with the Donna Anna of Mlle. Tietjens and the Zerlina of Mlle. Patti could not fail to draw a good house. The piquancy of the village maiden, the grandeur of the outraged lady are well known presentations; on this occasion they compensated for the faults in the rest of the cast; for Signor Graziani was too boorish a Don, Herr Wachtel's memory failed him in the part of Don Ottavio, and the Leporello of Signor Ciampi was dull. Indeed unreserved praise can only be accorded to the two principal ladies and to Signor Tagliafico as Masetto. Thanks to his support of Mme. Patti, the "Batti batti," was encored. A similar compliment was paid to "Vedrai carino." Signor Vianesi's conducting was careful, and in some respects saved an indifferent performance.

The entrée of Mme. Lucca on Tuesday was another event interesting to the subscribers. After an absence of two years she comes back to us with nothing of her art or popularity impaired. Her singing exhibits the same merits and the same shortcomings as before. Nought is altered. The opera selected was "Faust," which gave occasion for Mme. Lucca's strong individuality in acting Margaret. It is a conception with which Goethe's idealism has little or nothing to do. She puts Italian blood into Gretchen's veins as well as the Italian language into her mouth. It is a Margaret of force and passion, with impulses easily stirred to sin. Nevertheless in many respects it is a fine rendering—especially towards the latter part of the opera, where all is a turmoil of penitence and outraged love. The plaudits which followed all the points told forcibly of the sympathy between artists and hearers. The "Jewel Song" was naturally encored. Mlle. Scalchi was an effective Siebel, obtaining a bis for "Le parlate d'amor." Signor Mario's Faust was as polished as ever: his voice gave way somewhat in the middle of the opera, but recovered itself towards the end; his phrasing, we need scarcely add, was wonderfully artistic. M. Petit's picturesque demon is well known; so also Signor Graziani's Valentine, Signor Tagliafico's Wagner and Mlle. Anese's Martina. The Prince of Wales attended the opera this night. On Thursday Mme. Patti appeared as Amina in "La Sonnambula."—Orchestra, May 13.

LEIPZIG. A correspondent of the Athenæum writes: "Friday the 18th ult., being a solemn fast in Saxony, Prof. Riedel's choir treated us to Beethoven's 'Missa Solemnis' at S. Thomas's, the solo parts being taken by Mmes. Otto V. Alvsleben (soprano) and Krebs-Michaelis (alto), both of Dresden, Herr V. Melden (bass), of Weimar, and Herr Rebling (tenor), of our theatre. Herr Ferdinand David undertook the violin obbligato and Herr Passier played the organ. Were I to pass an opinion on the composition itself and its almost insuperable difficulties, I should but have to repeat what you said recently on the occasion of the production of the 'Missa' by Mr. Barnby's choir; but, though comparisons are odious, I have no doubt that had you listened to Prof. Riedel's choir, you would have had more reason to be satisfied; for, besides engaging such eminent performers for the soli, Prof. Riedel had the advantage over the English conductor by his producing the 'Missa' for the fifth time; and his choir has enjoyed such an excellent training that the performance was every way creditable both to the members and the conductor. Lohengrin has just been revived on our stage, and has been vociferously applauded, notwithstanding the scurrilous abuse Wagner last year heaped on this his native town and its music. Is not that magnanimous and impartial? Look, on the other hand, at Berlin, where the 'Meistersänger' has just been brought out! It appears from the reports that a regularly organized claque of partisans for Wagner, chiefly composed of members of the highest aristocracy, tried to procure a triumph for him. But their efforts only provoked the opposition to be all the fiercer in their counter-demonstration, and with the exception of two songs of Walther and a brief passage in the third act, the opera was unequivocally and most decidedly declined,—the milder term for rejected. Our witty, pungent friend Klad-derratsch of last Sunday makes his famous 'Müller' say to 'Schulze,' 'Is not that Wagner a great man? he not only composes the music, but his own text too. That is like Zelter and Goethe in one person.' And Schulze maliciously replies, 'That is to say, as if Zelter had composed the text and Goethe the music.'

GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS. The Signale gives a list of all the works performed in the 20 subscription concerts, besides the two for the orchestral benefit fund, of the past season, as follows:

Symphonies. Beethoven: Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9. Mozart: G minor, and "Jupiter." Haydn: "Oxford" Symphony. Schumann: Nos. 1, 2, and 4. Gade: No. 3. Schubert: in C major. One each by Grimm (in Canon form), by Vierling, and by Dietrich.

Overtures. Beethoven: Leonore, No. 3; Coriolan. Cherubini: Medea, Abencerages, Anacreon. Weber: Euryanthe, Oberon, Freyschütz. Schumann: Manfred, Genoveva. Mendelssohn: "Be-calmed at Sea, &c." Gluck: Iphigenia in Aulis. Mozart: "Magic Flute." Spohr: Jessonda. Gade: "In the Highlands." Reinecke: "Dame Kobold." Volkmann: Fest-Ouverture. Bennett: Paradise and Peri. Berlioz: to "The Roman Carnival."

Other Orchestral Pieces. Bach: Suite in D. Lachner: Suites No. 2 and No. 5. Mendelssohn: Octet (by all the strings).

Concertos for Violin. Viotti: in A minor. David: No. 5. Mendelssohn.

Concertos, &c., for Piano. Beethoven: in E flat (twice); Choral Fantasia. Chopin: Allegro de Concert. Reinecke: in F-sharp minor. Schumann: Concertstück, Concerto in A minor. Saint-Saëns. Mendelssohn: G minor. Hummel: B minor.

Concertos for Violoncello: by Schumann; by Golttermann.—For Flute: Concertino by Lobe.

Concertos &c., for several Instruments. Mozart: Serenade for wind instruments; Sinfonie Concertante for violin and viola. Bach: Concerto for two pianos. Reinecke: Improvisata, for two pianos. Spohr: Adagio and Rondo for two violins. Kalliwoda: Variations for two violins.

Smaller Solo Pieces. 1) For Pianoforte: Chopin: Notturmes in C-sharp minor and F-sharp major. Mendelssohn: Gondellied; Rondo capriccioso. Schumann: Humoreske; Skizze (for pedal piano); Fantasiestück ("Des Abends"). Mozart: Rondo in A minor; Fantasia in F minor. Beethoven: Dervish Chorus (transcription). Weber: Rondo from Sonata in C. Scarlatti: Presto. Rubinstein: Etude. Gluck: Chorus and Dance of Scythians from Iphigenia in Tauris (transcription). Alkan: Lied. Bach: Toccata.

2) For Violin. David: Andante and Scherzo Capriccioso; Variations on a theme by Mozart. Bach: Präludium. Beethoven: Romanza in F. Ernst: Hungarian Songs. Spohr: Adagio. Singer: Rhapsodie Hongroise.—3) For Violoncello. Bach: Air, Gavotte.—4) For Clarinet. Mozart: Adagio.—5) For Horn. F. Strauss: Romanza.

Choruses, &c., with and without Orchestra. Brahms: two female choruses with two horns and harp. Cherubini: Requiem aeternam (from the Requiem in C). Handel: Ode to St. Cecilia. Hiller: two Songs for Soprano solo and male chorus. Mendelssohn: Music to "Athalie"; and to "Antigone." Reinecke: two Songs in Canon style for female chorus. Mozart: Chorus: "O Isis." Richter: Kyrie and Gloria from his Missa Solemnis. Weber: Scene from Euryanthe. Schubert: Miriam's Song of Triumph.

Vocal Solos with Orchestra. Bach: Air: "My heart ever faithful." Bruch: "The Priestess of Isis in Rome." Cherubini: "Ego te amo." Boieldieu: Aria from "Jean de Paris." Graun: Aria from "Der Tod Jesu." Gluck: Aria from "Orpheus." Donizetti: Air from "La Favorita." Haydn: Airs from "Creation" and "Seasons." Handel: Arias from "Rinaldo," "Judas Maccabæus," "Susanna" (2), and "Acis and Galathea." Mozart: Arias from "Don Juan" (2), "Figaro," Aria with violin obbligato and Concert Aria. Mendelssohn: Arias from Elijah and St. Paul. Halevy: Air from "Les Mousquetaires." Rossini: Airs from "Tancredi," "Donna del Lago," and "Barber of Seville." Weber: two arias from "Euryanthe." Spontini: Aria from "La Vestale." Winter: Air from "The interrupted Sacrifice."

Songs with Piano Accompaniment: 4 by Schumann; 2 by Brahms; Beethoven's Liederkreis; one each by Schubert, Walter, Kirschner, Heuchemer, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Franz, Grädener, Josephson, Lindblad.

Of the above named works, twelve were heard in the Gewandhaus for the first time.

The different composers were represented as follows: Schumann 16 times; Mozart 15 times; Beethoven, 14 times; Mendelssohn 12 times; Bach 7 times; Cherubini 5 times; Reinecke 4 times; Rossini, Schubert, Spohr, Brahms, Chopin, Gluck, David and Haydn, 3 times each; Lachner, Gade and Hiller, each twice; Lindblad, Josephson, Donizetti, Bruch, Kalliwoda, Dietrich, Halevy, Rubinstein, Viotti, Boieldieu, Saint-Saëns, Walter, Paladilhe, Alkan, Vierling, Graun, Spontini, Ernst, Scarlatti, Volkmann, Singer, Hummel, Heuchemer, Kirschner, Golttermann, Richter, Grimm, Lobe, Strauss, Grädener, Bennett, Winter, Berlioz, Franz, once each.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The artists engaged for the Musical Festival at Whitsuntide are Mlle. Orgéni, Mme. Joachim, Herr Vogl (from Munich), Herr Bletzacher (from Hanover), and, last, not least, Herr Joachim. The programme is settled as follows:—First day: Sinfonia Eroica and Missa Solemnis, Beethoven (in the second work Herr Joachim will play the violin obbligato in the "Benedictus"). Second day: "Leonore" Overture—Beethoven; and Deborah—Handel. Third day: a miscellaneous concert, in which one of the pieces will be Beethoven's Violin Concerto, performed, of course, by Herr Joachim.

WEIMAR.—Compositions by Friedrich Kiel, Gustav Weber, Draseke, and J. S. Svenden, will occupy places in the programme of the approaching Beethoven Festival. Herr Nohl, moreover, will deliver a discourse on Beethoven: and Herr Porzes, one on the Missa Solemnis. "Why?" asks the Berlin Echo. "A printed pamphlet would answer all the purpose."

PARIS.—At Mr. Charles Hallé's second pianoforte recital, on the 23rd ult. there was a crowded audience, and the programme, including Beethoven's sonata in E flat and works by Bach, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Chopin, and Heller, was listened to with genuine satisfaction.

English Opera.

The idea of Opera in the Boston Music Hall, instead of in a theatre, was hardly so inviting to the imagination of most music-lovers,—particularly so late in the Spring and after a protracted surfeit of musical excitements,—as to bring back the crowded audiences to which Mme. PAREPA-ROSA and her excellent troupe had been accustomed. The principal singers were the same, with only one change (and that for the better), as before. The orchestra and chorus were not quite so good,—or did not seem so good in that place; their efforts being commonly too harsh and overpowering. But there was a great deal of good music given, and in many respects well given, in the short season from the 16th to the 30th of May inclusive. At all events that must be called a rich fortnight, which gave us two performances of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," two of Weber's "Oberon" (never before heard in Boston), and one of "Don Giovanni,"—to say nothing of "Fra Diavolo" and "Martha." The other evenings were devoted to the "Trovatore," Wallace's "Maritana," and Balfe's "Rose of Castille" and "Bohemian Girl." That was a much stronger English Opera Company than we had known before, that could grapple confidently, and triumphantly, with such problems as "Oberon" and "Figaro;" and it is doubtless to their not shrinking from such high, unusual tasks, that the Parepa-Rosa troupe have mainly owed their remarkable success throughout the land.

Such aspirations, bravely persevered in, raise and strengthen the morale of an artistic organization, and give them new power over audiences. Had the faith of these singers failed them, had they yielded to the apprehension that these things were too difficult, or too good for the public,—in short, had they followed the common example of Opera-troupes, and even of Oratorio Societies, they would have had the common luck of such, awakening no new interest, and not winning the prestige which they have won mainly by their mastering of these two great works.

(This by the way, as a lesson to Choral Societies who think, but do not think with all their might, of mastering such tasks as Bach's Passion Music.)

The un-theatre-like place was certainly a drawback upon these last performances; though the experiment was interesting, and on the whole worked better than we had anticipated. The temporary scenarium was rather sightly and convenient; but the stage room so contracted in width and depth and height, so surrounded with unused space in the great high hall, and the actors perched so high above the audience on the floor, as to give it rather the appearance of a marionette stage peopled by colossal figures. The whole thing made a contradictory impression: a full corps of professional and powerful means cooped up within a frame of private theatricals. The actors seemed to have hardly elbow room enough sometimes; and the perspective in some scenes was oddly at fault, distant bridges, hills, &c., showing a strange fondness for the footlights. But there was a goodly variety of scenes, most of them picturesque and tasteful; and we were surprised to find how effective, even in that small space, so bustling and crowded a finale as that of Fra Diavolo could be made.

On the other hand, the voices came out far more clearly and sonorously than in the theatre. Mr. CASTLE's tenor never sounded quite so rich and pure and strong to us; and he has gained in style as well as ease of action. Miss ROSE HERSEE was natural and full of life and charm as ever, particularly as Zerlina in Fra Diavolo, singing delightfully always; nor has Mrs. SUGUIN lost aught of her charm of voice or person. The Lord and Lady Allcash of herself and husband were capital. Mr. CAMPBELL being ill, the part of Beppo, the more important of the two bandits, was cleverly filled by Mr. HOWELLS, who commonly plays the double-bass so finely in the orchestra.

PAREPA herself was in fine voice and spirits always, singing and acting admirably,—in Martha, in Marianna, in the Trovatore, in the second performance of the Bohemian Girl; but she was at her greatest in the three great operas by Mozart and Weber. Indeed of all the voices, but for the continued hoarseness of Mr. Campbell, we may say they sounded better than ever in a hall of so much resonance. And for the same reason, chorus and orchestra were often harsh and overpowering. These forces, used to full swing in theatres, needed to be subdued and toned down, placed so far forward as they were in such a hall. Of this desideratum the excellent conductor, Mr. CARL ROSA, was evidently as well aware as anybody; but in spite of all his efforts, the instruments would play always forte, and often carelessly and coarsely.

Decidedly the best performance as a whole, this time as on their former visit, was that of The Marriage of Figaro. Figaro himself, to be sure, (Mr. Campbell), had to make the will serve for the deed in the matter of voice; but Parepa's Susanna, Miss Hersee's Countess, and the fascinating Cherubino of Mrs. Seguin, were almost all that one could wish, at least in point of singing; while Mr. LAWRENCE, as the Count, used his rich baritone artistically, acting not over-well, and Mr. NORDBLOM, the young Swedish tenor, as Don Basilio, improved his few opportunities to confirm the impression of the native power and sweetness of his voice and to show solid progress in his art. All went more smoothly, with more ease and unanimity, and even with more light and shade, in this difficult opera, taken as a whole than in most others, and it drew the fullest houses. One element we missed, which was a great part of the charm when this opera was given here by the Italians twelve years ago (see reminiscence on our first page), and that was the recitativo; so much talking often breaks the spell. Moreover, it was a pity that Figaro's hoarseness compelled him to omit, of all things, that first little air: Se vuol ballare (If the Count wants to dance, &c.), which gives the key-note as it were to the whole plot.

Of course there was great desire to witness for the first time Weber's fairy opera, Oberon. And, though the rendering, as a whole, was rather rough, particularly on the part of the orchestra, (which is indeed in some sense the principal and most suggestive part, and needs both fire and delicacy); though the scenic effects could hardly be much more than hinted, while the fairy folk were anything but tiny on so small a stage; yet the singing mostly was so good, and the music so delicious, so full of imaginative suggestion, so genial, characteristic, varied,—now heroic, now fairy-like, now gently but not deeply sentimental, now Oriental and barbaric, at times slightly comic and grotesque,—always original, always exciting to the fancy,—that few were disappointed.

The wonderful familiar Overture was heard with a new interest, because now its themes and motives were to be traced to their sources in the unfolding tale of knighthood and enchantment which it sums up by way of preface. Then came the chorus of elves and fairies (sopranos, altos, tenors) guarding the slumbers of the fairy king. A more delicate, exquisite bit of music does not exist; and it was simply murdered by loud singing and by coarse accompaniment. It should be as soft as possible, yet it was all forte or almost fortissimo! The first air of the waking Oberon was well enough omitted. (See Dr. Pech's description of the opera on another page). The spoken dialogue, here and so often afterwards, while it explains the story, breaks the spell too rudely, for this kind of opera especially. But here and there we have some bits of recitative supplied by Weber's pupil, Benedict, accompanied with characteristic phrases from the instrumental parts. And now we have Rezia in the Vision (shown to Sir Huon sleeping); her short air was sung in a pure and noble style by Mme. Rosa, ending with a beautifully prolonged high note. The heroic element awakes with the picturesque knight, Sir Huon, (CASTLE), and the inspiring chorus of elves and genii, Oberon and Huon and his Squire Scherasmin (LAWRENCE), sending the knight upon his mission (during which the trip to Bagdad is miraculously accomplished), with the alternating solos, went off quite effectively. The Oberon, to be sure, looked more like a stout Roman emperor than a fairy, nor was his speech or song suggestive of any fine remoteness from our every day street life. But Mr. Castle gave his music manfully, with clear, ringing voice, soaring triumphantly in the high strains. We regret that his principal heroic air here was not the simpler and nobler one originally designed by Weber, and which appears still in the German editions ("Von Jugend auf," &c.), instead of that which he afterwards substituted as a bravura piece for Braham; and which surely sinks to a lower and more common atmosphere of music; but Mr. Campbell sang it wonderfully well.

We must not attempt, however, to go through the opera in detail. All the music was extremely interesting; most of all the third act, beginning with Puck's conjuration of the spirits to raise a storm, with the magnificent wildly descriptive accompaniment. This inevitably takes a strong hold on the imagination; the music does it, even with such scant supply of scenery. Miss WARREN filled the part of Puck agreeably, and rendered the recitative quite well. Then the short prayer of Huon, tenderly sung; and the great Scene and Aria "Ocean thou mighty monster," which was sung sublimely by Parepa, with the full power and splendor of her glorious voice, completely realizing all the graphic, grand suggestion of the music, with its successive moods of awe and mystery, of brightening hope, of sense of deliverance and joy. It is after the model of the Scene in Freyschutz, and, as in that, the rapturous finale has already figured as the most brilliant portion of the Overture. The rising of the sun floods the whole harmony with light (full chord of C, as at "And there was light" in Haydn's Creation). The pretty episode of the "Mermaid's Song," that limpid, graceful and familiar strain (well sung from without), and the beautiful chorus of Water Nymphs, close what was here made an Act by itself, full of grandeur and of fine imaginative charm without a single moment of commonplace.

Next to the "Ocean" Aria, perhaps the most perfect impression was produced by the little Trio or Terzettino, in the last Act, between Sir Huon, Fatima (Mrs. SEGGIN) and Scherasmin, beginning: "And must I then dissemble?" This had to be repeated both nights. The Quartet at the end of the second Act, too; "Over the dark blue waters," with the stirring first Allegro of the Overture accompanying the cry "On board, then!" was finely sung and highly effective. Rezia's rapturous melody in the preceding scene, soaring above the sombre, heavy chorus of the Slaves and the retiring Harem guard, was one of the brilliant moments.

To the pretty part of Fatima fall some melodies of a pensive and romantic character, not precisely sentimental, and not warm or deep in feeling, but shadowy suggestions rather of that, which Mrs. Seguin sang with purity and sweetness. This was combined with archness and naive gaiety in the slightly humorous duet with Scherasmin: "On the banks of sweet Garonne," where both sang finely. The small part for Mr. LAWRENCE was eked out by a Song, at the opening of the fourth act: "Where love is there is home," said to have been adapted by Mr. Howard Glover from something in one of Weber's Sonatas. It was capably well sung and greatly applauded; but it sounds, the opening at least, for all the world like a commonplace English ballad, though the latter part is more like Weber. Weber, however, is one of the melodists whom English ballad writers have been prone to (feebly) imitate.

On the whole this music, with all the faults of omission and of commission, was exceedingly well relished; and more so on the repetition, when the obstreperous forces were somewhat toned down, and the whole thing went smoother. The music, with all its magic and its delicacy of sentiment, is mostly (as a painter friend said to us) "dry light;" these tones have no "tear" in them, as they say of singers. How could it be otherwise with such a subject, and with such creatures of the air for the dramatis personae? Mozart, though, would have humanized them in spite of himself, and made them sing in warm heart strains. There is true chivalric ardor, and something like manly passion, in the music of Sir Huon.

Don Giovanni (for the first and only time by the Parepa troupe in Boston) closed the season on Monday evening. With many shortcomings and much curtailment, it was a more spirited and telling performance of the great work than we could have expected. The principal characters (excepting Leporello, which it was self-sacrifice in Mr. Campbell to attempt at all) were really well filled. Parepa's Donna Anna was superb. She omitted, to be sure, the great dramatic recitative and Aria: "Or sai chi l'onore," doubtless on account of the bad English text, which, to say truth, is a great drawback throughout this opera; (none but the Italian syllables ring rightly in the final statue scene for instance). On the other hand she did sing the often omitted Letter Air: "Non mi dir," and all felt it to be one of her finest, highest efforts. Miss Worden made an uncommonly good Elvira; and of course Rose Hersee was as pretty a little Zerlina, and as tuneful, tender and naive as one could wish. Mr. Lawrence really raised himself in our estimation by his singing and his acting as the seductive Don. Mr. Nordblom made "Il mio tesoro" uncommonly impressive. Mr. Seguin's Musetto, too, was good. The Statue, "Fuori di scena," was by no means ponderous or solid, and indeed ludicrously feeble. The Quartet, Trio of Maskers, and even the intricate Ballet, went well and made their mark. And the vocal ensemble was spirited enough, and the principal parts in it so pronounced and individual, as for a while to almost cover up the poverty of the stage in the Ball scene.

The troupe have left us, to sing Figaro five successive nights in as many places, Worcester, Providence, &c.—(Is not that a sign of progress!)—and then they take their farewell in New York, and for the time disperse. Mme. Rosa and her husband will return to her home in England for some months of rest; but they will no doubt be warmly welcomed back here before another Spring.

Handel and Haydn Society.

The annual meeting of this society was held in Bumstead Hall last evening. The president, Dr. J. Baxter Upham, presented his annual report, which was duly accepted. In opening he referred to the deficiency in the funds of the society and said that the treasurer had been authorized to negotiate a temporary loan to meet the immediate wants of the society, while some of the creditors had expressed a willingness to allow their bills to remain unpaid for the present. Thirty-five new members have been admitted during the year, four have resigned and four have been honorably discharged. In the same time ninety-one have been suspended under the new article of the by-laws, proposed at the last annual meeting and adopted last September, of which number seven were subsequently reinstated, for reasons that were deemed sufficient. Two members of the society have deceased during the year. The number of rehearsals was 29; average attendance, 306; a calculation shows that the attendance of gentlemen has been better than that of the lady members. The number of public performances has been fewer than usual, and was only four besides the assistance rendered at the Peace Jubilee and at the celebration of the Mercantile Library Association.

He alluded to the attention given to Bach's Passion Music, and said that the reasons for its non-performance were many and sufficient; an orchestra sufficient in the double functions demanded could not be obtained. It is hoped that it may yet be produced. The annals of the society will probably be ready for publication during the coming year. He suggested that it might be well to advance the standard of requirement in the examination of candidates for admission; complimented the Salem Oratorio Association, and in conclusion referred in terms of eulogy to the invaluable aid and coöperation of their excellent conductor, Carl Zerrahn, to the accompanist, Mr. Parker, and to Mr. O. J. Faxon, who retires from the vice-presidency of the association, after filling that office for eleven years. The coming year will furnish an opportunity for the second of the regular series of triennial festivals, so happily inaugurated two years since. On motion of Mr. James Sharpe, a resolution complimentary to Mr. Faxon was afterwards passed by the society.

The librarian reported very few changes in the condition of the library during the year. No books were purchased during the year, but 650 copies of Bach's Passion Music were added, which were ordered last year. The treasurer's report showed the expenses for the year were $5493 37; receipts, $5098 13; balance due the treasurer $395 25. A large amount of bills due lie over till another year. The total deficit for the year was about $2000. The reports were accepted.

Attention having been called by a member of the society to the reports circulating in the newspapers concerning a visit of the society to New York city next month to attend the Beethoven celebration, Mr. Barnes informed the society that they were all unauthorized, but that an agent from New York had visited him and offered to pay all the expenses of five hundred members of the Handel and Haydn Society to New York and return, if they could be prevailed upon to attend. A meeting of the society is to be held this evening to consider the matter.

The following named gentlemen were elected officers for this year:

President, Dr. J. Baxter Upham; Vice-President, S. Lothrop Thorndike; Secretary, Loring B. Barnes; Treasurer, Geo. W. Palmer; Librarian, George H. Chickering; Directors, George Fisher, Samuel Jennison, Levi W. Johnson, A. Parker Brown, Edward Faxon, T. Frank Reed, Charles H. Johnson, W. O. Perkins.

A vote of thanks was passed to the retiring directors, after which the society adjourned.—Advertiser, 31st.

Choral Societies in New York.

(From the Evening Post, May 5.)

The musical societies in this city are about bringing their labors to a close for the present season. The record for the past few months has not been wholly satisfactory. As the metropolis of America, New York claims to take the lead in art as well as in wealth and commerce, but, disguise the fact as we may, this claim, as far as music is concerned, is quite unfounded. In the higher classes of vocal music Boston is ahead of us, while London is so far in advance that there is no comparison.

We have already in these columns explained the reason of this lack of precedence in choral singing in this city. It lies in the fact that we have too many choral societies, and that they are actuated by jealousies towards each other. They are, moreover, managed too much in the interest of individuals. It is but right that a conductor or leader should be the prominent man in the society; but it is not right that he should be the centre of a clique who pit him against all other conductors.

The managers and directors of the different musical societies in this city know perfectly well that their organizations are maintained only with the greatest difficulty, and that available men of influence are shy of accepting the offices of president or treasurer. To the public the moribund condition of these societies is evidenced by the occasional concerts they give, and which are attended chiefly by the friends of the performers and others who never pay for a ticket. Under these circumstances the recent performance of the "Elijah" by the Harmonic Society was deserving of far more credit than it received; for it showed a commendable desire to prove the vitality of the society even at the risk of adverse criticism. Meritorious as were many points in that performance, both conductors and members are well aware that it was not a success.

Some years ago the Harmonic Society was a flourishing, leading institution of its kind. From its loins sprang the Mendelssohn Union, and from the latter came the Berge Choral Union. These three societies include talent and ability; but it is absurd to suppose that either of them is as good as a united society combining all their powers would be.

The dispersion of vocal powers into a variety of channels is certainly to be regretted. It is not for us to inquire into or to state the reasons from which we think all the painful results of failure arise to societies generally. We can only lament that they exist. Their condition is such that whenever they appear in public their efforts are plainly indicative of a great want of preparation, succeeded, of course, by inefficient performances. Undoubtedly the bane of the whole thing lies in the unfortunate existence of a multitude of small societies, presided over by music teachers whose personal and professional interests are the first consideration, and who, influenced by mere amiable friendship, seek to perpetuate the person rather than the art whose interests they are supposed to advocate. It is thus division of sentiment and feeling usurps the place of united purpose and action, and has hitherto rendered abortive every attempt to create a large and efficient chorus in this city.

THE CHURCH MUSIC ASSOCIATION.

Of the concerts of this society we have already had occasion to speak in high terms; and at the present writing it would appear that to this society alone are we to look to for the stability and grandeur of choral effects in which our other societies are wanting. This society was started upon a basis possessing many attributes of success. It is now the largest vocal society in the city. Supported by from eighty to one hundred subscribers of $100 each, there has been no lack of funds for carrying through the intentions of its promoters with a generous hand. The choruses have been sung by its associate members to the number of nearly three hundred, accompanied by an orchestra of upwards of seventy performers. Two performances have already been given to the largest audiences ever witnessed in any concert room in this city. The chorus itself, composed of some of our people moving in easy and refined circumstances, and of professional artists who enter upon a general footing, is presided over by one who has proved himself to be a conductor of consummate power and influence in the control of large masses of vocal and instrumental performers. Dr. James Pech has brought his orchestra and chorus, with comparatively few rehearsals, to a very finished point of execution. It is, of course, a matter of time to secure all the variety of light and shadow which it is evidently his desire and purpose to obtain. From the rapid progress of the society towards perfection, the executive committee must have been entirely freed from conflicting feeling and opinion; for their action has been both positive and certain, and everything they have attempted has been carried through with success. The chorus under their care and protection has from the beginning uninterruptedly increased in numbers, and is gracefully submitting to the instructions and critical requirements of their conductor.

The subscription list for the second season is already open, and several thousand dollars promised. Several interesting works for orchestra and chorus are to be promptly procured from Europe. The chorus, which during the past season has passed through judicious weeding, will, we understand, during the coming summer and fall months be further pruned. The executive committee are evidently impressed with the fact that, if excellent performances are to be given the attendance at rehearsals must also continue to be certain and regular.

The results of the first season of the Church Music Association have proved highly satisfactory, and the interests of musical art will undoubtedly be benefited. To our young people such an association is invaluable in the training and education of the amateurs of the city, and especially to those who, to use the words of Dr. Pech in his admirable synopsis of the concerts, need to be told "that ability to sing accurately a quartet or chorus is of far higher value than capacity to execute the most brilliant aria."

The next and last concert will take place at Steinway Hall, Wednesday, May 18, with an orchestra and chorus of about three hundred. It will undoubtedly be as successful as the former ones.

There was at the initiation of the plan on which the Church Music Association is based a tendency to exclusiveness, which gave offence to many musical amateurs; but this exclusiveness was more fancied than real. The Church Music Association and its promoters have enemies who are disposed to exaggerate whatever faults may exist in its organization.

THE MADRIGAL MANIA.

Some of the pleasantest chorus music which has yet been heard in this city has been provided by the madrigal societies, one of which gives a concert at Steinway Hall to-night. The music of madrigals is, of course, of varying merit, but a few of those which have lately been heard in public have caught the popular ear as thoroughly as much of what is commonly called popular music. The harmonized melody "Dorothy," though not, strictly speaking, a madrigal, is always a winning card at madrigal concerts.

It would be impossible to praise too highly the efforts of those ladies and gentlemen who have met together to rehearse these madrigals, and are now singing them in public for a most worthy charity. Love of art and true benevolence are happily combined, and would disarm the shafts of criticism even if the performance were lacking in completeness.

There are two madrigal societies in this city, and it is a notable fact that neither of them has any definite name. The ladies and gentlemen who will sing to-night can only be designated as those trained by Dr. Brown. The other society has met a decided loss in the death of its lamented president, Mr. S. Weir Roosevelt; but we understand that its organization will be continued, and that in the fullness of time concerts will be given. We shall be glad to chronicle the union of these two associations into one vigorous and healthy musical society.

MINOR ORGANIZATIONS.

Among the numerous musical organizations of the city is the Mendelssohn Glee Club, which sang some German songs at the Alide Topp benefit on Tuesday night. This society has devoted great care to the technicalities of male voice singing. Of the Berge Choral Union we should like to hear something more. It modestly keeps itself in the background. The Mendelssohn Union is so very quiet that it may be said of it as of a scriptural personage, "It has gone on a journey, peradventure it sleepeth." The Mendelssohn is a large society, and ought not to be classed among minor organizations; but its inactivity of late renders the general public in doubt as to whether it yet exists. It has in Mr. Thomas a leader of no ordinary capacity. The Harmonic Society has in Mr. Ritter a conductor of unusual musical erudition. We presume that both of these societies will enter the field next season with renewed vigor; and with their performances and those of the Church Music Association choral music will probably be better represented here next winter than last. We should be happy to hear that the different societies had united in one grand organization, but of that we fear there is no hope.

Last month five musical instruments were unearthed at Pompeii. They are in excellent state of preservation, and somewhat like our clarinet; the lower half of the instrument is silver, the upper half and mouthpiece are ivory.

Books.

- EHLERT'S LETTERS ON MUSIC. Translated by Fanny Raymond Ritter. Cloth, 1.75
These entertaining letters to a Lady are not filled with technicalities, but are calculated to interest as well as instruct. They have met with a large circulation and extended success in Germany.
WINNER'S NEW SCHOOL FOR THE CABINET ORGAN. 75
Designed to aid those who seek to learn without a teacher, containing also a large number of the popular melodies of the day.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Chamouni ad Sunrise.

From the German of FRIEDRIKE BRAUN.

From the deep shadow of the still fir groves
Trembling I look to thee, eternal height!
Thou dazzling summit, from whose top my soul
Floats, with dimmed vision, to the infinite.

Who sank in earth's firm lap the pillars deep
Which hold through ages thy vast pile in place?
Who reared on high, in the clear ether's vault,
Lofty and strong, thy ever radiant face?

Who poured you forth, ye mountain torrents wild,
Down thundering from eternal winter's breast?
And who commanded, with almighty voice,
"Here let the stiff'ning billows find their rest?"

Who points to yonder morning star his path?
Borders with wreaths of flowers the eternal frost?
To whom, in awful music, cries thy stream,
O wild Arveiron! in fierce tumult tost?

Jehovah! God! bursts from the crashing ice,
The avalanche thunders down its steep's the call;
Jehovah! rustle soft the bright tree tops,
Whisper the silver brooks that murmuring fall.

NOTE. It is very evident that Coleridge got the best part of his Hymn to Mt. Blanc from the piece translated above. His friend who edited the "Table Talk" admits that he was largely indebted to it, although excusing him from the charge of plagiarism on the somewhat singular ground that the obligation is too evident to be concealed. We append the original.

Aus tiefem Schatten des schweigenden Tannenbains
Erblick' ich beband dich, Scheitel der Ewigkeit, Blendender Gipfel, von dessen Höhe
Abtundend mein Geist ins Unendliche schwebet!

Wer senkte den Pfeiler tief in der Erde Schooss,
Der, seit Jahrtausenden, fest deine Masse stützt?
Wer thürmte hoch in des Aethers Wölbung
Mächtig und kühn dein umstrahltes Antlitz?

Wer goss Euch hoch aus des ewigen Winters Reich, O Zickenströme, mit Donberger's, herab?
Und wer gebietet laut mit der Allmacht Stimme:
'Hier sollen ruhen die starrenden Wogen?'

Wer zehlnet dort dem Morgensterne die Bahn?
Wer kränzt mit Blüten des ewigen Frostes Saum?
Wem tönt in schrecklichen Harmonieen,
Wilder Arveiron, dein Wogentümmel?

Jehovah! Jehovah! krach't's im berstender Eis;
Lavinendonner rollen's die Kluft hinab;
Jehovah! rausch't's in den hellen Wipfeln,
Flüstert's an reisenden Silberbächen.

Wagner on Conducting.

Translations, for this Journal, from "Ueber das Dirigiren," by RICHARD WAGNER.

I.

In what follows I propose to give my experiences and observations on a field of musical activity, which has thus far been abandoned only to routine in practice, and ignorance in judgment. For my own opinion on the matter I will not appeal to the Conductors themselves, but to the musicians and singers, since they alone have the right feeling as to whether they are well or badly conducted; and on this point they can only be enlightened when they chance for once—a very exceptional occurrence—to be well conducted. To this end I have no thought of setting up a system, but shall proceed by noting down a series of observations, which I propose occasionally to continue.

Of course it cannot be a matter of indifference to composers, in what manner their works come to public hearing; for very naturally the public can only get the right impression of a musical work through a good performance, whereas it may not recognize as such the wrong impression produced by a bad performance. Many an one will become conscious how the matter stands with most performances in Germany, not only of operas, but also of works for the concert room, if he follows with attention, and with knowledge of his own, my close examination of the elements of such performances.

The weakness of the German orchestras, both as regards their constitution and achievements, which reveal themselves to one who is versed in these matters, proceed too much for the most part from the harmful peculiarities of their conductors, as Kapellmeisters, Music-directors, &c. In their selection and appointment the higher powers in our Art institutions proceed the more ignorantly and carelessly, the more difficult and important the requirements of an orchestra have become. When the highest problems for the orchestra were contained in a Mozart score, there stood at its head the regular German Kapellmeister, always a man of weighty aspect (at least in the place), sure, severe, despotic, and especially gruff. The last of this tribe known to me was Friedrich Schneider in Dessau; Guhr in Frankfurt, too, belonged to it. What clever things they could do in their way,—these men and the like of them, who in their relation to the newer music came to be designated as "pig-tails" (Zöpfe), I learned by experience some eight years since through a performance of my "Lohengrin" in Carlsruhe under the direction of the old Kapellmeister Strauss. This exceedingly worthy man evidently stood before my score with anxious shyness and a sense of strangeness: but his anxious care imparted itself to his conducting of the orchestra, which was as precise and energetic as could be conceived of; you saw that all obeyed him as a man who knows no nonsense and keeps his people well in hand. In a remarkable manner this old gentleman was the only Conductor that occurs to me by name, who had real fire; his tempi frequently were rather over-fast than dragging, but always executed clearly and with nerve.—A similar good impression I received from the like achievement of H. Esser in Vienna.

What must have utterly unfitted these Conductors of the old stamp, supposing them less gifted than those I have named, for the training of the orchestra on the coming up of the more complicated modern orchestra music, was first of all their old habit in regard to what seemed necessary or sufficient in the composition of the orchestra, looking as they did only at the tasks until then offered them. I have not known of one example anywhere in Germany, where an orchestra has been fundamentally reconstructed out of regard to the requirements of the newer instrumentation. Now as before, in the great orchestras, musicians are promoted to the places of first instruments according to the law of priority in service (Anziennitätsgesetze); and accordingly they take the first parts only when their powers begin to weaken, while the younger and cleverer musicians sit at the second desks, a disadvantage which is particularly noticeable in the wind instruments. This bad state of things of late has been improving, to be sure, thanks to intelligent efforts and to the just perceptions of the musicians in question; but on the other hand a different proceeding has led to lasting evil consequences, especially in the manning of the stringed instruments. Here, without any consideration, the second violins, and above all the violas, continue to be sacrificed. This latter instrument everywhere is for the most part played by fiddlers who have grown invalid, or even by enfeebled blowers, after they have also learned to play the violin a little; at the most they seek to bring one really good tenor player to the first desk, chiefly on account of the solos which occur now and then; but I have seen them help themselves out with the leader (Vorspieler) of the first violins in such a case. In a grand orchestra with eight violists I have found only one, who could correctly execute the frequent difficult passages in one of my later scores. Now this mode of proceeding, excusable enough out of humane considerations, is owing to the character of the earlier instrumentation, in which the viola is mostly used merely to fill out the accompaniment, and has found sufficient justification down to the most recent times through the unworthy instrumentation of the Italian Opera composers, whose works form an essential and favorite element of the German operatic repertoire. Since these darling operas are made the very most of by the great theatre intendants, after the laudable taste of their courts, it is no wonder that the claims made upon these gentlemen by unesteemed works should always seem to them impracticable, except when the Kapellmeister is a man of weight and serious aspect, and especially a man who knows himself right well just what is needed for an orchestra to-day. This last necessity has for the most part escaped our older Kapellmeisters; particularly the necessity of increasing the stringed instruments of our orchestras in due proportion to the so largely increased number and employment of the wind instruments; for such scanty concessions as have been made of late in this direction, now that the disproportion had become entirely too obvious, have not yet sufficed to bring our famous German orchestras up to a level with the French, to which they are still utterly inferior in the strength and efficiency of the violins, and more particularly of the violoncellos.

Now what has escaped those Kapellmeisters of the old stamp, is just what it should be the first and proper problem of the Conductors of a newer date and style to recognize and carry out in practice. But good care has been taken, lest these should prove dangerous to the Intendants, and particularly lest the weighty authority of the able "pigtailed" of the old times should pass over into them!

It is important and instructive to note how this newer generation, which now represents the musical affairs of Germany collectively, attained to office and its dignities.—Since we owe the support of orchestras directly to the existence of court theatres, great and small, at all events to the Theatre, we must be content to let the Directions of these theatres of the German nation designate those musicians, whom they regard as called, often for half a century through, to represent the dignity and spirit of the German music. The most of these musicians thus preferred must know how they come to this distinction, since in very few of them can the unpractised eye see through what merits they have reached it. Your regular German musician reached these "good positions," as they were considered only by their patrons, mostly through the simple application of the vis inertiae: they were shoved up each in his turn. I believe that the great court orchestra of Berlin has got most of its conductors in this way. Sometimes, however, it is done by leaps: entirely new grandees thrive suddenly under the protection of the maid of honor of a princess, &c. The injury which these beings, so without authority, have become to the nurture and training of our greatest orchestras and operatic theatres, can hardly be estimated. Utterly unmeritorious, they have only been able to maintain themselves in their position by their subserviency to an ignorant supreme chief, who commonly, however, thinks that he knows everything, as well as by a flattering way of accommodating themselves to the demands of laziness on the part of the musicians under them. By abandoning all artistic discipline, which to be sure they were incompetent to maintain, as well as by a cringing acquiescence in every stupid suggestion from above, these masters hoisted themselves up into general favor. Every difficulty of study was gotten over with a pathetic appeal to the "ancient glory of the N. N. Kapelle" amid mutual smirks. Now who remarked, that the performances of this renowned institution were sinking deeper year by year? Where were the real masters, to judge these? Certainly not among the reviewers, who only bark when their mouths are not stopped; and how they should be stopped was a thing understood all round.

But in more recent times these Conductor places have been also filled by men specially appointed: they procure some clever routine musician from some place or other, according to the need or humor of the supreme direction; and this is done in order to engraft an "active force" upon the inertia of the usual Kapellmeister. These are the people who know how to "bring out" an opera in fourteen days, how to "cut" or cross out very vigorously, and how to compose effective cadenzas into other people's scores to please the singers. To this sort of knack the Dresden Court Kapelle owes one of its most vigorous Conductors.

At times too they proceed according to actual reputation: "musical celebrities" must be imported. The theatres have none such to show: but the Singakademien and Concert Societies afford such, at least according to the eulogistic feuilletons of the great political newspapers, every two or three years or so. These are our present musical bankers, such as have proceeded from the school of Mendelssohn, or have been commended to the world through his protection. An altogether different stamp of men these from the helpless aftergrowth of our old "pigtailed,"—not musicians who have grown up in orchestras and theatres, but brought up most respectably and properly in the newly founded Conservatories, composing Oratorios and Psalms, and listening to the rehearsals of the subscription concerts. Also in conducting they had received instruction, and possessed for that such elegance of culture as had not been seen before among musicians. Gruffness was a thing no longer to be thought of; and that, which with our poor native born Kapellmeisters was anxious, self-mistrusting modesty, manifested itself in these men as good tone, to which they felt themselves moreover bound, through their somewhat prejudiced mood, in opposition to our whole German pigtail party. I believe that these people have exercised many a good influence upon our orchestras: certainly much that was crude and bungling has disappeared here, and many a detail in elegant delivery has been better observed and executed since they came in. The modern orchestra was already much more fluent as they found it; in many respects it was indebted to their master, Mendelssohn, for a particularly delicate and fine-felt development upon the way first trodden with original inventive power by Weber's splendid genius.

One thing these gentlemen lacked, to make them serviceable to the necessary reconstruction of our orchestras and of the institutions connected with them:—and that was energy, such energy as nothing short of self-trust resting upon real original power can give. For here unfortunately all was artificial: calling, talent, culture, even faith, love, hope. Every one of them has so much to do with himself, and with the difficulty of maintaining his artificial position, that they cannot think of unity in the whole, of mutual fitness, of consistency, of reconstruction, because all this, quite naturally, does not concern them personally. They have only just now stepped into the places of those old heavy-moulded German masters, because these had sunk too low and grown incapable of seeing the requirements of the present day and of its style of art; and they seem to feel themselves in this position as filling only a transition period, while they know not how to set about a single right thing for the German Art ideal, the one ambition of all that there is noble, since it is foreign to them in the very depths of their whole nature. So in the difficult requirements of the modern music they fall back on mere expedients. Meyerbeer, for example, was very nice; he paid a new flutist out of his own pocket, to blow a passage well for him in Paris. As he understood very well how much depends upon a happy rendering, and as he was rich and independent too, he might have been of extraordinary service to the Berlin Orchestra, when the King of Prussia called him there as General Music Director. But at the same time Mendelssohn was also called there, who certainly was not wanting in the most uncommon knowledge and endowments. Both had to face the same obstacles, which had thus far checked all good attempts in this domain: but here were just the men who should remove them, for were they not in all points armed and equipped, as no others, for the work? Why did their power forsake them? It seems: because they had no power. They let things be; and now we have the "famous" Berlin orchestra before us, in which the last trace of the traditional precision of Spontini has vanished. And these were Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn! What will their ornamental shadows effect elsewhere?

From this glance at the peculiarities of the old Kapellmeisters that are left, as well as of the newest species, it is clear that not much is to be expected from them for the reconstruction of the orchestra. On the contrary the initiative thus far has always proceeded solely from the musicians themselves, and is very manifestly owing to the new development of technical virtuosity. The benefit which the virtuosos of the different instruments have been to our orchestras, is undeniable; it would have been complete, had the Conductors too been what they should have been under such circumstances. The virtuoso naturally grew up over the heads of the pigtail remains of our Kapellmeister period, the men in dread of losing their authority, the piano teachers recommended by the maids of honor, &c.; he in the orchestra played then about the same part with the prima donna in the theatre. On the other hand, the elegant Kapellmeister of the latest cut associated himself with the virtuoso, which in many respects was not unbeneficial, but can only work for the good of the whole, when the heart and soul of the true German musical life shall be comprehended by these masters.

In the first place we must bear in mind, that they owed their places, as well as the whole existence of the orchestra, to the Theatre, and most of their occupations and achievements have had relation to the Opera. They had accordingly to understand the Theatre, the Opera, and so learn something else besides mere music; that is, as in Astronomy there must be the application thereto of the Mathematics, so here the application of Music to Dramatic Art. If they had understood these things rightly, namely Dramatic song and expression, it would have given them a new light upon the rendering of the orchestra, particularly in the works of the new German instrumental composers. I got my best hints once regarding the tempi and the delivery of Beethoven's music from the soulful, surely accentuated singing of the great Schröder-Devrient; and ever since that time it has been impossible for me, for instance, to allow that touching Cadenza of the oboe in the first movement of the C-minor Symphony:

to be blown out in the desperate way that I had always heard it; indeed I now felt, going back to my new light about this Cadenza for a starting point, what an expression should be given also upon that sustained Fermata to the first violin; and from the deep impression, which I thus gained from these two seemingly invisible points, a new and quickening understanding of the whole movement was revealed to me.

A Modern Aladdin.—Great Discovery of Buried Art Treasures.

An Occasional Correspondent of the Boston Daily Advertiser, writing from Athens, Greece, May 7, relates the following wonderful discoveries. If it be not too late here is a rare opportunity indeed for the new Boston Museum of Fine Arts!

I have just returned from Larnaca, on the Island of Cyprus, where I have seen one of the most interesting and extensive collections of Greek and Phœnician antiquities yet discovered. General L. P. di Cesnola, who received honorable wounds in our late civil war, was rewarded for his bravery by President Lincoln, with the United States Consulate at Cyprus, on a salary of one thousand dollars a year. General C. had been interested in antiquities previous to his arrival at Cyprus, and was a member of the archaeological society in Turin, his native city. One day towards the close of 1867, while taking a drive with his family, he stopped for a few moments at a peasant's house in Dali, the ancient Idalion. The peasant told him he had a secret to divulge. While looking for some stones to be used in the construction of his house, he had exhumed two vases. As natives are forbidden to make excavations without a firman, and as a firman would cost more than he was able to pay, the peasant buried his vases and said nothing. As soon as General C. saw them he recognized them as rare and beautiful specimens of Phœnician work. He hastened to obtain a firman from the Turkish government, and opened more than nine thousand tombs. The result was a large collection of curiosities, consisting of marble and limestone statues, statuettes and vases, antique Greek glassware, bronzes, crusaders' and oriental arms and ornaments of gold, silver and engraved stones. These were readily disposed of to the British and Berlin museums, Mr. Lepsius of Berlin taking over six hundred vases.

Elated with his success, the General resolved to try once more. Cyprus is the place from which Venus is said to have emerged from the sea, and hundreds of temples were there dedicated to her worship. Especially at Golgos there was a very beautiful temple, mentioned by Theocritus and Catullus; but Engel, in his work on Cyprus (vol. i, p. 145, and vol. ii, p. 81), says that the position of Golgos is not known. See also Smith's Dict., article Golgi.

It has often been remarked that the modern town of Atieno is built of the remains of some ancient temple. A few years since Count de Vogue was at Cyprus, and excavated near Atieno, hoping to find the temple, but went away without accomplishing his object. General Cesnola resolved to make another trial. On the side of a hill he first found tombs. After digging for six or seven days the works of art which had been Phœnician suddenly became Greek and Roman, and were found three feet below the surface. On digging down six and seven feet he found again the remains of Phœnician art. The occupants of the island had all chosen the same site for their cemetery, only that the Greeks and Romans, coming last, buried their dead above the remains of the Phœnicians. On approaching the foot of the hill, the spades of his workmen struck the foundations of an old wall; and lo! inside the wall, all around the valley, were rows of statues of life size, statuettes and colossal statues, bronzes, heads, bas-reliefs, Greek inscriptions, and numerous votive offerings. Besides settling the position of ancient Golgos and thus making a contribution to history, General C. has a museum of over nine thousand specimens of ancient art, many of them illustrating religious rites and domestic customs.

He has over two hundred pairs of gold ear-rings, some of which a gentleman tried in vain to purchase for Queen Victoria; some of the most beautiful rings and bracelets that have ever been found, showing that modern jewellers have not yet carried the art of engraving to the point it reached among the Greeks.

There are also Byzantine statues, representing the three Graces; a garnet head, beautifully engraved and set in gold; Phœnician inlaid vases; statues of Sappho and of Venus: some Phœnician and Assyrian statues weighing between five hundred and six hundred pounds each. Although these were exhumed as late as March last, agents from both the British and Berlin museums have already been sent to make purchases for the completion of their collections. For a single vase the General has been offered £150; but with a desire, understood with difficulty in our money-getting age, that antiquities found together should remain together, he refuses to sell unless the purchaser will take the lot entire. To any responsible party General C. makes the following offer: A vessel shall be sent to Cyprus, the collection taken home and set up, and the amount to be paid shall be left to arbitration.

A Bostonian cannot witness such a variety of statues, bas-reliefs, vases and inscriptions, so illustrative of ancient art and customs, without thinking how beautifully they would adorn our Public Garden, how instructive they would be to the young, and elevating to the public taste. Would that some gentleman, who appreciates the influence of art on national character, would call the attention of the city authorities to these facts.

The United States Consulate at Larnaca is to be abolished on the 30th of June, and this collection is to be removed at this time, somewhere. Certainly, no collection could be more varied, and therefore, other things being equal, more to be desired, than one coming from Cyprus, an island occupied successively by colonies from Phœnicia, Greece, Egypt and Rome. It is also made interesting from the fact that here Zeno, the stoic philosopher, was born; here Barnabas, the companion of Paul, labored and died; and here Shakespeare places the tragedy of Othello and Desdemona.

Handel and Haydn Society.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL REPORT.

At the annual meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society, held on Monday, evening, May 30, the following report was made by J. Baxter Upham, the President:

Gentlemen:—My report to you this evening will be brief and mainly statistical.

The financial results of the year, as you have learned from the Treasurer's statement, have proved a positive loss. It has not been thought expedient, however, under the present circumstances, to provide for this loss, either by asking you to levy an assessment upon the members or by the solicitation of subscriptions from the friends of the society; but the income from the permanent fund has this year been appropriated towards the payment of our expenses, as in such cases provided, and, in addition, the Treasurer has been authorized by a vote of the Board of Directors to negotiate a loan sufficient to meet our immediate wants. It is confidently hoped that the next, being the triennial year of the society, will more than make amends for the short-comings of the past.

As appears from the report of our Librarian, some valuable additions have been made to his department during the year, prominent among which we hail with pride and pleasure the memorable St. Matthew's Passion Music of Sebastian Bach. It is something to have placed this great work upon the shelves of our library and given it a legitimate place in the repertoire of our future performances.

I find from the Secretary's record that there have been fourteen meetings of the Board of Directors, for business purposes, during the year, and that in the same period the Society have been called together three times for the admission of members and the transaction of other business. At all these meetings a commendable degree of unanimity and good feeling has been manifest. Thirty-five gentlemen have been admitted to membership, four have resigned, and four have been honorably discharged. In the same time ninety-one have been suspended under the new article of the By-Laws, proposed at the last annual meeting, and adopted by the society, September 16, 1869, of which number seven were subsequently reinstated, for reasons that were deemed to be sufficient. Two deaths only have come to my knowledge during the year—that of Mr. Edward Haskell, a valued associate, and, at the time of his decease, the oldest member of our Society; and Dr. Francis C. Ropes, who, though young in years, was ripe in that rare combination of accomplishments which make up the scholar, the connoisseur and the Christian gentleman.*

The regular rehearsals commenced on the 3d of October, 1869, and closed on the 10th of April, 1870, numbering 29 in all. The average whole attendance at these rehearsals is found to have been 306—this out of a choral force of 675 in all. The average number of rehearsals attended by the 78 tenors and 101 basses, who surrendered their tickets in accordance with the request of the government, was found to be 15, out of the 29 rehearsals above named; and for the 141 sopranos and 115 altos it was 13,—the altos being a little in the ascendant. It would appear from this statement, taken as it stands, that the attendance of the gentlemen was in a higher ratio to that of the ladies. Strictly speaking, however, the reverse is true, since by far a larger proportion of the latter surrendered their tickets in accordance with the Secretary's request; for it is fair to suppose that those who failed to give them up were pre-eminent among the absentees. It may be proper to state in this connection that the extremes in the number of rehearsals attended are indicated by the figures 1 and 29. Such are the first fruits of the plan of registration adopted within the last year, a plan which happily enables us now to determine the particular occasion at which each and every member of the society has been present during the season. I am sure I shall meet with your cordial co-operation in the recommendation that this plan of registration be so perfected and carried out as to give to the government, at all times, the fullest knowledge in this important particular of attendance and non-attendance at rehearsals. I have heretofore alluded, emphatically and often, to this crying evil of absenteeism at rehearsals, and to the absolute necessity of a punctual and regular attendance on the part of every member, if they would acquire a thorough and practical knowledge of the music brought before them, and retain the fair reputation of the society and its claim upon the public for their patronage and support.

The public performances of the society during the year have been fewer than usual, and are comprised in the following programme:

Dec. 25th, 1869—Handel's "Messiah."

Dec. 26th, 1869—Costa's "Naaman."

April 16th, 1870—Haydn's "Creation."

April 17th, 1870—Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

In addition to which the Society gave its assistance at the celebration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Mercantile Library Association, which took place on the evening of the 11th of March. And last, and by no means least, I do not forget your cordial and hearty co-operation with the great choral masses, convened from all parts of New England and from remotest regions, who so grandly celebrated the consummation of peace in our land within the walls of the Coliseum in the summer of 1869.

The principal vocalists who have aided the society in their regular public performances for the year are as follows:

Miss Adelaide Phillips, Miss J. E. Houston, Mrs. J. W. Weston, Miss Lizzie M. Gates, Mr. M. W. Whitney, Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, Mr. Wm. J. Winch and Mr. Edward Prescott, all of whom were taken from the ranks of our resident artists,—and Miss Antoinette Sterling of New York.

I may be pardoned for alluding here to the time which was given to the study of the Passions-music of Seb. Bach, and to some of the reasons which prevented the public performance of any portion of that great work in the season which has just closed. It is surely an era in the Society's history and in the musical history of America, that this most difficult and long neglected composition has been taken hold of seriously and in earnest, with the determination, I think I may safely say, of sooner or later mastering its acknowledged intricacies and sounding to the depths its solemn and mysterious harmonies; nor should it be deemed a matter of mortification and self-reproach, that after spending many weeks in patient rehearsal, it was so summarily laid aside. The reasons for its non-performance in public this year were many and sufficient. Both our excellent conductor and organizer were manifestly unwilling to present the work in any other than its complete and finished proportions, and this reluctance was frankly expressed to the government at every proper and available opportunity. It was a view which in itself was just, without doubt, and, in a purely artistic sense, could not be gainsaid—and coming from gentlemen whom we all so much honor and respect, and in whose knowledge and judgment and good sense in such matters we place implicit reliance, it were strange if it did not wield its legitimate influence. For myself, however, I urged the public performance of such portions as we could, feeling, as I did conscientiously, that a small fragment of so profound and noble a composition were better than none at all, and that thus our music-loving public would be the better prepared to receive and to understand the work in its integrity, when after further and careful attention we were ready so to offer it. In this feeling my associates in the government largely, I believe unanimously, shared; and so a selection from the oratorio to occupy about one hour and a quarter in time was prepared, and the evening of Saturday, April 16th, the last in Passion-week, fixed upon for its performance. Here, however, a new difficulty arose. An orchestra sufficient for the occasion, in the double functions demanded by the music could not be obtained. In vain the government offered to change the evening to suit these requirements, and entered into negotiations with Mr. Thomas for the aid of a portion or the whole of his efficient company. It was of no avail. The accompaniments could not be properly given in the Passion-season, to which, in the fitness and propriety of things, we were necessarily confined; and so the attempt was at last, and reluctantly, abandoned.

I have deemed this somewhat lengthy recital important because in the minds of some, even of the members of this society, I believe the circumstances of the case have not been hitherto fully understood. The field has been for the present abandoned, but not with dishonor. The noble work has indeed been laid upon the shelves of our library for a brief period of rest only—not for its burial, as I trust and believe. And we should bear in mind, for our consolation, that it was not till it had been carefully studied and rehearsed in private circles and in larger societies for a period of nearly two years that the first public performance of this Passion-music was ventured upon by the famous Sing-akademie of Berlin in 1829, under the immediate direction of Mendelssohn, and then only after much hesitation and doubt and almost in defiance of the predictions of such men as Zelter and Marx, the elder Mendelssohn and many of the most influential members of the Academy.

The preparation of the annals of the society is slowly but surely progressing, and it is hoped they will be ready for publication sometime during the coming year.

I have before suggested the propriety of advancing the standard of requirement in the examination of candidates for admission. The importance of this suggestion, it seems to me, is now more weighty than ever, inasmuch as the general standard of musical culture in the community is year by year progressing, the knowledge and appreciation of the great masters of choral composition is becoming more widely diffused, and an intelligent and educated public demands, and should receive, a more critical and careful rendering of such works as it is the province of this and kindred associations to perform. Already there are rivals in the field who contest with us in friendly strife for the palm of superiority in choral achievements. Very recently our sister association in Snell has given a public performance of "Elijah," which has elicited from those best qualified to judge the highest encomiums of praise. Indeed, for intelligent conception of the spirit and intent of the composer, for brilliant execution and legitimate and impressive effect, this effort, as a choral performance, deserves to rank among the very best that have ever been given in this country. That a society so young in years should acquire a reputation equal, if not superior, to that which our own association has hitherto claimed for itself alone among the great choral societies in the land, is a fact which calls for our serious consideration, while at the same time it commands our admiration and respect. We hail it as a mark of the artistic progress of the age. We extend to this youthful association, and to all others of a kindred nature which have recently sprung into existence around us, the right hand of fellowship and of friendly recognition and regard.

In conclusion I would allude in terms of eulogy to the invaluable aid and coöperation of our excellent conductor, Mr. Zerrahn, who for so many years has given us the benefit of eminent abilities, while he has built up for himself a name now known and honored in this and in other lands. To our accomplished organist, Mr. Parker, our best thanks are due for his faithful attendance to the sometimes tedious demands of his position, for the satisfactory manner in which he has fulfilled his responsible duties, and his uniform kindness and courtesy to all with whom he has come in contact.

Nor can I close this part of my report without rendering a brief but heartfelt tribute of affection to one who has for so long a time been joined with me as the next highest officer in the government of the Society, and who is now compelled by ill health, added to the pressure of other duties, to resign. I allude of course, to our esteemed associate, Mr. O. J. Faxon. For eleven successive years he has received the almost unanimous vote of his fellow members for the post of Vice-President of the Society. For nine years I can personally testify to the earnest, faithful manner in which he has performed the delicate and important requirements of that post. No more loyal and deserving friend of the society, I venture to say, has ever been honored with their confidence and regard. On retiring from his office he carries with him the warm attachment and love of every one of his associates—of none more cordially and sincerely than of myself. It is to such of its tried friends and servants that the Society owes more than any poor words of mine can express. That the blessing of health and happiness and prosperity, in fullest measure, may be given him in his retirement from active duty is the hope and prayer of us all.

It only remains to call to your minds the fact that the year on which we are about to enter will furnish an opportunity for the second of the regular series of Triennial Festivals, so happily inaugurated two years since. Should it be the intention of the incoming Board to continue these festivals, they will, without doubt, lose no time in taking such steps as shall insure for it a success exceeding, if possible, that of any former achievement of the kind.

Sincerely thanking you, gentlemen, for the zeal and earnestness with which you have performed your duties and upheld the honor of the Society in the year which has just closed, and with renewed wishes for your prosperity and success, I most respectfully submit my report.

Ode for the Musical Dog-Days.*

* Meaning, probably, the Jubilee Season.

The "Diogenes" of the London Musical Standard has undertaken to help supply the enormous demand for librettos. In his last contribution he says:

I now therefore beg to republish portions of what in its day was thought "a most admirable burlesque Ode," written in the year 1763, and alluded to in "Jones's Dissertation on the Musical Instruments of the Welsh" (1794). The title of the opusculum in question is as follows:—

"An Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, adapted to the ancient British Music: viz., the Salt Box, the Jew's Harp, the Marrow Bones and Cleavers, the Hurdy Gurdy, &c. With an Introduction giving some account of these truly British Instruments: by Bonnet Thornton Esquire."

Cedite Tiblicines Itali, vos cedite Galli;
Dico iterum vobis cedite, Tiblicines:
Cedite Tiblicines, vobis ter dico; quaterque.
Jam vobis, dico, cedite, Tiblicines, Alex. Helmsius.

Translation of the Motto.

Yield, yield, ye Fiddlers, French, Italians,
Yield, yield, I say again—Rascals!
One, two, three, Times I say Fiddlers give o'er,
Yield ye, I now say Times 1, 2, 3, 4!

Recitative:—

Strike, strike, the soft Judae Harp,
Soft and sharp,
By teeth exercise in firm dances kept,
And lightly by the volant finger swept.

Air:—

Buzzing twangs the Iron Lyre,
Furiously thrilling,
Trembling trilling,
Whizzing with the waw'ring wire.

Air:—

In strains more exalted the salt box shall join,
And clattering and battering and clapping combine,
With a rap and a tap while the hollow side sounds,
Up and down leaps the flap and with rattling rebounds.

Air:—

With dead, dull, doleful, heavy hums,
With mournful moans
And grievous groans
The sober Hurdy Gurdy thrums.

[There is at least as much poetry in the second part, though I think the "Buzzing twangs the Iron Lyre" is an idea that very likely may not be thought to be exceeded. In these anvil beating and cannon shooting times it is a hint for the resuscitation of which many will doubtless thank me.]

PART II.

Recitative:—

With magic sounds like these did Orpheus' Lyre,
Motion, sense, and life inspire;
When, as he play'd, the listening flood
Still'd its loquacious waves and silent stood;
The trees, swift bounding, danced with loosened stumps,
And sluggish stones caper'd in active jumps.

Air:—

Each ruddy breasted Robin
The concert bore a bob-in,
And every hooting owl around;
The croaking frog,
The grunting hog,
All, all conspir'd to raise th' enlivening sound;

Recitative:—

Now to Cecilia, heav'nly maid,
Your loud united voices raise,
With solemn hymns to celebrate her praise
Each instrument shall lend its aid.
The salt box with clattering and clapping shall sound
The Iron Lyre
Buzzing twang with waw'ring wire.
With heavy hum
The sober Hurdy Gurdy thrum;
And the merry, merry marrow bones ring round.

Dr. Arne had a benefit concert at "the little theatre in the Haymarket," where he introduced the various "instruments" named in the ode, allotting to each a solo; and the ode of which portions have just been offered was the one to which he adapted them. Pity it is the performance cannot be revived, of course making the most of modern orchestral resources and adding "additional accompaniments."

The New Jubilee.

It may perhaps be remembered in New York—and it certainly is not forgotten in Boston—that we ventured, in a mild and friendly way, to make one or two disrespectful jokes last year about the great Peace Jubilee which set the Hub of the Universe a whirling in such an insane and disorderly fashion. Possibly it may also be remembered that we drew from the vagaries of that insane week auguries of much future good,—a revival of popular interest in the best kinds of choral music, an enthusiasm for real art, an appreciation of the great truth that the people need recreation quite as much as they need work. Our hopes are fulfilled even sooner than we expected. A mania for monster concerts has seized upon the whole hemisphere. From Maine to California the people are possessed by the spirit of song. Feet that first lifted themselves to the measure of the canon now beat four-four time to the burden of Handel's choruses, and the furthest stretch of impropriety which our young people today allow themselves is the Anvil Chorus, with a hundred musical blacksmiths and an electrified park of artillery. Let us rejoice in the great and glorious change without inquiring too closely into the agencies of our regeneration. Bergmann, Doremus, Thomas, Parepa, have all done much in the cultivation of high art; but maybe it is Gilmore after all, with his hammers and cannon, and his peal of bells, and his flaming enthusiasm, whom we must hail as the apostle of the new musical revival.

The New York Jubilee has begun, so be sure, with an inordinate amount of brag; but that is an imperfection which we are bound to pardon. We are used to making allowances for programme-eloquence, and if we are promised ten we have learned to be content with five. Architects may wonder how twenty-two thousand spectators are to be crowded into a building which, with all the proposed additions, will hardly hold ten thousand. Musicians may marvel at the promise of three thousand singers in a city where chorus singing is so shamefully neglected as it is in New-York. Experts may open their eyes a little at the "superlatively distinguished" and "unapproachably excellent" solo artists (all of the very first rank), whose names fill a list as long as the scroll of Leporello; and we will not deny that the unregenerate may smile at the announcement of a quartet from "Martha" with a triple Nancy and a five-barrel Plunkett. But why should we haggle about trifles? One does not call for filet aux champignons at a barbecue.

Beethoven, perhaps, if he had his way, would keep his birthday (when it comes) in a rather different style; but what has Beethoven to do with this affair except to lend it his name, and have maybe a day in his honor smuggled into the programme for the sake of appearances? When we ask for "Hail Columbia" must we be answered by the Symphony in D minor? For our part, we are quite satisfied both with the promises and the prospects. We know at any rate that we shall hear the best chorus and the best orchestra in America. We know that all the opera singers in the country, coming down in one fell swoop, will teach us (if they do not quarrel too much with one another) something of the music of the spheres. It is a heavenly outlook which even the superstitious smoke of possible cannon cannot wholly obscure. Must we be angry then with a little humbug, and take to measuring benches in the Rink and counting noses among the chorus? It is wiser far to throw up our hats and shout "glory!"—to set ourselves diligently to work proving that the New York Festival is almost as big and as good as the famous Festival of Boston, and as soon as it is over to get up another which shall be bigger and better than anything the world has ever seen.—Tribune June 4.

HOW THEY DO HONOR TO BEETHOVEN IN NEW YORK. The following, in all the newspapers, is worth preservation as a curiosity:

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The revival of Cherubini's fine Opera, "Medea" with Mlle. Tietjens as the heroine, deserves honorable mention, if only as a proof that the lessees of this establishment desire that the classical minority of the audience shall occasionally have a treat to themselves. Dr. Ganz's Jason, too, must be praised as a really excellent performance of a most exacting part; and we sincerely hope that, in the present dearth of tenors, so reliable and conscientious an artist will not be lost sight of in future seasons, especially when such works as "Fidelio" and "Medea" are presented. Rossini's "Barbieri" introduced Mme. Adelina Patti for the first time this season in the part of Rosina, and Signor Mario, after a two year's absence, in that of Count Almaviva. How the former sang and acted, and how the latter acted and sang, it is needless to dwell upon; suffice it to say that both artists were received with enthusiasm. Mme. Patti has also appeared in "La Sonnambula" and "Marta," the house being on each occasion crammed to the ceiling. In the last-named Opera Signor Urlo made a successful debut as Lionello, giving the whole of the music with much effect, and gaining an enthusiastic encore for "M'appari." Mlle. Pauline Lucca, as Margherita, in Gounod's "Faust," and Leonora, in "La Favorita," has been received with a cordial welcome; and we may also say that in the latter work Signor Mario sang much of the music of Fernando, at least with a style, if not with a voice, which no tenor can equal. The production of M. Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" has given Signor Cotogni an opportunity of displaying powers, in the principal character, with which few persons had, we believe, credited him; but "Hamlet" is no favorite of ours, and Mlle. Sessi's Ophelia did not make us like it any better. Why should this really clever vocalist attempt to be so versatile.—Mus. Times, June 1.

DRURY LANE.—Meyerbeer's Opera, "Roberto il Diavolo," has been an extraordinary attraction at this establishment during the past month, the exquisite singing of Mlle. Christine Nilsson, in the part of Alice, enabling the majority of the opera frequenters—even those who remember Jenny Lind in the same character—to sit with the utmost enjoyment through a work which, with its many beauties, certainly contains some of its composer's dullest music. As Margherita in Gounod's "Faust," Mlle. Nilsson has also created a legitimate effect; and we have no doubt that these two Operas will continue to command the greatest audiences of the season. We must also record the success of Mme. Volpini as Lady Enrichetta in Flotow's Opera, "Marta," a part admirably suited for her light soprano voice and facile execution. The production of Weber's "Abu Hassan," and Mozart's "L'Oca del Cairo," on the same evening was an event of the utmost interest to real music-lovers; although, as might be expected, they attracted but few of the general public, who rather go to hear singers than works. Weber's Operetta could scarcely satisfy those who expected to hear a specimen of its composer's latest style. Founded upon the well-known story in the "Arabian Nights," the libretto gives scope for some excellent bustling music, of which Weber (who was but twenty-four years of age when he composed it) has amply availed himself. Throughout the work the music is wonderfully adapted to the situation, and although we can scarcely imagine that the Opera will become a stock favorite at this establishment, there is no question that the lessee has well earned the thanks of all musicians by producing it. "L'Oca del Cairo," although having all the effect of a perfect composition, was left by Mozart in an unfinished state. Portions of other incomplete Operas, by the same composer, were afterwards added; and the libretto, rewritten by MM. Victor Wilder and Constantin, is the version which is now used. Much of the music of this work is nearly—we might, indeed, say fully—equal to that in either "Le Nozze," or "Don Giovanni," the finale, especially, containing much of the wondrous power shown in these two Operas. Considering the amount of genius which the composer has displayed in the treatment of this simple subject, it seems incredible that such music should have remained so long unknown; but with the full knowledge of the apathy of the public towards what is really good, we doubt whether even this excellent revival will have the effect of permanently placing "L'Oca del Cairo" amongst the established works of its composer. In "Abu Hassan," the principal parts were most efficiently filled by Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, who received an unanimous encore for her artistic rendering of the song, "O Fatima"—Mme. Monbelli, Mme. Corsi, Mlle. Briani, Signori Castelli, Ragner and Trevero. "L'Oca del Cairo" introduced a young singer, Mlle. Pauline Lewitzky, who made so favorable an impression by her thoroughly-trained vocalization and prepossessing manner as to lead us to hope that she may prove a valuable acquisition to the company. The other characters were assigned to Mme. Sinico, Mme. Corsi, Signori Gassier, Gardoni, Trevero and Mr. Lyall, all of whom proved their reverence for the composer by singing their very best on the occasion.—Ibid.

ORATORIO CONCERTS—The ninth and closing concert of the season took place on Wednesday, when the programme included Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The association of two such master-pieces is peculiarly appropriate, and formed a grand climax to an interesting series. The performance was generally efficient, especially in the Lobgesang, which appeared to have had the advantage of more preparation and rehearsal than the symphony. The solo vocalists were Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Sinclair, Mr. Cummings, and Herr Carl Stepan. Mr. Barnby conducted with his usual judgment and care; and his capital choir did good service in the choral movements of both works.

The series of concerts just terminated commenced on December 8, with Handel's Dettingen Te Deum and Acis and Galatea—both for the first time with Mendelssohn's additional accompaniments—which were followed by the Messiah, and Seasons, Jephthah, Beethoven's Missa Solennis, Bach's Passion Music, Elijah, Mr. Barnby's Rebekah, and Alexander's Feast.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY—Spohr's symphony, The Power of Sound, to adopt a misnomer even more expressive than the rightful title—was played at this society's fifth concert on Monday last, and again asserted itself as the masterpiece. There are reasons in plenty why the symphony should not be popular. It is full of melody, and of the charm arising from refined treatment; moreover it illustrates a theme that appeals to every heart. The work was heard on Monday with unflagging attention, and a generally good performance presented it under favorable, if not the most favorable, conditions. Beethoven's second symphony (in D) is too well known even for such general remarks as the foregoing. There was room for improvement in the execution of certain passages; but this is usually the case with one or other of the symphonies at the Philharmonic concerts, and it arises, we presume, from want of time for adequate rehearsal.

The concerto was Weber's in E flat for piano, a work rarely heard, owing, perhaps, to the overshadowing popularity of the Concertstück, which seems to monopolize all the attention pianists are able to give its author. The concerto in B flat is Weber's second, and was written at various times during the years 1811-12. It ranks, therefore, in chronological order soon after Abu Hassan, and, like that little opera, illustrates the master's less characteristic style. That it is a work of great merit we cannot say; at the same time its claims to an occasional hearing are undeniable. The pianist was Herr Pauer, who suggests the thought that, amid the incessant demands made by a London season upon artists of eminence, it is barely possible for them to do justice to their fame when the work in hand requires careful preparation. Under all circumstances, however, Herr Pauer shows himself a genuine artist, and the recall he obtained was a due recognition of merit. The overtures were Meyerbeer's Struensee and Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, widely-contrasted examples of composers who have had very little in common. That the audience heard Mozart with delight, and Meyerbeer with curious interest, need not be said. As regards Struensee, however, we may question if it appears to advantage out of the place assigned to it by the composer. Mlle. Orgeni, who will be remembered as one of the Royal Italian Opera company some time ago, sang the great scena from Der Freischütz, and Donizetti's "Ardon gl'incensi" (flute obbligato capably played by Herr Svensden) so as to obtain considerable applause. Mr. Santley also appeared, his selections being Spohr's "Di militari onori," (Jessonda) and "Non più andrai," both done perfectly.

NEW PHILHARMONIC—The fourth of these entertainments took place in St. James's Hall last Wednesday week, when the following selection of music was performed:—

Overture, "Der Wasserträger".....Cherubini.
Aria, "O mio Fernando" (La Favorita).....Donizetti.
Concerto in A minor, Violin.....Spohr.
Aria, "Di qui lo vedo" (L'Africaine).....Meyerbeer.
Symphony in B flat.....Beethoven.

Rondo, Pianoforte and Orchestra, "La Retour de Londres".....Hummel.

Aria, "Vedrai carino".....Mozart.
Variations, Violin.....Paganini.
Aria, "Le Vallon".....Gounod.
Symphony, "Finale of the Jupiter".....Mozart.

The Athenæum speaks thus of Mr. Limpus's oratorio, The Prodigal's Return:

"The composer is an amateur clergyman, who holds the post of Minor Canon at St. George's Chapel, Windsor. We will not counsel the Rev. H. F. Limpus to inwardly digest the proverb, 'Ne sutor,' &c., because it is evident that he has ability enough to warrant a use of the pen. But there is music and music—psalm-tunes and oratorios for example; and our advice to Mr. Limpus is—avoid the latter, since it can only result in much wasted labor, and more disappointment. It is hardly worth while to dwell upon the libretto of a work not likely to occupy much attention; but we may say that the story is treated in a clumsy fashion. Certain verses are taken from the parable; and upon each is hung a string of reflections. The narrative itself is smothered under this load of moralizing, and becomes, at best, of secondary concern. Whether such an arrangement be right or wrong the reader may safely be left to decide for himself. The music is for the most part correctly and agreeably written, and shows an easy production of commonplace melody. This is nearly all we can urge in its favor. In the matter of original invention and independent thought the work is sadly wanting. We may even go so far as to say that Mr. Limpus appears to have copied Handel assiduously, only drawing a line at the actual reproduction of the great master's themes. If it were worth while, we could bring forward example upon example of this; but it is not worth while, and we refrain. Let us, however, ask what is the use of producing such tame and colorless music in the days when the great masters are known and admired by everybody. Oratorios like The Prodigal's Return have not the ghost of a chance; and their sure fate is speedy forgetfulness—a fate the composers should look upon as merciful."

ST. PETERSBURGH—A subscription is being got up to erect at Smolensk a monument to the well-known Russian composer, Michael Nicholajewitsch Glinka, born at the village of Nowospassk, in the Jelna district of the Smolensk Government, and died the 3rd February, 1857, at Berlin. His opera, Life for the Czar, was produced for the first time at St. Petersburg, on the 27th November, 1836, and his other opera, Russian and Ludmilla, on the 27th November, 1842.

FLORENCE. Herr Hans von Bülow has returned from Berlin. He will shortly carry out a project he has long cherished, namely—the formation of a permanent "Sinfonie-Capelle," for the purpose of giving popular orchestral concerts. The first of such concerts will be given in the Teatro Principe Umberto, and the programme thus constituted: "Jubel Ouverture," C. M. von Weber; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Pianoforte Concerto, Beethoven; Overture to Struensee, Meyerbeer; "Reapers' Chorus," from Prometheus, Liszt; and Symphony in C minor, Beethoven.

Festivals.

This is "Jubilee" season; and music having run its quiet, modest course in the usual way of Art, this summer month so far is given over to the noisy echoes, here and there, of last year's great Peace Jubilee, Monster Concerts, Choral Festivals, Beethoven Centennial Celebration in New York (with Gilmore guns and anvils, Verdi Miserere, steam Calliope, and all the modern improvements which may be supposed to interest the great composer who had grown already deaf to his own music,—of which, however, one whole Symphony and extracts from others are included in the programme, to make it clear that this great splurge has anything to do with Beethoven!). The New York affair, we suppose, will be over by the time this appears; and we may then gather up the elements of some right impression of it after the smoke and dog-day heat and flurry have been cleared away. Meanwhile we copy on another page the ingeniously grandiloquent and swelling Programme of the week, which doubtless has been modified in some particulars. We wonder if the words "Grand," "Complete Combined Grand," "Grand-Popular-Classical-Patriotic-National," &c., were ever reiterated so many times in one bill of fare! Such incense must be most acceptable to Beethoven, as well as such an array of Conductors representing widely separate spheres of music, and of Italian, German, English opera singers, good, bad and indifferent, all so distinguished for their deep sympathy with the spirit of Beethoven and high German Art!

But the explanation of it is, that the same restless, enterprising class of spirits who got up the Boston Jubilee, exists also in New York and in all the great commercial cities, always eager to be doing things on a stupendous scale; and they must needs imitate, if possible surpass (which they will not do), the great example of a year ago. The Centennial year of Beethoven is only seized upon to give it color, and just enough of his music introduced to save appearances. The fact that this festival is not given at the season of the master's birthday (December 17), is no fair ground of criticism; the celebrations in many of the German cities, even in his own Vienna, are announced for various weeks during the summer and autumn. For it is quite as significant, perhaps even more so, to make a centennial year of it, letting the chorus of the world's debt to the great Musician echo from land to land throughout the summer. Besides, the summer season is the most convenient for great gatherings; then distinguished artists are the most available. Doubtless all this will not prevent a great many less pretentious, more sincere and genuine musical commemorations on the actual centennial birthday next December.—The New York festival will be neither all bad, nor all good. In spite of much display of vanity and mutually jostling egotisms, there will be some fine manifestations of high, noble Art. The performance of Elijah by our Handel and Haydn Society, all armed and eager for the fray, can hardly fail to be a redeeming feature; for doubtless we shall hear that they have done their best, and under favorable conditions, as to solo artists, and especially the orchestral accompaniment. The giving of whole works—three Oratorios—is, so far, the taking of a higher ground than that of last year's Jubilee,—of course only possible within more limited dimensions. And the great orchestra New York can furnish, with Carl Bergmann for Conductor, promises well for Symphony and Overture; while as to solo singing, is not Parepa in herself a host?

Smaller Jubilee echoes, great for their several localities, have occurred in various New England centres of population, such as Springfield, New Bedford, &c., and other festivals of like kind, taking mainly the character of choral mass meetings, with somewhat of an educational view, are to be held here and there during the summer. That at Springfield took place last week on Wednesday and Thursday. The chorus singers of the surrounding towns were there. Parepa was there; Gilmore was there with guns and drums, but not it seems, with anvils; Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mr. Castle, Mr. M. W. Whitney, and other solo singers; Mr. Arbuckle, with his cornet; Dr. James Pech, of New York, Mr. Whiting, the organist, &c. The Republican likens the programme of the first day to "an entertaining volume in substantial covers;" that is, it consisted of a light and varied miscellany introduced and followed by a great chorus (Mendelssohn's "Thanks be to God" and Rossini's Inflammatus—the former conducted by Mr. Whiting, the latter of course by the inflammable P. S. G.) These were the upper and under crusts of the pie. The "four and twenty black-birds" were a cornet solo (De Beriot's 7th Air and variations); a Mozart Air and diverse English Ballads, by Mme. Parepa Rosa; the "Two Grenadiers," by Mr. Whitney; the Freyshütz Scene by Mrs. Pratt, of Springfield a Cavatina by Pacini; "The Milk Maid's Marriage," by Mrs. Smith; The "Wirlwind Polka" (cornet) &c., &c.

The Second day began with an afternoon concert, a melange of the patriotic, sensational, sentimental, &c.,—mostly reminiscences of the Peace Jubilee,—all under the direction of Mr. Gilmore. In the evening the Creation. About 400 singers were in attendance, and an orchestra of 30. The performances were, for the most part, considered a success.

Naturally the best and largest of these mass singing meetings was the Choral Festival held at headquarters, Boston Music Hall, on Tuesday evening, June 7. This was more largely choral, and made up of solid music. A thousand voices, composed of the "Boston Chorus," organized for the Peace Jubilee, the "Choral Union," of South Boston, and the Chelsea Society, made an imposing appearance, and produced a grand volume of sound. Indeed the thousand voices sounded, in several of the choruses, much better than ten times their number in the Coliseum. The Conductors were Mr. ZERRAEN, Mr. EUGENE THAYER (Director of the Choral Union), and Mr. GILMORE, as representing the parent stock whence all these lesser Jubilees are offshoots. The selections were almost wholly reminiscences of the Coliseum. The choruses (with small orchestra and organ) were: Nicolai's Fest-Ouverture on "Ein feste Burg," Handel's "Hallelujah," Haydn's "The heavens are telling," Mendelssohn's "He watching over Israel," Rossini's Inflammatus, &c. The solo singers were Mrs. SMITH, Mrs. HALL, Miss GATES, Miss RYAN, Mrs. ELDER, and Messrs. W. J. WINCH, H. L. WHITNEY, RUDOLPHSEN and WILDE. Several smaller pieces, such as "La ci darem," by Miss Ryan and Mr. Rudolphsen, and the "Angel Trio," from Elijah, were sung. The orchestra gave a passable rendering of the "Tell" overture; and Mr. ANBUCKLE pleased by his admirable cornet playing of the same pieces as in Springfield. The concert, which was organized by the Committee of Mr. Tourjée's "National Musical Congress," and designed as we suppose, to set the ball rolling for the round of festivals throughout New England, gave on the whole a good deal of satisfaction both to the active participants and to a pretty numerous responsive audience. Such Choral meetings are the best fruit of the Coliseum.

THE SCHOOL FESTIVAL.—The exercises at the annual Musical Exhibition of the Public Schools, on Wednesday, June 8, at the Music Hall, were more interesting than ever, and gave convincing proof of solid progress, both in the singing of the children, and in their intelligent mastery of the rudiments of written music.

The morning exhibition was of children of the Primary Schools. Twelve hundred of these little innocents, terraced on the platform, amid great masses of June flowers, festoons, baskets of ivy and other vines, the girls all in white, Beethoven statue and Great Organ in the background, made a lovely scene. The Concert opened with the Overture to "Tell" played by Kopitz's fine orchestra from Selwyn's Theatre, and then began the children's exercises under the direction of their devoted teacher, a man who has shown a genius for this work, Mr. LUTHER W. MASON. They sang in unison: first an old German Choral; then a simple, cheerful "Lark" song (also an old German melody); and then "Ye hills and verdant valleys," for which the music had been borrowed from one of Schumann's little Album pieces for the piano: "Der frohe Landsmann." This last was a particularly nice selection, and sounded charmingly; only it was taken rather too fast. All the pieces were sung in good time and tune, with fresh, sweet voices, wanting volume of course at that age, but musically blended, and not harsh and shouting.

Then came physical exercises, timed to Gungl's "Cockoo Galop" by the orchestra; which, from the perfect precision and simultaneousness of movement of arms, head, and whole body, rhythmical and graceful, had a kaleidoscopic charm, and evidently were greatly enjoyed by the little actors themselves, each happy in being a live unit of so harmonious a whole.

Mr. Mason's illustrations of the method of teaching in the Public Schools were necessarily brief, but showed how thoroughly the thing is done; and that they do not merely sing by note, but actually learn to read notes and to explain all that relates to the simplest notation, time, &c., and to sound the intervals of the diatonic scale. These illustrations covered the first, the second, and the third year's course, each with songs, followed by miscellaneous school songs, and gave great surprise and satisfaction. The minuteness with which these first steps of knowledge were graduated, showed rare ingenuity.

Then followed "Song of Praise," by Nägeli; "The Child's Angel," by Gläser; "Praise of Song," by Hiller; all fresh and musical and childlike; and then, for a close, the pretty Semi-chorus and Chorus, sung last year: "What song doth the cricket sing?" and each stanza answered by the chorus:

"What say all? Love and mirth, in the air, and in the earth;
Very, very soft and merry, is the natural song of earth."

The exhibition of the High and Grammar Schools (the older classes of the latter), again 1200 pupils, took place at four P. M., under the direction of JULIUS EICHBERG, teacher of singing in the High and Normal Schools, with J. B. SHARLAND, teacher in the Grammar Schools, at the Organ. This of course was the high hour of Festival, and it surpassed, to eye and ear, all that have gone before. After a good solid Organ Voluntary, all the voices joined in unison in the beautiful Bach Choral: "Now night comes softly stealing" ("Nun ruhen alle Wälder"), organ and orchestra supplying harmony. The mass of tone was rich, full, pure and firm, the notes well sustained, and the impression grand. Had it been sung less uniformly loud, it would have been more in keeping with the words. Weber's Jubilee Overture was then well given by a goodly orchestra. The next chorus, by Mendelssohn: "O vales," was nicely sung in three part harmony. So too the buoyant strain from Van Bree's Cantata "St. Cecilia," in which the pupils of the "Girls' High and Normal and the Highland High Schools" (so much for Annexation!) sang the soli. A Chorus by Donizetti: "Rest, weary Pilgrim," followed; and then a very inspiring and genial Glee, "Away to the Fields," by Mr. Eichberg, for chorus and soli, by the "High" girls again.

The Vocal and Physical Exercises under the direction of Mr. L. B. MUNROE, such as we have described more than once before, but carried to yet higher perfection, made a most delightful episode.

Then came the Overture to Egmont (it was pleasant to see with what interest the pupils listened to the orchestra), followed by one of Mendelssohn's Motets for three female voices: "Ye sons of Israel," a contrapuntal composition of some intricacy, sung by the High Schools, of course, and really a marked achievement for them, showing that music in the schools means more than has been credited. The gay old madrigal: "I love my love" was enthusiastically re-demanded. The beautiful chorus by Rossini: "Wake, gentle Zephyr," pleased even more than last year. "Old Hansred," the audience rising and joining in the last verse, closed the feast of unalloyed enjoyment. The results of the year are a very noticeable development of pure, firm, musical tone in the general average of voices; as well as certainty, aplomb, and really musical character in the singing.

These exercises showed what has been done in the Primary and the older portion of the Grammar and High Schools. Later in the week we witnessed what had been done for the younger classes of the Grammar Schools, under the admirable drill of Mr. HOLZ. Of this next time.

FARMINGTON, CONN. Mr. Karl Klausner gave last week his 45th and 46th matinée and soirée at Miss Potter's Young Ladies' School. The artists were Miss Mehlig, and Messrs. Theo. Thomas and F. Bergner. The programmes were as follows:

I.

Trio: Piano, Violin and Violoncello, B flat, Op. 87. Beethoven.
Phantasietueke, Piano, Op. 12. Schumann.
Sonata: Piano and Violoncello, A. Op. 69. Beethoven.
Trio: Piano, Violin and Violoncello, E flat, Op. 100. Schubert.

II.

Trio: Piano, Violin and Violoncello, D Minor, Op. 68. Schumann.
Sonata: Piano and Violin, A, Op. 47. Beethoven.
Solo Piano, Spinnerried "Fliegende Holländer". Liszt.
Trio: Piano, Violin and Violoncello, D minor, Op. 49. Mendelssohn.

(Crowded out last time).

GONE ABROAD.—Mrs. C. A. BARRY will be greatly missed in church and concert room during the year to come. She sailed for Havre on the 14th ult., bent upon giving her fine voice due opportunities in the best schools of Europe, particularly in Florence, where she is at present. But it is also her plan to pass some time in Leipzig, and near Robert Franz at Halle. When she returns, she will no doubt sing his songs more sweetly even than before.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS is already in California, singing for a few months;—a place of fortune on which we may congratulate the Californians. So both our principal Contraltos have left us waiting, with such patience as we can, for their return.

And that brilliant, charming young pianist, Fräulein ALICE TOPP, after a Complimentary Benefit in New York, has gone back to Germany; but with the intention, we believe, of playing soon in South America. Success go with her there and everywhere! Boston will welcome her whenever she returns.

And now we read that CAMILLA UNZO (Mme. Luère), after her great deeds in California, has sailed for Europe. We hope to hear report of her playing Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto before a Leipzig audience, for such an artist ought to make her mark there.

In a few weeks, too, Mme. PAREPA-ROSA and CARL ROSA will be gone, seeking rest among old friends in her English home; perhaps giving English Opera there, as good, to say the least, as London ever heard. Carl Rosa as Conductor, too, will make his mark among them. But they will not forsake us long; Herr Carl has already taken steps to make himself a citizen of the United States.

Musical Correspondence.

BALTIMORE, JUNE 10.—Music, in Baltimore, or at least good music, seems by nine-tenths of the public to be looked at, when they condescend to look at all, in the light of a very secondary matter; not to be for a moment compared to the merits of politics, horse racing or prize fights! One may look till he is gray in the four daily papers, without finding so much as a hint that any decent music is to be heard: except it may be in the advertisement columns. It would seem as though nothing but one of Gilmore's earthquakes would turn the attention of the public to the fact of there being such a thing as "the divine art."

Previous to the formation of the "Peabody Institute," four years ago, the amount of music which could be heard outside the churches and theatres was extremely small. There are amateur concerts, confined as to programmes mostly to opera selections; and as they seem to have had very few really good vocal teachers, the style of singing can be better imagined than described. Then there are performances of the "Independent Blues" Band, which seems to have been the "Gormanian" of Baltimore. Then occasional visits from Opera companies (the Richings troupe being here at present); and concerts from most of the travelling companies; and lastly, occasional Piano Recitals by resident professors.

The music in the churches seems to be a weak imitation of New York. Certainly the performance of Haydn's 2nd Mass at the Cathedral (a really fine Catholic Church) which the writer heard, was very bad; the accompaniment being a wheezy old organ by Erben, played however by quite a good organist. I pitied him! The choir of some 15 or 20 being under the direction (?) of an antiquated individual of about 90 summers, who, having a very conspicuous position in front of the choir, beat time as if he were turning the crank of a barrel organ, using one hand to put them out of time, and the other in frantic attempts at confusing everybody (himself included) as to what was to be done next!

The tempos were taken at a fearfully fast rate, the soprano singing like a steam engine, and arriving at the end of her solo in the Kyrie before the choir had found their places even; consequently these last did not come in, and it had to be done all over again! It was a little better in the Gloria, but not much. The responses, composed (!!) by the director, came in 20 seconds, by my watch, after the celebrant's voice had ceased.

At St. Paul's Episcopal church there is a choir of boys and men. The organ being on one side of the chancel, and the singers on the other, an astonishing variety of tempos is the result; but the organ was played quite well (for Baltimore), and one of the boys had a fine voice, singing a solo in one of the hymns quite nicely.

I did not visit the theatres, as the season was over. Baltimore has, however, only one regular theatre, the others being "variety entertainments."

I come now to a much more promising subject, viz.: the Peabody Institute. Probably most of your readers are aware that Mr. Peabody left, or gave rather, a very large sum, to establish an institution for the higher artistic education of the people of Baltimore. The interest of this,—after erecting the magnificent building of white marble, in a beautiful situation, near the Washington monument, and forming one side of the square—amounts to something over $50,000 per annum. This immense sum is in the hands of a Board of 200 Directors, one of whom is General Grant.

So far the interest of the fund has been expended on two departments only: the Library and the Academy of Music, of which latter Mr. L. H. Southard, formerly of Boston, is the director. I have just stated that the fund is expended (or so much as the board think proper) on two departments. Such is the fact. But I beg the reader not to suppose for a moment that it is equally divided: by no means. Nothing could possibly show more clearly the estimation in which music is held in Baltimore, than the proportion of this fund of $55,000 which is set apart for the Academy of Music, which consists of a Conservatory, having a building of its own, next to the Institute, and organized something after the manner of our Boston Conservatories, and the formation of a grand orchestra, and a series of orchestral concerts yearly. Any one acquainted with the details of the management of good orchestral performances, does not need to be told how very expensive it is. The pay of members of the orchestra in Baltimore is about the same as in Boston, and as the orchestra numbers some 40 or more, the expense must be very large.

As Mr. Peabody directed that only a nominal sum should be charged at the door, and as great liberality is exercised by the management in this respect (for instance, no one who comes without having purchased a ticket of admission is ever refused entrance!), very little can be realized from this source. Also the concerts are not advertised as with us; merely an announcement being inserted in one or two daily papers on the day of the performance.

For all this outlay the directors appropriate the sum of $5,000 of the above fund, which must carry on the Conservatory, pay the salary of the Director, pay the members of the orchestra, copying, new music, instruments, &c., &c. And this notwithstanding the expressed wish of the giver (in writing) that music should be one of the principal features of the Institute!

It is almost unnecessary to affirm that none but a Yankee and a Bostonian would be able to do much with so miserable a pittance.

But Mr. Southard has organized a complete orchestra (the largest number they had got together before of their own performers, being from 13 to 20, with which they used to do Beethoven's Symphonies!) consisting of 11 violins (6 first and 5 second), 4 violas, 2 violoncellos, 3 double basses, 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 2 trumpets (cornets), 4 French horns, 3 trombones, tuba, and full set of drums.

It will be seen at a glance that the band is weak in the string department, there being brass and wood enough for three times the number of violins. Unfortunately, too, the wind instruments play rather coarsely, which makes it all the worse. On the other hand, the hall in the Peabody Institute is not very large, holding only about 11,000 people, and the wind instruments are placed in a recess at one end, which has the effect of muffling them somewhat, while the strings are in front, and brought out into the hall, rendering the whole orchestra tolerably well balanced. A curious idea, and one I never saw elsewhere, is the standing up of the band during performance; it gives them a stiff, awkward appearance, not at all pleasing.

It is perhaps unnecessary to add that the latest "improvements" introduced by Mr. Theo. Thomas in Boston, of symmetrical bowing, a real pianissimo, terracing the performers, &c., have not yet reached Baltimore. (They were a long while reaching Boston, for that matter!)

A glance at the programme for the past two seasons will show what has been done in the way of introducing good music to the people of Baltimore: Beethoven's 1st, 2d, 5th and 7th Symphonies have been given, and his E-flat Concerto twice; Mozart's Symphonies in C and E-flat, and his Concerto in D minor; Gade's Symphony in C twice or more; the Scotch Symphony of Mendelssohn; two movements of the great Schubert Symphony in C, (the 9th); two symphonies of Haydn, one in E-flat and one in D; two movements of Spohr's Symphony, Op. 78, &c.

Of Overtures a great variety have been given: 3 by Mendelssohn ("Ruy Blas," "Fingal's Cave," and "Midsummer Night's Dream"); 4 by Weber; 2 by Mozart; 6 by Rossini; 5 by Anber; 2 by Boieldieu; 2 by Suppé; and one each by Meyerbeer, Cherubini, Reinecke, Nicolai, Spontini, Donizetti, Balfe, Flotow, Reissiger, and Onslow. Also Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillant (with Orchestra), Op. 22; his Serenade and Allegro giocoso, Op. 43, and the whole of his "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. Besides these, a great number of smaller pieces have been given, some of them arranged in a really effective manner by the director.

I have been greatly interested in examining this trial of an American in a sphere, where but very few (in this country at least) are placed. There seems to be no doubt but that we have got to have, sometime, (and that not far distant), orchestras manned and directed by Americans:—that is, if we are to have orchestral music at all.

In England it was formerly as with us; they relied on German performers; but now their orchestras are largely made up of Englishmen, and to any one who has heard the best London concerts, it is needless to state that the performances have lost nothing in quality by the change.

As to the best means for bringing about this most desirable state of things, it is not the purpose of the writer to inquire, but I think one thing has been fully proved by this experiment in Baltimore, and that is: that, given even a small amount of support, a good musician will acquit himself creditably at the head of an orchestra, be he of what nationality he may.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

There is no more night than day. Song and Chorus. 3. E-flat to E-flat. Holmes. 30

"Ah! don't be sorrowful, darling,
And don't be sorrowful, pray;
For taking the world together, my dear,
There is no more night than day."
Dreams. (Trümlied. 4. D-flat to D-flat. Westmeyer. 30

"Were I a dream, I'd steal into thy heart,
And there would bud and bloom as blooms the rose."
Darling Nellie Kay. Song and Chorus. 2. G to C. Hoag. 30

"When the sun has gone to rest,
And the stars are twinkling bright,
I take the little footpath worn
That leads to yonder light."
They are sleeping. Song, Duet, and Chorus. 2. C to C. J. G. Clark. 40

Quite effective for the annual Decoration service.
"They are sleeping where flowers of the glade and the hill

In a mantle of love have arrayed them,
While the cannon is hushed, and the bugle is still,
Sleeping on where their comrades have laid them."
I really am so sleepy. Humorous. 3. G to C. Gatty. 30

A very funny song when well acted.
"I'm going to try and sing a song,
I don't know if I can;
For the truth is this, I really am
A very sleepy man."

Instrumental.

All Alone. Nocturne. 3. C. Op. 7. Bussenius. 30

A beautiful Andante movement in 3-4 rhythm.
Fantasia. 4. E-flat. Op. 4. Bussenius. 40
A very melodious Allegro movement in quadruple measure, with the accompaniment in chords of triplets.

Both these pieces are destined to become great favorites.

Rose of Allandale Quickstep. 2. C. E. L. White. 30

The Kiss Polka. 3. F. Op. 38. Moelling. 30
A sparkling little Polka, with a good "swing" and merry accent.

Palace March. 3. D. Geo. W. Lyon. 60
With an elegant title illustrating a scene on the Union Pacific Railroad with a "Pullman" train speeding through a mountain pass.

Wagner on Conducting.

Translations, for this Journal, from "Ueber das Dirigiren,"
by RICHARD WAGNER.

II.

—What might not a Conductor do, if he but rightly understood his position toward the Theatre, to which in fact he owes his office and his dignity! On the contrary he treats the Opera (to which the wretched care of this kind of Art upon the German stage gives him a doleful right) as a burthensome day labor to be borne with sighs, while he puts his point of honor in the concert hall, whence he was called. For, as I have said, so soon as the intendency of a theatre once sets its heart on having some musician of renown for Kapellmeister, he must come from anywhere else rather than from the Theatre.

Now, to be able to judge what such a quondam Concert and Singacademie Director can accomplish, we must seek him where he is peculiarly at home, and where his reputation as a "sound" German musician has been founded. We must observe him as a Concert Director.

From my earliest youth I have had a singular impression of unsatisfactoriness in the orchestral rendering of our classical instrumental music; and this impression has been confirmed as often as I have been present, even in the most recent times, at any such performance. What seemed to me so full of life and soul in its expression on the pianoforte, or as I read the score, I scarcely recognized again as it flew past the hearers for the most part unregarded. Especially was I astonished at the dullness of the Mozart Cantilena, which had stamped itself on me before as so alive and full of feeling. The reasons became clear to me only some time later; I have discussed them in my "Report on the foundation of a German Music School in Munich" (1865). . . Certainly they lie first of all in the utter want of a veritable German Musical Conservatory, in the strictest sense of the word, which implies the conservation or preservation of the exact tradition of the way in which our classical masters had their own works performed; and this again presupposes that these masters actually succeeded there in getting their works performed entirely to their mind. Unfortunately this has escaped our German culture, and we are referred to the conjectures of each individual conductor, to what he thinks about the tempo or the rendering of a classical piece of music, to orient ourselves regarding its true spirit.

In my young days, in the famous Leipzig Gewandhaus concerts, these pieces were simply not conducted at all, but they were played away under the lead of the first violin, the then Concertmeister Matthäi, somewhat like the Overtures and entr'actes in a theatre. Of any disturbing individuality of the Conductor there was here nothing at all perceptible; moreover the principal works of our classical instrumental music, which of themselves offered no great technical difficulties, were regularly played through every winter: so they went with smoothness and precision; you saw that the orchestra, knowing them so thoroughly, enjoyed the annual re-greeting of the favorite works.

Only with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony they did not get along so well; yet they made it a point of honor to perform this also every year with the rest.—I had copied out for myself the score of this Symphony, and had made a piano arrangement of it for two hands. How astonished was I to get only the most confused impressions from the performance of it in the Gewandhaus; indeed I was so disheartened by it, that for some time I turned away entirely from the study of Beethoven, about whom this had thrown me wholly into doubt. But it was very instructive for me, that my later real pleasure in Mozart's instrumental works was only first awakened when I had the opportunity of conducting them myself, and could then allow myself to follow my own feeling for the animated delivery of the Mozart Cantilena. But it was the most thorough lesson to me, finally, to hear the "Ninth Symphony," which had at last become so questionable to me, played by the so-called Conservatoire Orchestra in Paris in the year 1839. Here the scales as it were fell from my eyes, showing me how much depended on the rendering, and I understood at once in what consisted here the secret of the happy solution of the problem. The orchestra had simply learned to recognize in every measure the Beethoven melody, which evidently had entirely escaped our brave Leipzig musicians at the time referred to; this melody the orchestra sang.

This was the secret. And to this they had been led through a Conductor of by no means special geniality; Habeneck, who achieved the great merit of this performance, had, after having this Symphony rehearsed throughout a whole winter, only felt the impression of the unintelligibility and ineffectiveness of this music; of which impression it is hard to say whether the German Conductors had ever condescended to feel it. But this determined Habeneck to study the Symphony through a second and a third year, and not to give it up until the new Beethoven Melos had dawned upon every musician, and, as these were musicians of the right feeling for melodious delivery, not until it was correctly reproduced by every one of them. For the rest, Habeneck was a musical director of the old stamp: he was the master, and all obeyed him.

The beauty of that rendering of the Ninth Symphony remains wholly indescribable to me. Yet, to give some idea of it, I select a passage, whereby (as I might easily do with any other) I will show at once the difficulty in the rendering of Beethoven, and the poor success of the German orchestra in the solution of the same. Never since, even by the most excellent orchestras, have I been able to hear this passage of the first movement:

executed with such perfect evenness, as I then heard it (thirty years ago) by the musicians of the Paris Conservatoire orchestra. In this one passage, as I have been repeatedly reminded in my later years, it became quite clear to me, how much depends on the orchestral delivery, since it includes in itself both motion and sustained tone, together with the law of Dynamics. Herein consisted the mastery of the Parisians, that they could execute this passage precisely as it stands written. Neither in Dresden, nor in London, in both which places I afterwards brought out this Symphony, could I succeed in making the shifting of the bows as well as of the strings quite imperceptible in the ascending figure which repeats itself; still less in suppressing the involuntary accentuation at the ascent of this passage, since it always comes natural to the ordinary musician to play stronger in going up and weaker in going down. At the fourth measure of the passage we always found ourselves in a crescendo, whereby a heavier accent was involuntarily, nay necessarily, imparted to the sustained G flat which enters with the fifth bar, thereby greatly injuring the peculiar tonal significance of that note. It is hard to bring a person of coarse feeling to perceive the bad expression which this passage gets when played off in this common music-making way, so contrary to the clearly indicated and expressed will of the master: to be sure, discontent, unrest, yearning are expressed in it even then; but what sort of discontent we only learn when we hear this passage executed as the master meant it, and as I have heard it only in the single instance of these Parisian musicians in the year 1839. I remember, that the impression of the dynamic monotony (pardon the seemingly absurd expression for a phenomenon so hard to indicate) in the uncommonly, nay eccentrically varied intervals of the ascending figure, coming out upon the long G flat, sung with infinite tenderness, and then answered by the G natural, which is sung with equal tenderness, initiated me, as if by magic, into the incomparable mysteries of the soul, then speaking to me so directly, openly, intelligibly and clearly.

But, not to dwell upon this sublime revelation, I only ask: In what way did it become possible to these Parisian musicians to arrive so infallibly at the solution of this difficult problem? Plainly in the first place only by the most conscientious pains-taking, such as is peculiar only to such musicians, who do not content themselves with mutual compliments, do not imagine that they understand every thing of themselves, but approach with modest unconcern that which they do not understand, while they seek to master what is difficult on the side where they are at home, namely on the side of technique. The French musician shows the excellent influence of the Italian school, to which he essentially belongs, in so far as music is for him only comprehensible through song: to play an instrument well means, for him, to be able to sing well on it. And, as I have said, that splendid orchestra actually sang this Symphony. But to be able to sing it properly, the right time-measure had, above all, to be found; and that was the second thing that impressed itself upon me on that occasion. The old Habeneck had certainly no abstract-aesthetic inspiration for it; he was utterly without "geniality": but he found the right tempo, by leading his orchestra on through persevering practice, until they caught the Melos of the Symphony.

But it is only the right conception of the Melos that can give one the right time: the two things are inseparable; the one determines the other. And if I do not shrink from passing judgment upon nearly all the performances of the classical instrumental works, pronouncing them unsatisfactory to a serious degree, I must go farther and assert, that our Conductors know absolutely nothing of right tempo, because they understand nothing about singing. Not a single German Kapellmeister, or other sort of musical director, occurs to me, who could actually, with a good or with a bad voice, sing a melody. On the contrary, for them music is a singularly abstract thing, something that hovers between Grammar, Arithmetic and Gymnastics; of which it is easy to comprehend how one instructed in it may be fit for a proper teacher in a Conservatory or a musical gymnasium, but not how such an one can lend life and soul to a musical performance.

Ferdinand Hiller on Richard Wagner.*

With regard to the style in which the members of the new community compose, their great principle, according to Wagner (whose principle, also, is said to emanate from Mendelssohn), is never to aim at producing an "impression or effect."† Wagner places these words sophistically enough side by side, as synonymous. He knows very well, however, that no one aims at not producing an impression, while the notion of producing an effect has obtained in Germany an unfavorable secondary signification. But when we see that the desire for effect has led a man like Wagner to absolute cudgelling in the Meistersinger, to the most violent outrage ever known upon art, good taste, music and poetry, some slight anxiety on the subject is very natural. "But this repugnance for effect sways this school even when performing classical music." A tribute is here paid Liszt as a pianist; as though it had ever entered the head of the partisans of any school in existence to doubt his enormous geniality in rendering any kind of music whatever, a geniality of which Mendelssohn himself spoke as of something marvellous. Hans von Bülow, also, Liszt's "einzig berufenster" successor, is so

† "Wirkung oder Effect."

‡ "Solely most-having-a-call," a pretty specimen of Wagnerian style. Despite a fearful martyrdom while translating Oper und Drama, and other works of the Laocœne Ancherite, I am not even quite perfect in the language invented by him to supply the place of German. As in the previous instance, therefore, I leave to those of our readers who possess a peculiar taste for riddles the task of saying what "solely most-having-a-call" signifies. It may be wisdom clothed in mystic garb, but, to the uninitiated, it resembles exceedingly unmitigated nonsense. Disbelievers in Herr B. Wagner's profundity may be pardoned if they sometimes feel tempted to adopt the theory that the Musician of the Future pads his sentences with grand words, to make believe there lurks a finely developed thought, just as some beauties call in the aid of cotton-wool to supply the place of certain charms which would otherwise be prominent only by their absence.—Translator.

supremely fortunate as to be praised. But why does not Wagner say a single word about Liszt's compositions? Why does he not mention Bülow as a conductor? The fact is, there is but one God, who is his own Prophet, and his name is Richard Wagner.

"The principal ingredient of this new school," the god goes on to say, "is a certain circumspectly reflective cautiousness of what it cannot do, with defamiation of what it would like to do." That it was possible to "entangle so sterling a nature as Schumann in this," he finds, "above everything sorrowful." From what is then said concerning Schumann, who is described as "amiable and thoroughly charming," but of whom it is also asserted that the "narrowness of his natural gifts was displayed, and he became bombastic and unnatural," we are completely incapable of gathering what Wagner really likes, and what he dislikes in him. This, however, is a matter of supreme indifference.

"But, under the power of these musical eunuchs, what becomes of our great and unspeakably magnificent German music?" exclaims Wagner, and he is overtaken by a slight feeling of anxiety for this wondrous inheritance of German genius. We do not find the answer to the question before we reach a subsequent page, after going through some long dissertations, which enter minutely into details, on the way in which his Meistersinger has been performed. He is supported "by the eminently consolatory conviction that, despite the very unintelligent way in which this work has been handled, its effective power is not to be destroyed—the fatal gift of effectiveness, against which the Leipzig Conservatory so zealously warns us, and which, as a punishment, cannot be got at, even in the way of destruction." This must strike him as the more marvellous, as he can no longer prevail on himself to be present at a performance of his works, and he therefore "draws, wonderful to say" (very wonderful) "from their said almost incomprehensibly effective power, a conclusion, peculiarly gratifying to him, respecting the relation of musicians conducting such compositions to our great classical music, the continuing existence of which, ever warning us anew, despite the stunting cultivation of such individuals, is, by this very thing, rendered intelligible to him. The fact is, they cannot destroy such things—and this conviction appears, strangely enough, to be growing into a sort of consolatory dogma for the Genius of Germany, with which dogma it tranquilizes itself on the one hand, believing and comfortably, while, on the other, it goes on creating in its own way!" (Let us take breath!)

"But what we should think of the wondrous conductors" (everything and everyone is wondrous!) remains to be asked," Wagner goes on to say. He tells us that: "The assumption of their excellence is firmly established—though he does not know one to whom he should consider himself justified in trusting with confidence a single tempo in his operas." (How terrible for the conductors!) He doubts their being "real musicians, for it is incontestable that they exhibit no musical feeling." Mozart explains it to him "by his enormous aptitude for arithmetic;" they are musical arithmeticians, but deficient in everything else, men to whom "the correct tempo of our music must be explained according to the regula de tre, since nothing can be imparted to them by the instrumentality of feeling."

The battle field is strewn with corpses—we breathe death and corruption. But the tyrant now experiences a human emotion, and, on the last page, flings our admirable Joachim a half encouraging greeting. He has not heard him himself, but he has heard others speak of him—and he is glad to believe that in his playing we "recognize the beneficial result of a many years' intimate intercourse with Liszt." However, "the conductor's stick is said not to have obeyed him well; composing, too, appears to have embittered him more than it has delighted others." Wagner is rendered, moreover, suspicious by having been informed that: "Joachim is expecting a fresh Messiah for music." But: "Bravely, forwards!" he exclaims to him. "If he himself should happen to be the Messiah, he might at least hope not to be crucified by the Jews!" And with this delicate, cheerful, and clever turn, Wagner concludes.

But what can have impelled Wagner to indulge in these outrageous diatribes? Above might else, anxiety for his works. Whenever anything in them does not please, the fault is attributed to the bad execution, and if they strike many persons as too long, it is because they have been cut too much. For "Cut, Cut—is the ultima ratio of our worthy Capellmeister." There can be no question that a great deal too much is done in this way, yet it is a "wonderful" fact that this violent system of curtailment was never applied to such operas as Figaro, Die Vestalin, Fidelio, Der

Yes! respected Dr. Hiller. With all my heart! The slightest repulse is a boon.—Translator.

Freischütz, Jessonda, etc. The system was first adopted in Germany for grand French operas. The latter were composed for a public who do not sup; they were, therefore, in their original length insupportable to persons who are hungry when they come into the theatre. Why has not the German Wagner accommodated himself to the German custom? He must console himself with his cousins, Shakespeares and Schillers, with whom very different liberties are taken than with him, but whose pieces may very well be witnessed even after his "Musicdrama."—Another reason why Wagner attacks every mortal thing in the way of music is that as yet all German musicians have not sworn allegiance to his standard. If we reflect how short was the active public career of Mendelssohn, and what a comprehensive influence Wagner ascribes to it, though, it is true, only in a bad sense, even now, twenty-three years after Mendelssohn's death, it seems indeed "wonderful" how insignificant, and how superficial is Wagner's influence on the majority of his artistic contemporaries, after a very noisy, and, to some extent, successful career of thirty years.—According to Wagner himself there is only one way of explaining this—his contemporaries are too-narrow-minded, too shallow, too deficient in character; "their love, their belief, their hope, all is artificial." In Wagner, it must be confessed, all these qualities are in the highest degree natural: he is his own love, his own belief, his own hope, his own all.

His sudden and tender anxiety for the prosperity of our "unspeakably magnificent music," can, therefore, merely conjure up an incredulous smile. Not that he is incapable of appreciating Beethoven's or Weber's music—the former master, according even to the assertions of Wagner's own apostles, supplied him with "materials" for his monuments, and the other, in Euryanthe, had at least a "presentiment" of him. But whether Bach, Handel, Haydn, Cherubini, and Mendelssohn, are ever performed is to him a matter of utter indifference, and, when they are performed, the effect on him is rather disagreeable than otherwise.

The most outrageous thing, however, is that Wagner speaks about subjects, men, and works, of which his knowledge is most superficial. Living, for the last two-and-twenty years, in Switzerland, devoted to his labors and his pleasures, he has interrupted this existence on only a few occasions, to direct performances of some of his own works—and now and then to conduct a symphony or two. He lives so completely in a sphere peculiarly his own, that, as we know, he does not care about hearing any more music—it diverts his attention, impedes and annoys him. He never was present at the performance of any great work, or at one of our Musical Festivals, and nearly all our modern concert institutions, the musical blossom of Germany, are strange to him. Does he know aught of the compositions of recent times? We should hardly say so. Brahms once played him some variations, from which he saw "that he does not understand joking"—but, except this, he appears to have seen only his most trivial work—his "Waltzes with Song." Max Bruch is not mentioned—perhaps because he succeeds in producing an "impression or effect." Does Wagner know Bargiel's Overtures, which could certainly not fail to interest them? With what Joachim has done, he is acquainted only by hearsay. And thus he throws everything, indiscriminately, like a lot of vegetables, simultaneously, into one pot.

The majority of our "Music-Bankers" may be deficient in any great productive power—they may not all be admirable conductors—but, completely as they differ from each other in disposition, talent, and every thing that constitutes individuality, we find in Germany, fortunately, at the present day, a common trait in innumerable instances: earnestness, and love of what is done. That these qualities frequently do not suffice, when the industrial, financial, and executive resources on which our art depends are too small, is a matter of course. But it is touching to find that there are often in the smallest towns conductors who shun no labor, no sacrifice, to do their part towards the propagation and advancement of our great German music, and who succeed in obtaining most splendid results. In this respect, Mendelssohn's example has indeed produced its fruits. Notwithstanding the vast amount he did as a composer, he always managed to find time for devoting his talent, his energy, and his love to the works of our masters. If Wagner does not know of a single conductor but himself, and if he is so tortured by anxiety for our "unspeakably beautiful music," why does he not allow the light of his own example to shine upon us? He has in Munich the most magnificent means at his disposal; he possesses an amount of influence, such as, probably, no composer ever possessed before him—why does he not give model performances in the Bavarian capital, and thus form a new school of conductors? The attendance would certainly be numerous—for if a man has only confidence in himself, the rest of the world also will have confidence in him.

What tricks Wagner plays with musical history whenever it does not suit his purpose, I took an opportunity of showing on a former occasion. This latest work, also, swarms with similar instances. Each instance must characterize entire epochs, and, in consequence, it characterizes them falsely. But I leave these things to more learned colleagues, as there is reason to fear I have already run to too great a length, and I hate the pruning-knife no less than does the autocrat of the Lake of Lucerne.

That I am mentioned and, also, even when not mentioned, duly put down, in the pamphlet is a matter of course. I do not, however, experience any impulse either to defend myself or to sound my own praises, but merely exclaim with Goethe's painter: "What I have painted, I have painted."

As a cheerful finish let me give one more short quotation: "The assumption of the excellence of the wonderful conductors is so firmly established," Wagner writes at page 82, "that the entire musical community does not feel the slightest hesitation as to who, when the nation determines to have something played (as, for instance, at grand Musical Festivals), shall beat time. It can be only Herr Hiller, Herr Riets, or Herr Lachner. It would be utterly impossible for the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birth to be celebrated if these three gentlemen were suddenly to sprain their hands." Quite correct! And since the great happiness and honor have devolved upon me of having to conduct at the said splendid festival, I will treat my hands with as much attention, and take as much care of them up to then, as though I were the most lovely Parisian coquette. Let me, therefore, quickly lay down the pen—and not be in too great hurry to dip it again in the ink for another such fatiguing effort as the present.

The German Lied.—Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Franz, etc.

(From Kutzer's Letters on Music.)

Schubert rendered the song (Lied) of so much consequence, that it is worth while to trace its progress up to our own day. I do not think I shall be accused of discourtesy, if I preserve a discreet silence in respect to what Mendelssohn has accomplished in this branch. The historian who has to relate the life of a small king, after having told that of a great one, is to be pitied if he has not the opportunity of growing angry with the former; if his subject is so full of good-citizen virtue and integrity, that he has no chance to grow impassioned in praise or blame of him. The saddest, the most difficult task for an author, is that of writing the history of mediocrity. And that is the history of the Lied, from Schubert to Mendelssohn,—a story of tiresome respectability. In that delightful time when people read the "Horen" as to-day they read any literary journal, when a couple of sheets were added every week to the history of German literature, not a Schiller or Goethe ballad could appear, upon which every good-humored song-composer did not make a display of how far a misunderstanding of the sense of the poem could be carried. So, permit me to be silent, and go back a step with me before we proceed. It must sound strange to you that I have not said anything of Beethoven's songs; and yet would you not also wonder if any one should enter upon a history of Shakespeare's sonnets? Yet it is undeniable that this man wrote a few fine poems in this form; as undeniable as that "Adelaide," the Scotch songs, the cycle of songs, "To the Beloved One," and the Gellert sacred songs, are glorious. But what has this supernatural, symphonic nature to do with songs? He gave them on occasion, as we give alms to a pretty beggar-child. But such little humanities rarely begged from him: he had hardened his heart. It was not his intention to sport with flowers. Those longing moods of mind, which in us become tender little songs, he fashioned into great adagios. In a word, one human breast is not large enough for his songs: they need the immeasurable extent of the complete orchestra. How many of Schubert's instrumental movements are only songs in disguise, looking out of the serious mask with lovely, childish eyes; while Beethoven's songs, on the contrary, are generally only an enchanted orchestral thought. Even in the Scotch songs, he adds a violin and violoncello accompaniment, as if he feared to be alone with the human voice.

Mendelssohn and his great contemporaries were the first who awakened the Lied to new life after Schubert's death. I will speak of them as briefly as possible, lest you should grow weary of two persons of whom you have already heard so much from me.

In this form, Mendelssohn adhered to outward beauty, above all things. He chose rather to break with the poet than to sin against lovely agreeability. He preferred poems which were limited in feeling to the boundaries of pleasant gracefulness, to those in which the strong waves of passion threatened danger to the fragile bark of song. Schumann often selected subjects lying near the boundaries of the uncomposable, and his boat often rocked on the dangerous breakers. He was always inclined to give the situation a picturesque localization; while Mendelssohn took the greatest care to form a finely-felt vocal part, without having any especial vocation for it. Schumann often wrote powerfully for the voice, and often laid the principal feeling in the pianoforte accompaniment, so that the vocal portion only plays a melodramatic part, and the Lied becomes a scene. The difference between the songs of these masters resembles the difference between a regularly handsome and an interesting face. When such a choice presents itself, you know how rapidly I make my decision! I have admired fine heads all my life; I have even worshipped them: but I have loved only the interesting ones. Titan's Venus herself was never dangerous to me; but I would have given my life for a smile from Leonardo's Mona Lisa. There are many among Schumann's songs that cannot be considered as works of art in this sense, or recommended as models: nevertheless, every one of them has deeply moved me; yes, these songs have "broken through the secret path to my heart," and arched my lyrical horizon.

Schumann at last went so far as to leave the poem for declamation, and only wrote a pianoforte accompaniment. Here I stand near the boundaries of my enthusiasm for this master; for my nature rebels against this dualism of declamation and music. It is a very proper instinct that forbids the marriage of brothers and sisters among civilized nations. What! declamation wedded to music? Is not that like playing the organ while the sermon is going on? Is not that oppressing the sensuous tone of speech with the more powerful force of music, interrupting and scattering the thoughts of the poet? Speech and music both move us through the ear first; but the former only moves us symbolically. Sensuous effect in a poem is of the same consequence as poetic intention in a composition. For the great significance of speech lies in the thought: that of music in the tone. Some one may make a stupid speech with a very fine voice: but does this improve the speech? Some one may write a stupid composition to a very poetic programme: but will this render the music less dull? One can hardly believe how many distracting things have been written on these simple subjects. What is nearer to our hearts, and more natural, than a wish to unite thought and tone? As soon as people began to compose to the poet's thought, the sound of speech was destroyed, and that of song commenced. But that was not enough. The thought must be not only sung, but also played; and thus arose that wonderful twin-birth, which consoles itself for want of a decided distinction of race, by belonging to two races at once. So that we may know, that, behind these ignorant, absurd musicians, a literary, a cultivated creature is hidden, a programme is put into our hand, by means of which we unravel the enigmas, and which always reminds me of a college diploma, and of those suspicious tablets, which a few of the old masters used to place in the mouth or hand of their figures, lest their creatures should be misjudged.

A marriage between speech and tone is a misalliance: if they are to be equals, speech must be elevated to the rank of tone. The song may be as recitative-like as possible. I can imagine many tragic situations in the opera possible, in which the composer, having exhausted all means of musical gradation, might produce a remarkable tragic effect by forsaking his art, and permitting the entrance of the spoken word. But the singular and uncommon effect of this would only lie in the momentary abandonment of all those conditions upon which the relations of poetry to music repose. I can only account for such an error in regard to the fundamental aspects of both arts, in such a man as Schumann, by acknowledging that he had an especial inclination to try experiments. We will, then, regard these ballads as an unfortunate experiment of this kind; for not even the declamatory talent of Seebach, and the piano-forte playing of the highly-gifted Clara Schumann, could save them.

After Schumann, we find a young song-composer, Robert Franz, drawing the general observation of artists towards his writings. He is evidently endowed with natural genius for song, and his originality is ripening, like that of all genuine talent, under the sun of industrious cultivation. He openly attaches himself to his great predecessors, and, with gradual certainty, acquires personal independence. So primely German, so homely a nature could not go astray into the path where we see so many of our dull talents parading, yet veiling the secrets of their descent and acquirements in alchemistic darkness. I am convinced that all genuine originality develops itself naturally from the highest flower of an art. The highest flower of an art like ours—an art that is ever progressive, and whose point of culmination was not attained in past centuries, as was that of the plastic arts—is almost always the last one. The Lied of Robert Franz undoubtedly originated from that of Schubert and Schumann. Here, as ever, we will avoid the tiresome question as to whether he has surpassed them or not. There is no measure of length in art. And, if we wish to exercise our pleasure in discrimination, we must look away from quantitative estimates. Would that it were as easy for us to satisfy ourselves as to what distinguishes the songs of these three men from each other in particular, and what features they possess in common, as it is for us to cherish a desire to do so!

I will try to help myself in my own way, by imaginative language. I have known maidens who were like songs: why should I not try to personify the Lied, and think of it as of maidens,—lovely, romantic, and intellectual? All three charm me with almost equal power: one delights my eye, one my heart, and one my mind. Each one possesses a portion of the other's gifts. The fair one is not unfeeling, the romantic one is not stupid, the intellectual one is not ugly and not heartless: but in the first, beauty is predominant; in the second, sentiment exceeds every thing else; in the third, mind is all-conquering. I might spare myself the application of this figure, were not clearness a courtesy incumbent on a speaker. The lovely Lied that ravishes our senses so irresistibly, whose beautiful arched mouth trembles with the feeling of sinuous motives, as though it stirred, desiring to say the most precious things,—whose can this be but Schubert's? That sensitive song, with the warmly throbbing boom, within which sleeps a world of sweet maiden-power, with beautiful eyes cast down with modest ardor,—can it be any other than of Robert Franz? And am I wrong in terming Schumann's Lied essentially intellectual? Its features are as transparent, as finely cut, as though modelled by thought itself; but on its forehead already lie those fatal furrows formed by the plough of thought. And if I must say what feelings seem to me to predominate in the songs of each composer, then I will designate Schubert as the writer of the loveliest songs; Franz as the most inward, and, in a certain sense, the strongest composer of them; while Schumann's heart was more many-sided than that of either of the others. In all such comparisons, we must consider only the complete effect, regard the objects at a certain distance, and allow the foreground to remain clear, so that a closer personal preference and prejudice may not cause an error in perspective judgment. Nor should we prize that judgment too highly; although we can never become aware of the agreements of differences between two things without profit to ourselves, let us regard them from what point we may.

The Lied has been greatly cultivated lately. Among the many who have essayed their talent in this branch, Brahms, Rubinstein in the "Persian Songs," seem to me the most prominent. When the former is not too much subdued by the despotism of piano-forte ideas, he writes most charmingly. Tyranny is equally injurious, whether it comes from above or from below. Neither the song nor the piano-forte should be fettered. Song (the Lied) commenced under the sovereignty of the voice: let us beware of that of the piano-forte. In Rubinstein's Persian Songs, the life of a proud, excessive, natural force circulates. Overdrawn realism is the rock of this artist. When he ceases to produce so much en masse, when he resolves to give us, instead of a dozen pieces, the extract of twelve in one, when he learns to curb the unbridled wildness of his temperament with idealism, we shall expect the greatest things from him. Among the Persian Songs, there are two of heavenly beauty; while, on the other hand, many among them sound like the roaring of the sea or the howling of the wind,—a natural cry indeed, but not a lovely sound to listen to.

The Ammergau Passion Play.

(From the London Orchestra.)

The decennial performance of the Life and Death of the Saviour, a "mystery" which has survived the extinction of similar performances, in other and more civilized parts of Europe, attracts much interest in Ober-Ammergau, in the Bavarian highlands. From Munich crowds betake themselves to the locality of the play. The vitality displayed by the rude form of religious art in Bavaria is not a little curious. In other countries such an exhibition would be stigmatized as profane, but the Bavarians combat any such insinuation. The Bavarian roman-cist, Herman Schmid, asserts that the villagers are inspired with the simplest feeling of piety in what they do. The players do not strut their hour precisely for the love of praise; they approach their business not with histrionic vanity, but as if they were fulfilling a sort of moral engagement; but there is a little money consideration at the bottom, after all. The prices to the seats at the Passion Play are dearer than to the Opera, and of the proceeds the first 15,000 florins, it is true, are devoted to the charities of the parish, and the next to defray the expenses attending the getting up of the entertainment; but every kreutzer received after that goes into the pockets of the performers. When the surplus is distributed each one's share cannot be very large, as there are no less than five hundred in the company. There are 104 speaking rôles for male characters, 15 for female, and some 250 walking parts for men, women, and children, the latter being generally dressed up to represent a choir of angels, according to the pictorial conception of the celestial beings. To these must be added the orchestra of thirty musicians, the machinists, scene-shifters, property-men, and call-boy, who must have no sinecure if he has to run out for beer in the intervals of the performance. Over half of the troop, on this occasion, are born villagers of Ammergau, and the majority of their carvers on wood, the staple employment of that district. The Apostle Peter is the same this year as ten years ago—the sculptor Hott. So is Judas Iscariot, his "mate" Lechner, who looks the character to painfulness, a fallow red-bearded man with sinister countenance lit up by brilliant deep set eyes. Lang, the high priest Caiaphas, keeps a shop for the sale of ivory ornaments, and but repeats the part he enacted in 1860; so with Nicodemus, Pontius Pilate, and Joseph of Arimathea. The man who played Christ in 1860 will play Ananias now. The Apostle John will be rendered by a new actor, Johann Zwink, a handsome youth with a gentle languishingly-tender face, marvellously resembling in its expression those seen in the portraits of the beloved disciple. The part in the drama, that of Christ, is intrusted to one Joseph Mayer, who is as well fitted to it physically as any mere mortal can be expected to be. He is a thoughtful-looking man, with thin features, cast in a serious mould; his voice is musical, and abundant tresses of rich auburn hair fall on his shoulders, while a moustache and beard of some what deeper hue conceal his lips and chin. The Virgin Mary looks to be a gentle lissome maiden of eighteen summers. The contrast would be suggestive, to one of those unsparring vaudevillistes of Paris, of Christ thanking her for the care she has bestowed on him for three-and-thirty years. But the good peasants do not form their judgment on the standard of the pit of the Palais Royal; in their minds, and there is poetry in the idea, the Virgin enjoys eternal youth—is an etherealized creature of early bloom and freshness. The costumes are historically correct—that is as far as our ideas are true of what the costumes were at the period when the Scripture events illustrated took place. And the persons selected to fill the various parts, too, appear to have been chosen neither by lot nor favoritism, but for some resemblance in cast of face, and in those indications in which Lavater had so much faith—to the worthies of the New Testament they represent.

Nineteen performances of the Passion are given in all. There will be repetitions on the 6th, 12th, and 25th of June, the 3rd, 10th, 17th, 24th, and 31st of July, the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th of August, the 8th, 11th, 18th, 25th, and 29th of September; the latter closes the series. The prices of admission are three florins (not six shillings) to the first stalls, and two florins 24 kreutzers to the second. These possess no advantage over the pit seats (indeed the view from them is worse) except that one is in a more elevated position, is elbowd by a more exclusive class of society, and is protected from the sun's heat by a cantling. The best seats in the building, were it not for the sunshine, are those full in front of the stage and behind the orchestra. The rate for them is 1 florin 45 kreutzers, whilst those immediately above them are the even florin. The poorer members of the congregation—that is the right word in this connection, for their demeanor showed that they regarded it as a semi-religious rite, not as a stage show—well-behaved, respectful people, were ranged in the rows of seats to the right and left of the pit, the tariff for which was fixed at 48 kreutzers and half-a-florin respectively. There was no applause at any period except at the end, and then it came from a French group, and from the looks with which it was received, seemed to be regarded as an impertinence by the simple, earnest folk of the locality. The staff of the leader of the orchestra was held by the schoolmaster of the village, who also gave the time to the choruses.

At the close of the overture the chorus entered from the wings. The Corypheus, a tall, handsome bearded man, led the moiety that came in from the right, and the principal male singer that which came in from the left. The Corypheus delivers the prologue. The chorus then fall back, taking up their stations to the right and left on the forestage, and, as the curtain rises, discovering a tableau, sing a rhymed description of its meaning in choruses, and interspersed with airs and duets. The first illustration is "Paradise Lost." The Garden of Eden is represented, blooming apple-trees prominent in the foreground, one of which, with a large rosy crop on its branches, was intended for that which bore the fruit of knowledge. On a rising ground, in the middle of the garden, stands the angel, a young man in cloudy azure and white, with the flaming sword. Adam was personified by a strongly-built, bronzed man, with matted hair; his fine limbs were covered with tights, and a fleece hung round his loins; he stood in an attitude well expressing conscience-stricken horror. To his right, and nearer to the garden gate, cowered beneath a bush the shame-faced Eve, with her long golden hair streaming in tangled skeins over her shoulders. The first tableau was earnest that the Mystery had been presided over by an artistic spirit. The grouping was highly effective, natural, and easy, void of crudity and art-school stiffness. On the curtain descending, the chorus, still singing, take up their former position in a measured way. On the curtain rising again, an extremely beautiful scene was exhibited. A large cross was discovered, an angel encompassing its foot, and before it, bending in mute admiration, a charmingly-disposed crowd of flaxen-haired children. At this portion of the play, the chorus, sinking to their knees, and raising their hands in graceful union, sing a beautiful hymn of thanksgiving to the Almighty. The chorus retire as the curtain falls, to rise again almost immediately on the opening of the actual play, or rather Mystery.

A triumphant strain bursts from the orchestra as the head of a procession emerges from the back of the street on the right, crossing the stage with exultant mien. First come little children, then youths and maidens, all dressed in the supposed costume of the time; the host bear with them palm branches, which they strew on the ground, and in some cases, they spread their garments also, as recorded in the Sacred Scriptures. The middle-aged and the old of both sexes singing an anthem of jubilee follow, and group themselves on the stage around our Saviour, who enters with the mass of people riding on an ass led by one of them, and carrying a waving branch of palm in his hand. Meanwhile the Pharisees and the Sadducees, and the learned in the law, come upon the scene angrily, deriding the multitude who greeted Jesus, and showing their hatred to the proceeding, and their chagrin at the reception given to the Galilean. The "Man of Sorrows" was represented unexceptionably, if one could divest one's self of the strong impression that all representations of the kind must savor more or less of irreverent familiarity. Joseph Mayer, the villager intrusted with the part, is about the age and figure that corresponds with the character; he is tall, of an imposing presence, symmetrically-built, with regular, expressive features of an olive tint. His fine intellectual forehead rises over eyes full of a quiet melancholy, and the same serious, thoughtful, almost suffering expression is borne out by the entire cast of countenance, and by the delicately formed and fine lips shaded by a pencilling of black moustache and bordered by a wealth of beard that gives him a singular resemblance to the portrait of the Saviour by Rubens. His rich dark hair, parted in the middle, added to the illusion which was created by his entire look and gait, his outward seeming of moderation, virtue and self-denial. When he descended from the ass the illusion was unbroken; every step and attitude was dignified, had a certain majesty about it, and the tones of his voice were musical and the enunciation most distinct. He was clad in the costume to be seen in most of the altar pieces of the Roman Catholic churches in south-countries, a violet robe and an outer garment of an amaranth hue. His feet were sandalled. The utmost accuracy was aimed at in the attire of the Jewish priests and doctors of the law. Caiaphas, who rushed in with the others, was impersonated by a fine-looking man gorgeously apparelled. His garb was one shine of gold on ground of satin; on his breast was displayed the traditional plate, fashioned after that worn by Aaron—a piece of embroidery some ten inches square, containing twelve precious stones in four rows, on each of which was engraved the name of one of the tribes of Israel. This breastplate was fastened to the ephod, a sleeveless vest of fine linen, with purple, blue, and scarlet interwoven; then he had his upper vestment of blue with pomegranates wrought upon it, and on his head a mitre of fine linen with a yellow plate bearing the Hebrew inscription of "Holiness to the Lord" in front, and two half moon-like cornua tapering from the end. The Rabbis wore robes of black with birettas, both bound plentifully with bands of gold. There could not have been less than three hundred persons on the stage at this time, mixed in a most elaborately devised confusion. The action of the welcome to Jerusalem takes place on the fore stage, but in the recess behind the curtain the interior of the Temple is represented, with its money-changers and dealers in full swing of business activity. Christ enters, drives them out with the cord of his girdle, upsets their tables, and scatters their money. A realistic coloring is given to the episode by the escape of three doves from the upturned basket of a birdseller. "My house is a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves," the very language of the book—is cast by the Saviour at the retreating herd as he re-enters on the stage. The multitude renews its hosannas for the king that cometh in the name of the Lord, "lowly and riding upon an ass;" the Pharisees with their ostentatious phylacteries raise their shouts of "Moses is the only prophet," and their followers in the garments fringed and tufted on the border, the ignoble vulgus of Jerusalem, join in the howl. The crowd divided into two factions, the partisans of the old order of things on one side, the followers of Christ on the other, the "Man of Sorrows" takes leave of the people previous to his departure for Bethany, and the curtain falls.

The acts of the sacred drama are of two kinds: the chief acts are those representing the life of the Saviour; but there are intermediary tableaux taken from the Old Testament and employed in a typical sense. The first are called the Handlung, or action of the drama, the second are termed Vorstellungen, or scenes. Between the first and second parts of the action a Vorstellung was presented of the selling of Joseph into captivity. This is a type of the betrayal of Christ into the bondage of sin and death. After that the Handlung recommenced, representing a session of the Sanhedrim, presided over by Caiaphas in his gorgeous raiment, all clinquant with gold. Beside the high priest is seated another Jewish dignitary, Annas, sumptuously vested, wearing a like double-peaked mitre, and having, in addition, a venerable white beard, which imparted to his figure the genuine patriarchal look. Caiaphas, the Urim and Thummim glittering on his breast, rises several times in the course of the discussion as to what shall be done with Jesus. Most of the doctors of the law take part in it with a marvellous semblance of interest, speaking with the zealous quickness and earnestness of manner of strong political partisans on the night of a crucial debate, or of advocates in our own courts of justice. The Rabbis in black and gold are seated before two tables covered with scarlet cloth in the foreground. A money-dealer who had been chased out of the Temple enters and declares that he knows Judas, one of Christ's followers, and will undertake to persuade him to betray his master for a bribe. Thus finishes the scene.

The next Vorstellung opens with a picture of the young Tobias taking leave of his parents, followed by another of "the loving bride bewailing the loss of her bridegroom." Whilst this picture was before us a beautiful canticle was sung by the chorus. Both illustrations were intended to typify the adieux of Christ to Mary. In the Handlung which succeeded, Christ appears in the streets of Bethany and enters into the house of Simon (to which he is asked to dinner), where Mary and Martha await him. The scene changes to the interior, where a repast is spread, to which Christ and his companions sit them down. Martha is all eagerness in her hospitality; but Mary, when she enters, drops at the Saviour's knees, washes his feet with her tears, dries them with her long tresses, and afterwards pours the pot of precious ointment over his head. Martha is the first female character in the piece who has a passage to speak. At the end of the repast the Virgin Mary makes her apparition on the scene, to take leave of her son before his departure for Jerusalem, and this brings down the curtain. A modest rustic beauty they have chosen to fill this risky rôle of Mother of Christ—a rosy creature with a finely chiselled contour, a row of pearly teeth, with soft brown eyes, and brown hair, confined by a blue nun-like veil. Round her forehead a white band is worn, and under her chin a broad gamp of linen, like those used by the inmates of Roman Catholic cloisters. Her gown, which falls in graceful folds, is of the color we know as Solferino. The acting of the Virgin in the little she had to do in this instance, was marked by much thoughtfulness and quite matronly dignity. Her voice had in it a thrill of exceedingly womanly softness. The one point in which she fails—in which, indeed, most of these village artists of her sex fail—is in her movements. They are not—to be critical (and if we are not critical, we are nothing)—exactly sylphlike fawnlike, but ver so little heavy, as those of people accustomed to carry burdens.

The fourth Vorstellung presents us, in its opening tableau (accompanied by a jubilant chant, commencing "Jerusalem, Jerusalem"), King Ahasuerus raising the Jewish captive Esther to the throne of Persia, and sending away the proud Vashti. The chorus, in their song, make Esther symbolical of the new Church built up by our Saviour, and the downfall of Jerusalem and the old Hebrew religion. The corresponding Handlung presents us Christ and his followers on their way to Jerusalem. The Master rests an interval on the stage, weeping over the sinful city and foreboding its doom. As Christ leaves, the eleven true Apostles follow; but the unsteady Judas, who had been hanging back, remains, undecided how to act. It appears at one time as if his better feelings had gained the mastery of him, and he is about slowly to leave, when two of the dealers of the Temple enter, and call him by name, pretend that they are willing also to become followers of our Saviour, if their conversion should prove advantageous to them in a material sense. Upon this Judas shows them significantly his empty purse, and complains of the extravagance, not only permitted, but approved by Christ in Mary Magdalen's act of anointing him with ointment worth three hundred sequins. The money-dealers, finding him in the mood, tempt him to betray his Master, and, after an inward struggle, he consents. This is the conclusion of the fourth scene. Judas Iscariot was the great character in the Passion-Play, and must have felt some of the emotions he was charged to reproduce. If he did not he could not have reproduced them so truthfully, and this will be admitted to be the height of dramatic art. The soliloquy of this sandy-haired traitor and informer, in intention, assuredly was not one to commend him to admiration, yet as he went out there was a sort of subdued hum of approbation difficult to be restrained—so great is the ascendancy of genius.

The fifth scene introduces the best-peopled and best-managed tableau yet—that of the Israelites gathering manna in the wilderness of Shur. The typical nature of this picture hardly requires comment. Christ crucified is the Bread also which comes down from heaven. In the portion of the play which immediately succeeds this is made evident to the plainest sense. Peter and John enter, commissioned by their Master to follow into the house the man they should see fetching water in a pitcher, and to demand of the owner where was the guest chamber that they might eat of the pass-over. Peter and John are done to the life—the former, an elderly man, bald on the crown, is the strong, yet vacillating disciple of the Book; the latter is the sweet youth. The scene with the water-carrier, filling his vessel at a conch-like fountain on the right, was excellent, but for the stagey strut and voice of this servant, who inevitably reminded one of a "super" at Drury Lane, who had been suddenly elevated to the dignity of a talking part. This fellow had his usefulness, however; he was the exception that proved the rule of goodness. The Paschal Supper, how best to describe it? Happily Leonardo da Vinci has painted a picture, and that picture, as near as could be, was presented in the theatre of Ober-Ammergau. The table, the viands, and vessels upon it, and those that sat there, were the same. John was an animated photograph from the canvas. When Christ took off his mantle and wrapped a towel around his waist in order to go round and wash the feet of his apostles—an operation which was done with every dignity and decency—there was just one suppressed mocking laugh of Voltaire behind me. The brave peasantry saw nothing ridiculous in it, neither did the nobles who were present; for do not their King and the greater Kaiser of Austria perform the same ceremony to twelve beggars annually at Easter? During the progress of Christ, with his calmly earnest features, from one to another, a strain of soft music broke tremulously in waves of sound from the back of the building. When the sop was given to Judas with the command "that thou doest, do quickly," the traitor started up with fierce, hyena-like eyes, the broad still adhering to his lips and moustache—it seemed as if it would choke him were he to try to swallow it—and rushed frantically out. The perplexity to learn who was the destined betrayer (for the words to John were pronounced in an undertone) was graphically depicted.

The sixth scene shows us a tableau of Joseph sold by his brethren to the Midianite merchants, who count their twenty silver pieces on a tree stump. This was prefigurement of the betrayal to the Jews—that which the Handlung now coming calls before the mind. First, we have a sitting of the Sanhedrim once more: Judas is present, makes his market, and leaves with two of the Jews on his dirty errand; then we see in the seventh Vorstellung, which contains the actual arrest in the Garden of Olives, a tableau representing Adam earning his bread by the sweat of his brow. Our first parent, surrounded by scanty crops, rests his foot on a mattock, half driven into the soil; nude boys were around, one little fellow holding a large red apple in his hand, as if to reproach the mourning, sunburnt Eve, with the loss of the birthright she had sold for a frivolous curiosity. A second tableau—borrowed from the Second Book of Kings—shows us the treacherous greeting to Amasa by Joab, David's general, who, seizing his beard, as the custom was, under pretence to kiss him, plunges his dagger into his breast.

The play here becomes intensely dramatic—the Garden of Olives, with all that happened in it, is brought before us. This scene brought in mid-day and the Corypheus came forward to announce there would be a delay of an hour to permit the audience to refresh themselves. At one o'clock bang went a cannon-shot, and the audience streamed back for the opening of the second Abtheilung, or part.

[Conclusion next time.]

The So-Called Beethoven Centennial Festival.

(From the Nation, June 23.)

"And let the kettle to the trumpet speak,
The trumpet to the cannoner without,
The cannons to the heavens, heavens to earth."

At last we, too, have had our jubilee. Now that the star-spangled banner has been furlled and the smoke of the last cannon has been blown away, let us for a moment survey the field and see what it has profited us. Altogether it has been a very odd jubilee. If the true history of its tribulations, disasters, successes, strikes, broken promises, large expenditures, and small returns is ever written, it will be a most suggestive chapter for all future projectors of monster festivals to ponder over. Perhaps the most singular feature of this singular affair is that nobody seems to have known whose festival it was. Mr. Gilmore was the father of the Boston jubilee, and all his choral children knew him; but who fathers this one, and who were its sponsors? Beethoven's name is the only one that has been prominently put forward. Alas, poor composer! He hated monster festivals, and fled from them as scenes of discord utterly apart from all true purposes of art. Now that he is dead it is hard to make him responsible for what he so disliked while living. His name has been taken for the sake of the few dollars that it was hoped might be coined from it; but even as Beethoven was poor and thrifless in life, so his shade has brought no gold to the pockets of the speculators.

The idea of having a festival in this city in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birth was first taken into consideration last December by a number of gentlemen of means and musical taste. Mr. Bryant was their president. They had various committees, the musical committee consisting of ten gentlemen of highest standing. Mr. Mould and Mr. Vaux designed a magnificent building, to cost some three hundred thousand dollars, and to be erected in the Central Park. Sir Michael Costa was to be brought over from England to conduct. All the great living composers were to be asked to write something for the occasion. Every resource of art was to be taxed to make the affair one that should bring credit upon the city. But trouble arose as to the question of authority on the part of the Commissioners of the Central Park to permit the erection of a building to which an admission fee was to be charged. It was found that the Legislature would have to be applied to for a special act. Then came the old political bugbear, and the thing was at an end. Unless they could have the Central Park the committee would have nothing, and as this was found impracticable, the gentlemen of the committee quietly lit their cigars with the plans and specifications of their Coliseum and went to their several homes. So ended in smoke the first plan for the jubilee.

Then came the Great Unknown, and filled the papers with flaming advertisements of the mighty things that he was to bring to pass. Among other impossibilities, he announced that Handel's "Oratorio of the Creation" would be performed—a piece of intelligence that must have made old Haydn turn over in his grave. However, if he had only heard how dreadfully at least it was performed, his perturbed spirit would have been quieted, and he would have been very willing to have had it accredited to Handel or to anybody else. The advertisements were full of the most monstrous promises, artfully designed to gull a confiding public. A supernaturally large chorus of miraculously gifted singers, gathered from every quarter of the globe, accompanied by a prodigious orchestra of the most eminent living artists, assisted by an organ of titanic size whose tones should outpeal the thunder, were to sing all the greatest compositions of all the most famous composers, in a style that should appall the universe, while the clash of innumerable anvils, beaten by arms of herculean strength, and the roar of mammoth cannon, fired by the very lightning itself, should shake the round earth to its centre, and cause it to quiver in sympathy with a shuddering, awe-stricken, but entranced, audience, more brilliant than the stars of heaven and more numerous than the sands of the sea.

We have condensed the programme a great deal, but have hardly burlesqued it, and any one who read the earlier announcements will bear us witness that nothing could very much surpass their ridiculous and pretentious bombast. The managers of the affair certainly did bestir themselves to gather together all the people, good, bad and indifferent, from Parepa and Kellogg and the Handel and Haydn Society down to the man who was hired to play the steam calliope. Thanks be to Apollo, however, that dreadful engine was not used at last, for there was no steam. An army of conductors was enlisted in the affair—Bergmann, Zerrahn, Ross, Marozek, Gilmore, Pech, Sherwin, and others—enough to demoralize the best orchestra that ever played. As well have put the baton into the hands of Briareus at once.

Then the chorus was the queerest mixture of country choirs in for a frolic, singing societies from little villages that no one ever heard of before, members of city choirs who came once to satisfy curiosity, and, strangest of all, the conservative old Boston Handel and Haydn Society. How these latter ever came to co-operate is a mystery to every one, and most of all to themselves. It became, before the end, not only matter of mystery, but also of repentance. The innermost reason was, probably, that many of the members thought this was a capital chance to come on to New York, and stay for a week in the big city free of expense. Such is the nature of the thrifty New England minstrels. They came, but, if the reports that were written back to the Boston papers can be relied upon, they were not over-happy when they arrived. Those papers were quite a Book of Lamentations. It was a miserere chorus from these poor Trovatores, far more affecting than that of Verdi. Manrico and Leonora had their little hardships, but, at all events, they were never called upon to sleep ten in a room at the Park Avenue Hotel.

The society was further displeased because the "Elijah" night was altered from Wednesday to Thursday without consultation with the society—also, because they were only permitted to sing a portion of that oratorio, after all; also, because they were requested to sing in the "Anvil Chorus." But the hardest to endure of all their woes was the leadership of Dr. Pech in the "Creation." This seems to have met with the unanimous and unqualified condemnation of the society. They certainly were not in a pleasant frame of mind.

But they were by no means the only discontented ones. The chorus benches thinned out after the first day, until a great deal more pine-board than broad-cloth and muslin was visible. The orchestra, too, shrank down from its fine proportions of the first night to miserably small dimensions. The best players went away. Behind the stage and in the chorus and orchestra rooms all was disorganization. The programmes were made out without proper consultation with those who were to take part, and were very seldom adhered to. No special seats were assigned to the different societies. The chorus came and went as it felt inclined; it shifted like a musical quicksand. The rehearsals were slenderly attended, and general confusion prevailed. Of course, the Italian combined chorus selected this state of affairs as the proper moment for indulging in a strike for pay.

The audience was of the same shifting character with the chorus. The house was never really filled. Even at the most popular of the performances, which were those where there was most noise, long benches were vacant all about the edifice. The scale of prices had to be lowered. It was found that few were willing to pay the exorbitant sum at first demanded. As the expenses of the undertaking had been very great, the loss was corresponding. The affair dragged along in this way through the week. On some days the attendance was quite large; on others it dwindled to a handful. Reviewing the whole matter, we cannot consider it other than a failure. Those who took part in it certainly so regarded it, and the public never seem to have given its confidence to the undertaking. There was an immense deal of hard, zealous work done by those in charge of the festival. They paid their money with a most liberal hand to get the best aid in their power, and certainly there was some good music given. The Handel and Haydn Society sang the "Elijah" music most nobly. Parepa was splendidly good, and there were some other excellent features in the affair. The building was a peculiarly good one. It reached, we believe, the proper limit of size for the purpose. The Boston Coliseum was much too large; in this one, however, the acoustic properties were well-nigh perfect. But art has gained nothing by this festival, and no one has heard anything that he could not have heard to better advantage at a dozen concerts, during the winter, at Steinway Hall or the Academy of Music.

The drawbacks to success were principally these: The affair had no competent musical head; it was too hastily prepared; there was not sufficient money to carry it properly on—a vital want; it never had the confidence of chorus, orchestra, or public; the chorus was a helter-skelter, untrained, and crude body of singers, without proper rehearsal, organization, or discipline; the orchestra was of much the same character, and was badly balanced, being deficient in the reed instruments, and in all those elements for producing broad effects of which Berlioz has written so explicitly. Many of the singers sat facing each other and with profile towards the audience, instead of facing in the direction in which the sound was to go; their efforts neutralized each other, and half their force went for nothing. The organ was a feeble fraud; it filled up the space that should have been devoted to the chorus. There were no brains in the affair; it followed humbly along in the old Gilmore rut, without a single new or original idea of value. These certainly are sufficient reasons why the affair was not a success. It was a mushroom festival. It grew up in a day, and will be forgotten as quickly.

Let no one suppose, however, from the ill success that has attended this, that the future has nothing better in store. At some later day, not, we trust, too far distant, under some leader of genius, and with time sufficient for preparation, and money sufficient to provide the proper material, a musical festival may be given, with legitimate musical effects, such as Gilmore with his clap-trap anvils and blatant artillery practice has never dreamed of. When this occasion comes, the public will not be slow to lend to it a hearty support.

The New York Jubilee.

If we are late in our report of this bombastical occasion, there is little lost. Most letters, they say, answer themselves, if one will only wait a little. So of this "Beethoven" Festival, had we been, like the newspapers, in haste to write and talk about it, what waste of words it would have been upon a worthless subject! As it is, it has reported itself, confessedly a farce, a sham. The less said of it the better. For in truth it was in no sense one of Art's occasions. What has Art to do with guns and anvils? What has Music in the sense of Beethoven to do with Verdi Misereres, "triple Nancies and five-barrelled Plunkets," and the magnified tom-fooleries of Gilmore?

We did enough, we think, in copying the swelling programme of the week. That showed the nature and complexion of the whole affair, how utterly without artistic motive, how governed and pervaded by mere mercenary speculation, aided by the spread-eagle kind of passion for excitement and ambition for display before great multitudes. If the "Peace Jubilee" bore incidentally, as all large movements must, some good fruits, this was one of its logical, legitimate bad fruits. It was musical demoralization appealing to its own proper audience. By all the accounts, it seems, that the audiences, with one exception, were made up of the class who go for noise and Gilmore's anvils; and so the presence of that irrepressible sensation organizer is uniformly credited with whatever modicum of success the whole thing met with. And still it was a failure, even in a money point of view; which is so far creditable to New York. For it is absurd to hold a city accountable for whatever folly foolish people may contrive in it. Nor could we look upon the constant flings made at it in our Boston papers, treating it like a ridiculous rival of the Boston Jubilee, as better than childish. It was no question of New York or Boston. It was simply a question of Art or charlatany. Either city has its real music lovers who cherish Art for Art's sake; and either city has its restless disturbers of the calm, pure sphere of Art by loud, ambitious, egotistic enterprises on a "stunning" scale. The hope is that this kind of enterprise, eager to do bigger and bigger things, will erelong exhaust itself by the very magnitude of its gigantic operations; just as we hope that War will render itself impossible at last by the absolute destructiveness of the weapons it invents.

There was, as we predicted, one redeeming feature in this Festival; the singing of "Elijah" by our Handel and Haydn Society. That drew the one cultivated audience of the week; and had they been allowed to sing the whole of the Oratorio, it would have been more acceptable than guns and Misereres. We rejoice in the artistic triumph of our old Society, although we do not think that they consulted their own artistic dignity quite sensitively enough, in being willing to lend themselves to a Festival with such a programme, or at least such clear forshadowing of very heterogeneous and questionable elements. More and more we feel, in all such matters, the responsibility which rests on artists; the artistic morale cannot guard itself too jealously; in these days, both through the amiable desire of popularity and love of money, artistic self-respect is tempted to compromise itself by far too readily. We wish we might oftener see in musical journals and criticisms such plain, honest truth told, as we find here in an editorial of the New York Weekly Review.

The conclusion of this huge farce was worthy of its beginning. It started under false pretences, and it ended with the same colors. The whole thing was less a disgrace to New York than to those who participated in it. Schiller justly says: "Whenever art fails, it fails through the artist." If the artists of New York had not given aid to this undertaking this charge could not in this instance have been made. If they had first inquired about the character of the speculation before lending their help, it is likely they would have abstained; at least we hope so, although it seems that the chief consideration with most artists is to make as much money as possible. There may be some excuse for this with some poor fellows, who would rather give up their scruples as artists than starve. But there is no excuse for those renowned and wealthy representatives of musical art, who chose to lend their talent and experience to an undertaking which, on its very face, showed total lack of artistic principles. There is certainly no glory for Mme. Parepa-Rosa to shout "Star Spangled Banner" with heavy artillery accompaniment, or for Miss Kellogg to do something similar with the inspiring strains of "Viva l'America." Neither was America, or its banner, much honored by such doings.

But, after all, let us be thankful that this festival was a total failure. It would have been a still greater disgrace if it had succeeded. The New York public can be proud of the result. It is due to its good sense, its taste and discrimination, that the humbug exploded. It would not sanction the sacrilege, and consequently it stayed away. Only once made the New York musical people its appearance at the risk; this was on the evening of the performance of the first part of "Elijah," a just compliment to the well deserved repute of the distinguished Boston Handel and Haydn Society and its able conductor, Mr. Carl Zerrahn. On all other occasions it left the field to outsiders, who enjoy Mr. Gilmore and his nonsense. Verily, New York has not had as yet its Beethoven Festival, but we are happy to state that steps have already been taken to honor the great master next December in a truly dignified and artistic manner.

The Beethoven Centennial in Boston.

A project is on foot for a celebration in our city of the master's hundredth birthday in an appropriate artistic manner, without grandiloquent parade, and with such division of responsibility as to make all simple and comparatively easy of execution. The Committee of the Harvard Musical Association have already taken the initiative in so arranging the programmes of the next season of Symphony Concerts, that "the series as a whole may bear witness to this Centennial Year of Beethoven." Three of the to concerts, namely the first and the last, and, above all, the one that occurs on Thursday, Dec. 15,—two days before the Birthday—are to be especially consecrated to Beethoven's music. That of Dec. 15, will offer, besides the Seventh Symphony, the great Leonora Overture, &c., the "Choral Fantasia" (for piano, with orchestra and chorus), which contains the first hint of the Ninth or Choral Symphony; and the Committee have good reason to believe that the Handel and Haydn Society will close the festival of three days thus begun with a performance of that great work, coupled with whatever else may be appropriate. The intervening period of the three days will furnish opportunity to other musical societies to give their Beethoven Concerts, each in its turn, and in its own way, at suitable hours of day or evening, as may be arranged with mutual understanding. Thus the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, the Listemann Quartette, &c., would furnish several choice concerts of Beethoven's Chamber Music; some of our leading pianists might do likewise; possibly the Orpheus and other singing clubs may feel moved to contribute something in their way. And if, by any good chance, there should come a decent German Opera Company this way, we might have Fidelio also on one or more evenings of that week.—That the larger part, if not the whole, of this prospectus will be carried out, may be regarded a foregone conclusion.

Beethoven Festivals Abroad.

As we have before remarked, they make a Centennial Year of it in Germany, and most of the larger Beethoven Festivals will be held, for greater convenience, in the Autumn. Some have already taken place.

Beginning with his birthplace, Bonn, upon the Rhine, the celebration is announced for the 11th, 12th and 13th of September—Conductor, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller (and not Richard Wagner). The programme we have not seen.

Passing to Vienna, where the composer did his greatest work, we may cite the following manifesto of the Festival Committee:

"To celebrate Beethoven's hundredth birthday in a manner becoming the importance of the Master himself, and corresponding to the position occupied by Vienna in the world of music, the representatives of the various artistic and scientific bodies of that capital have combined to form a Festival Committee, who have drawn up a programme, which has been sanctioned in a proper quarter. The Beethoven Centenary Festival will be held on the four days, from the 23d to the 26th October, 1870. In the morning of the 23d, there will be a musical solemnity in a provisional "Monumental Square" preceded by a procession to that spot. In the evening there will be a festival performance of Fidelio in the Imperial Opera-house. On the 24th, a performance of the Missa Solenne, in the large Hall of the Society of the Friends of Music. On the 25th, a grand banquet in the same locality. On the 26th, at noon, a grand concert, consisting of chamber music, vocal compositions, and the Ninth Symphony, also in the same locality. In the evening, a performance of Egmont, by the artists of the Imperial Burg Theatre, and the orchestra of the Imperial Opera-house. The leading musicians of Germany will be invited to attend the concerts, and the most highly esteemed masters have offered to act as Festival Conductors. To give the Festival a grand representative character by large numbers of the great composer's admirers participating in the proceedings, the Festival Committee have determined on establishing a special Festival Association, the members of which, assisted by the undersigned Festival Committee, shall arrange all the proceedings. The members of the Association, in addition to receiving the Festival Badge and the Festival Medal, will be entitled to take part in the grand procession, or to a seat in the stand erected in the "monument square." They will, also, enjoy the right of securing places for the concerts and performances before any one else, according to the date of their admission into the Association, and the space available.

The fee for membership is ten florins; receipts will be given for any additional contributions. The net proceeds of the Festival are to be devoted to forming a Beethoven Fund,—for assisting musicians in necessitous circumstances—and a Beethoven Monument Fund. The Festival Committee, therefore, invite all admirers of Beethoven to belong to the Association. Promises of contributions, and payments, will be received at the offices of the Society of the Friends of Music, Vienna."

In Weimar, head quarters of the "Future," the Tonkünstler-Versammlung (or Congress of Musical Artists) have already had their Beethoven Celebration, mingled with the bringing out of their own new works. On the 26th of May there was a lecture or oration upon "Beethoven" by Professor H. Porges; after which Beethoven's Missa Solemnis was performed in the Stadtkirche. May 27, a Chamber Concert of modern works in the Refreshment Hall (J. Raff: piano quintet in A minor; Jensen: "Dolorosa;" Goldmark: String Quintet in B flat, Songs; Kiel: Piano Variations, op. 17; Svendsen; Octet for strings). On the same day, an Orchestral Concert of modern works in the Grand Ducal Court theatre (G. Weber: "Zur Iliade;" F. Dräseke: "Lacrymosa;" R. Schumann; Concerto for Violoncello; H. Schultz Beuthen: Psalm 42-3; L. Damrosch: Fest Overture; F. Liszt: Piano Concerto in E flat; St. Sjäns: "Marriage of Prometheus").—May 28, Discourse by Prof. L. Nohl, of Munich. Chamber Concert of works by Beethoven only (Quartet for strings, in F, op. 135; Liederkreis: "An die ferne Geliebte," op. 98; Piano Sonata, op. 106; Songs: "An die Geliebte" and "Herz, mein Herz;" C-sharp minor Quartet, Op. 131).—May 29, Orchestral Concert, in the Court Theatre, dedicated to the memory of Beethoven, consisting of: a "Beethoven Overture" by E. Lassen; a "Prologue" by Bodenstedt; a "Beethoven Cantata" by the Abbate Liszt; and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, conducted by Liszt.

So much for Beethoven; then was to come Wagner's turn. The London Musical World informs us:

The "model" Wagner-performances commence, on the 19th, at the Grand-Ducal Theatre, Weimar. The following is the order in which the operas will be given: On the 18th inst., Der Fliegende Holländer; on the 22nd, Tannhäuser; on the 26th Lohengrin; and on the 27th Die Meistersinger. Herr Niemann will sing the music of Tannhäuser and of Lohengrin; Herr Nachbar, that of Walther von Stolzing; and Dr. Gunz, that of Eric. Mme. Mallinger will be the representative of Elisabeth, Elsa, and Eva; Mlle. Brandt, of the Royal Operahouse, Berlin, will figure as Ortrud; while Mlle. Reiss, a local favorite, will undertake the part of Senta.

All the bass parts: Daland, Landgraf, King Henry, and Pognor, will be sustained by Herr Scaria, of the Royal Opera, Dresden; and all the baritone parts, the Flying Dutchman, Wolfram, Telramund, and Hans Sach, by Herr von Milde. Tristan und Isolde was to have been given, but could not, because some of the artists representing the principal parts are engaged in the Walküre, at Munich. Herr Wagner, too, was to have been present, but would not. By the way, a rage for "model" performances appears to have attacked Baron von Loën, the Intendant of the Grand Ducal Theatre. He intends giving, in 1871, seven "model" performances of operas by Mozart.

In Königsberg, the hundredth anniversary was celebrated on the 7th, 8th and 9th of June. The great features were to be the performance, on an imposing scale, of the Missa solemnis and the Ninth Symphony.

In Berlin and in Brussels the celebration will take place in December.

Italy, too, claims a share in the honors paid to Beethoven. At Florence, the Società del Quartetto gave a concert, May 15, with the following programme: Festival Address by F. D'Arcais; String Quintet (in C) by Beethoven, with Bianchi, from Turin, as first violin; Kreutzer" Sonata (Signorina Septa and Signor Brogialdi); several numbers from Fidelio; and the Septet. The concert was very successful.

What plans are shaping themselves in Leipzig, Dresden, London, Paris, and other musical cities we have yet to learn.

In London, however, all the concert givers, more or less, this season, appear to give marked prominence to Beethoven. Mr. Barnby, as we have seen, has brought out both the Choral Symphony and the great Mass in D. And Mr. Charles Halle's "Piano-forte Recitals" keeps the Centennial in mind. The Musical World says:

These interesting performances are now half completed—the fourth having taken place on Friday week. The programmes are this year devoted to the solo sonatas of Beethoven; the two very easy works (Op. 49) being replaced by the andante in F, and the thirty-two variations in C minor. Sixteen of the solo sonatas have now been given, those on Friday week were the two "quasi Fantasia," Op. 27 (including the "Moonlight"); Op. 28, known as the "Pastoral;" and Op. 29 (or 31) in G. These works have so frequently been played by Mr. Hallé in public that it would be almost impertinent now to dwell on the many excellences of his performance. The room was well filled, chiefly by ladies; who, by close attention to the music and the interpreter, receive a valuable lesson. A special feature at this season's recitals is the admirable singing of Herr Stockhausen, who was announced for all, but was absent from the first in consequence of illness. On the second, third, and fourth occasions Herr Stockhausen appeared, and sang at each some number of Schubert's Die Schöne Müllerin. With what fine qualities of voice, style, and expression Herr Stockhausen sings these beautiful lieder we have before had occasion to remark.

LETTERS ON MUSIC. The pleasant and discriminative article about the German Lied composers, which we copy on another page, is from that very readable and lively little book, just published by Oliver Ditson & Co. (in the same elegant style with the series begun by Leypoldt of New York): "Letters on Music, to a Lady." By LOUIS EHLERT. And, very properly, and very happily, it is translated by a lady, Mrs. FANNY RAYMOND RITTER, well known and welcome to our readers.

Ehlert writes with enthusiasm, and in a spirit of lively, catholic appreciation, of Beethoven and his last Symphony; of Mendelssohn; of Schumann's "Manfred" music; of Haydn, Mozart, &c., as Contrapuntists; of Schubert; of Chopin's Mazourkas; compares Rossini and Meyerbeer; criticizes Wagner and Berlioz with moderation and candor; and discusses the mission of Artists to-day. He has a ready faculty of illustration, and serves up not a little of instruction in the form of comparatively light reading. We shall have more to say of the little book, which we commend to all our readers.

MUSIC AT VASSAR COLLEGE. The Weekly Review reports of the good work done for musical education by Mr. F. L. RITTER, as follows:

The exercises attendant on the closing of the season at the College (the only ladies' college as yet in existence), were again signalized by great success in the musical department. We give the programme of the annual grand concert, which is of rare excellence throughout:

Part First.

Symphony, B flat (first movement).... Haydn.
Arranged for four piano-fortes.
Campanella..... Tanbert.
Duet, "Sabbath Morn,"..... Mendelssohn.
Concerto in E flat (for two piano-fortes). Mozart.
"La Poste" Transcription..... Heller.
Aria, "Let the bright Seraphim"..... Handel.
Scherzo, B flat minor..... Chopin.
Rondo in E flat (for two pianofortes). Hummel.

Part Second.

Chorus, from "Paradise and the Peri"..... Schumann.
Capriccio, Opus 22..... Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Si t'amo, O Cara," from "Scævola"..... Haudel (Franz).

Rhapsodie Hongroise..... Liszt.
Bolero, Opus 19..... Chopin.
Aria, "With verdure clad"..... Haydn.
Polonaise in E flat, Opus 22..... Chopin.
Overture "Euryanthe"..... Weber.

On Class Day an orchestra selected from the New York Philharmonic Society enlivened the literary proceedings, and on Commencement Day some of the finest compositions of the great masters were performed in a truly artistic manner by the lady students. We are told that the success of the musical department of Vassar College has been so thorough, so dependable, and continually increasing, both artistically and pecuniarily, since it was placed in the hands of Mr. Ritter, that it is now the intention of the trustees to erect a fine art building, to contain a concert hall, organ, etc., and so to increase the advantages, already very great, of musical students there, that they may enjoy equal privileges with those of the pupils of European musical conservatories. We congratulate Mr. Ritter on his well-deserved success and influence.

NEW YORK. The Independent, this week, says:

The air is full of the dust and flying fragments of rumor and wrath which rose up when the Great Beethoven Centennial Jubilee fell to pieces. Artists and agents are clamorous for pay, and there are threats of lawsuits and all manner of other inharmonious proceedings. The Boston critics have, of course, been severe in their comments; but upon the whole, not unjust, and there was comparatively little of the savage hilarity in their narrative of the New York disaster which we might have expected from those who resented so bitterly the criticisms of New York writers last year. In fact, it was evident even to strangers that this was an affair with which New York had refused to have anything to do. The severity with which our citizens let it alone was remarkable. Meanwhile, we are glad to know that the centenary of Beethoven will be duly celebrated here in the winter—not with anvils and cannon, but with Beethoven's music. The Philharmonic Society is said to contemplate giving some special performances (it will be a shame if it does not); and the Beethoven Männerchor, a prosperous but hitherto not very prominent society, purposes producing "Fidelio," "The Mount of Olives," and the Ninth Symphony, all at the Academy of Music. A richer and more appropriate banquet for such a festival could hardly be devised. But what a grand idea it would be to devote a week to the celebration and produce all the nine symphonies.

No music is to be heard now except in the parks and in the summer gardens, where Bacchus and Apollo divide the nights between them. As usual, Theodore Thomas retains the lead in entertainments of this nature, and his band plays every night at the Central Park Garden to very large audiences, busy with their beer and their ice-cream. Sensible man, he keep out of the Jubilee! The new experiment of distributing the free out-of-door concerts among all the parks in the city, instead of confining them to the Central Park, proves a great boon to the people of New York. In Brooklyn, the Prospect Park concerts are cordially appreciated.

CHICAGO, it would seem, is favored in the possession of a good teacher of singing, of whom the Musical Independent says:

Mrs. MAGNUSON-JEWETT (Room No. 1, Crosby's Opera House) has the good fortune to have in her large class several voices which give great promise for the future, if the happy owners do not become seized with the peculiarly American idea that industry is detrimental to genius. Mme. Jewett herself retains too lively a remembrance of her long and laborious studies, under the best singing masters of Italy, to admit of her viewing such notions with the least degree of allowance. It is rare, indeed, to find a vocal teacher who, amid the labors of a large class, can preserve that fresh enthusiasm, without which no artistic cultivation in song is possible; and it is precisely this quality united to sound judgment, which has earned for Mrs. Jewett her present well-deserved pre-eminence.

Mrs. C. A. BARRY, of this city, now in Florence, has been singing with favor in the Philharmonic Concerts there. She sang the Contralto solos in Rossini's Messa Solenne.

"Innigkeit" in Music.—Can Genius grow Antiquated?

A friend, whose musical sympathies are strongly Italian, and with Verdi, sends us the following from one (not unknown to our readers), whose admiration for the German reaches all the way from Bach to Wagner.

LONDON, MAY 26, 1870.

"To begin with business at once, I will pitch right into our discussion. As to Verdi, I should never have thought of applying the term 'Innigkeit' to any of his music I have yet heard. I have never been able to see much heart in his music. The only passage of his that ever affected me at all from its depth of sentiment, is the place in Rigoletto where Rigoletto picks up the handkerchief on the duke's table. Here there is a true Innigkeit, and a simplicity of feeling that are most touching. The things I think Verdi is really great in, are his Andante concerted pieces, such as 'O Sommo Carlo' in Evrami, and the great quintet in Nabucco. 'Strike la vampa' in the Troatore falls just short of being great. As I believe I have said before, 'La donna e mobile' seems to me the most perfect thing he ever wrote, and that, strange to say, is not in the grandioso style.

"Most anti-Verdites, I think, judge him from his worst, rather than from his best numbers. And, looking at him from this point of view, I must confess to thinking that he has given to the world some of the most execrable things ever put upon paper. I don't think any one ever exceeded the villenness of 'Tutto sprezzo chi d'Ernani,' or the Soprano air in the Troatore. But putting these horrors out of the discussion, I don't see anything genial in the man's writings. He seems to be only at home in the maestoso, or the slanciando con passione. I do not know the Franz song you speak of; but since you refer to Franz, I will give you two examples, taken from his songs, of what I call real Innigkeit. One is Weil auf'mir, du dunkles Auge; and the other is Auf dem Trich, dem regungslosen, weilt des Mondes holder Glanz. I give these merely as examples of what is to me really innig and heartfelt; but that does not prevent my being able to believe that Verdi or even Donizetti may speak as sympathetically to an Italian as Franz or Schumann do to me. Surely ten or twenty degrees of latitude must make some difference in the ways of expressing feeling.

"Concerning what you call antiquated music, our difference in opinion may possibly arise in a different understanding of terms. I understand 'antiquated' to mean something more than merely 'old fashioned.' It conveys to my mind the idea of something either obsolete or that has well nigh seen its day. I don't attempt to deny that the forms of musical expression which Bach and Handel used, are old-fashioned. I believe that Haydn and Mozart went far beyond Bach and Handel in their musical forms, and that Beethoven made as great an advance upon Mozart as he did upon Bach. I also think that Wagner has in certain ways gone far beyond Beethoven. It is in the nature of things that most things in this world should grow better with succeeding generations. Mozart had Bach's forms ready made for him. Bach had to make them for himself. It would have been a pity if a man of Mozart's genius, after having been educated up to Bach's level, should not have been able to discover anything new for himself in an infinite field of discovery. A man of genius uses his great predecessors' thoughts as tools to work with, not as a mere lesson to be recited over again. But I think that in art there is a point beyond which no man can learn of another. Mozart could learn all of Bach's forms, and improve upon them. But there is an intangible something in a man of great genius, which is thoroughly his own, and that no man can copy from him. The divine afflatus cannot be handed down from master to pupil. Great genius is so rare that we can afford to lose nothing that it has ever done in art. And it is in the inspiration, the jeu sacré that I think Bach and Handel are the equals of any that have lived after them. I do not think one can find the emotions of sorrow and despair on the one hand, and firm faith on the other, more vividly and grandly, or more dramatically expressed than in the opening chorus of the St. Matthew Passion.

"Looked at superficially, that chorus is a wonderfully fine piece of contrapuntal writing, and we now-a-days, don't think of using strict counterpoint as a means of dramatic expression. But Bach knew of no other than contrapuntal music, and if he was to express his feelings by music at all it must be contrapuntal music. But the feeling, the inspiration was strong within him, and he made the counterpoint express it. I don't think that in any of Bach's finer compositions, it is the counterpoint that strikes one first. That was only the means of expression, not the end. It was the musical language of his time, just as Chaucer's English was the language of his time.

"But are we to lose the inspirations and thoughts of one of the greatest geniuses in all the history of music, because his forms of expression have now become old-fashioned? I admit that in my analogies drawn from Sculpture and Architecture I went too far, and will, as you suggest, take the Aegina marbles instead of Phidias and Praxiteles as a parallel. The marbles of Aegina are works that have come down to us from a time when sculpture was just past its infancy, and their imperfections and above all their old-fashionedness strike us at once. But I think that in spite of all this, there is a something in them that is none the less real because it is indefinable, and that places them higher than the works of Thorwaldsen, Gibson, or any of the modern sculptors, with perhaps the exception of Canova. I do not urge this as going to prove that that which is old is necessarily greater or better than that which is new, but to show that real genius of a high order outlives the fashions of its day, and loses nothing by age. Because the works of genius in by-gone days are now only to be appreciated by the more highly educated, and give little or no enjoyment to the uneducated, we have no right to call them 'works of the head and not of the heart.'

THE SO-CALLED BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL. That will be a brilliant page in the history of the music of this country, which will tell our children that we honored the great Beethoven by firing cannons, ringing bells, beating anvils, in short, making as much noise as possible. What a fine understanding of the duties such a festival involves; what a brilliant conception of the benefits the great master has left us. What an immense stride towards civilization! It only remains for us to dance around the dead body of the master, burn it, and the recall of the great civilization of old will be complete. He has been sitting long enough on his throne like the Hindoo kings; it is time that we should slaughter him. Well, if nothing else, this at least has been achieved this week. The honor which he ought to have received has become a dishonor. For it is a dishonor to couple his name with such decorations of the art, which have been committed on this occasion. It is a dishonor to place a Beethoven on the side of Flotow, Juellen, and the like. We have nothing against their music in a proper place, but at a Beethoven festival it is out of place. Only the highest, the best and purest his art has produced, should be heard on such an occasion, and if this had been done but for one day the memory of this festival would have been less a burning shame to all who assisted, either by participating in the performances or by listening to them.

Why could the first day not have been devoted exclusively to the memory of the great master? There were splendid materials on hand to perform, for instance, his ninth symphony. Mme. Parepa-Rosa would have been more in her sphere to sing the soprano part of the quartet, than to join in the chorus of the "Star Spangled Banner" with obligato cannon firing. Instead of such a celebration, his symphony, in C minor, conducted by Mr. Carl Bergmann, and a lot of miscellaneous music were performed, in which the Stradella overture shone to such an extent as to elicit an encore from the enthusiastic and highly discriminative audience. This was, of course, meant as a compliment to the conductor, Mr. Gilmore, for the thing itself can be heard just as well in every beer garden, where it properly belongs.

On the second day, in the afternoon, some curious abridgments from various operas, with a host of distinguished artists, enlivened the not very large audience. Miss Kellogg distinguished herself by an exquisite and for once animated rendering of the Polacca from "Linda," and Signor Lefrano created an outburst of enthusiasm by his magnificent singing in the well known trio from "Tall." It was as good and inspiring as we have heard of any tenor. In the evening "The Creation," faithfully mutilated, was sung under the direction of Dr. James Peck. Mme. Parepa-Rosa as usual evinced her extraordinary powers of voice and method.

On Wednesday the anvils and the cannons did their duty, morning and night, to the intense satisfaction of the largest audiences yet assembled at the Rink. On Thursday afternoon the C minor symphony was repeated, Mr. Carl Bergmann conducting with that fine musical understanding for which he is justly famous. Unfortunately, the best conducting will not avail, if the orchestra is a poor one, and this was decidedly the case on this occasion, only a few of our best musicians forming part of it. The great feature of this concert was the singing of Mme. Anna Bishop, who again proved the truth of the old adage, "Life is short, but art is long." In the evening the first part of "Elijah" was given, with the Boston Handel Society, and Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor. The success of this performance was complete.—N. Y. Weekly Review.

LASELL SEMINARY, AUBURNDALE.—The young ladies of this Institution gave a Soirée Musicale, June 14,—under the direction of their teacher, Prof. G. D. Wilson—for the benefit of the Boston North End Mission, which was a success, artistically and financially.

The hall of the Seminary was crowded and the entire programme, including several extremely difficult pieces which are seldom attempted before an audience by other than professional artists, was well performed, showing thorough and exact teaching, and evincing taste and great progress in the pupils.

The programme was as follows:

Overture, "The Fair Melusina" (4 Pianos).—Mendelssohn.
Duet, "Hunter's Song".....Kuckert.
Piano Solo: "La Cascade".....Paner.
Capriccio Brillante, Op. 22.....Mendelssohn.
Song: "Rathleen Arcon".....Abt.
Fantasia, "Moses in Egypt".....Thalberg.
Concert-stück, Op. 79.....Weber.
Song, "Sing, Smile, Slumber".....Gounod.
Piano Solo, "Last Hope".....Gottschalk.
Solo and Chorus, "La Carita".....Rossini.
Overture, "La Muette de Portici".....Auber.

During the graduating exercises on Wednesday morning, the musical selections included a fine performance of Hummel's Concerto in A Minor, Op. 85.—BOSTON TRAVELLER, June 15.

The Grave of Charles Dickens.

He sleeps as he should sleep—among the great

In the old Abbey: sleeps amid the few
Of England's famous thousands whose high state
Is to lie with her monarchs—monarchs too.

Monarchs, who men's minds 'neath their sway could bring

By might of wit and humor, wisdom, lore,
Music of spoken line or sounded string,
Or Art that lives when artists are no more.

His grave is in this heart of England's heart,
This shrine within her shrine: and all around
Is no name but in Letters or in Art
Sounds as the names of the immortal sound.

Of some, the ashes lie beside his dust,
Of some, but marble forms and names are here:
But grave or cenotaph—remains or bust—
They will find place for thee, their latest peer.

Make room, oh tuneful Handel, at thy feet;
Make room, oh witty Sheridan, at thy head;
Shift, Johnson, till thou leave him grave-space meet;
Garrick, whose art he loved, press to him dead.

Macaulay, many-sided mind, receive
By thine, the frame that housed a mind as keen
To take an impress, or an impress leave,
From things, or on things, read or heard, or seen.

Welcome, oh Addison, with calm, wise face,
His coming, who has peopled English air
With types of humor, tenderness, and grace,
Than which thine own are less rich and more rare.

Thou, too, his brother of our time, last lost,
Thackeray, bend thy brow with kindly cheer
On him, thy comrade, wave-worn, tempest-tost,
Who, from life's voyage, comes to harbor here.

All the more welcome that he seeks his rest
Without the pomps that follow great ones' ends—
No mourners save the natural ones that prest
About the father's coffin or the friend's.

No sable train with plume, and plate, and pall;
No long parade of undertaker's woe;
Scarfed mutes, and feathered hearse, and coursers tall—
All that bemocks the grave with hollow show.

Humbly they brought him in the summer morn,
Humbly and hopefully they laid him down.
And on the plate that tells when dead, when born,
His children's love, like England's, lays a crown.*

The Poet's Corner.

DICKENS'S GRAVE IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—ITS SURROUNDINGS.

The London Illustrated News has the following:

The venerable Abbey Church of St. Peter, at Westminster, has lately received the mortal body of another English worthy. There is a place here allotted by traditional custom to the burial, or, at least, to the obituary record, of men whose literary genius has adorned this nation. The extremity of the south transept has for ages past been called the "Poets' Corner." Here is the tomb of Geoffrey Chaucer, "the Father of English Poetry," who was also a man of official business, Clerk of the Works in the precincts of the King's palace at Westminster, including the Abbey. He died in October, 1400, at his house, close by, which stood on the site of Henry VII.'s chapel. The first English printer, Caxton, who set up his types, and worked his press in a chapel of the Abbey, caused a simple tablet, with a couplet of Latin verse written by a scholar of Milan, to be placed above his friend Chaucer's grave. A century and a half later, in 1556, Mr. Nicholas Brigham, "in the name of the Muses," erected the well-known monument of grey marble, with a full-length statue of Chaucer, copying the head, the costume, and the attitude from Occleve's contemporary portrait. That was the beginning of Poets' Corner. Now, only last week by order of Dean Stanley, and through the diligence of Chaucer's successor in office, Mr. Christopher Foster, Clerk of the Works in the Abbey, the grave of Charles Dickens was made here in the middle of the floor, within a few steps of old Chaucer's.

The elaborate monument of the Duke of Argyll in George II.'s time—Jeanie Deans's good Duke, in "The Heart of Midlothian"—rises opposite, with its four fine statues, representing the virtues and talents of that patriotic Scottish nobleman. The monuments of Goldsmith and Gay, with their medallion portraits, and with the inscriptions composed in the former instance by Dr. Johnson, and in the latter case by Pope, are to the left. To the right is the graceful statue of Addison, upon a cylindrical pedestal of white marble; but his actual place of interment is in another part of the Abbey. The monument of Handel, who lies buried under the pavement next Dickens, is placed high on the wall, above that of the Ladies Lechmere; his figure, in an attitude of inspiration, stands in front of an organ, holding an open scroll of music. The bust of Thackeray is near Addison's statue. The best place for a bust of Dickens is on the other side of the arch, or near the Lechmere monument, and between that and the monument of the Atkins family, which fills the next arch. It would be a suitable companion to the bust of Thackeray. The grave of Dickens is adjacent to those of Handel, Sheridan, and Cumberland the dramatist, whose names occupy, with those of Henderson, the actor, David Garrick, Samuel Johnson, and General Sir A. Campbell, the eight flat tombstones in front of the door leading to St. Faith's Chapel. These tombstones are ranged in four pairs. The graves of Dickens and Cumberland form one pair; and they lie immediately opposite the well-known cenotaph of Shakespeare, which stands against the wall, with the monuments of Nicholas Rowe, James Thomson, Matthew Prior, Southey, and Thomas Campbell; these confronting those of Addison, Mackenzie, and Handel, and the bust of Thackeray.

The monuments of Chaucer, Spenser, Ben Jonson, Abraham Cowley, Dryden, Barton Booth, the tragedian, and Thomas Gray, are placed somewhat apart, in the corner by the western door through which the Abbey is entered from Old Palace-yard. This is, no doubt, the ancient and original "Poets' Corner;" but that name has latterly been extended, as we now see, to the whole breadth of the south transept. Among the other persons interred in this part of the Abbey are Dr. Barrow and Dr. South, the eminent divines; Dr. Busby, master of Westminster School; Queen Anne Neville, wife of Richard III.; Chiffinch, puge to Charles II.; Macpherson, translator or inventor of Ossian; Lady Steele, wife of Sir Richard; several Prebendaries, and the late Dean Ireland.

Chopin's Mazourkas.

(FROM EHRLER'S Letters on Music.)

Do you know Chopin's sorrowful mazourkas,—those pathetic dances in which the deepest, the most heart-felt sorrow has donned red buskins, to weep itself to death amid a bacchanal tumult? I have one of these in my mind now: anything sadder you can scarcely imagine:—

"Ye still must dance, alas, poor feet so weary!
In gay shoes drest;
Though 'twere for ye a fate less sad and dreary
'Neath earth to rest."

* "Letters on Music to a Lady." By LOUIS EHRLER. Translated by FANNY RAYMOND RITTER. (Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.)

Poor Chopin! Was he afflicted by the sorrows of his people, or by a secret woe, a fatality of love?

Over his cradle the graces whispered their sweetest spells,—a favor not lightly granted to other mortals; and the gods bestowed their most precious gift upon him,—the nobility of genius. He had what the higher man desires in order to be happy,—the laurel of fame, the joy of love, the protection of friendship, the fruit of toil; all these, accompanied by youth and an irresistible personality. He only wanted a sailor's nervous system. Poor Chopin! his soul was strung with Æolian harp-strings, on which the lightest breath of wind played wondrous unknown melodies. These seraphic legends met our ear as if they rose from out a holy silence; and we listened as though the elementary voice of Nature pronounced an elementary prophecy. A poet of such indescribable refinement of language, with such a sense for color, and with such a lofty aristocracy of thought, must necessarily possess a peculiar nervous system; and thus he consumed a vitality that more niggardly natures would have spread over two jubilees, before he had reached the height of his summer. Envious! For, if the populace reckons by duration, we have another measure. Could I, for one month of rapture, become such a poet as Beethoven, I should be ashamed, had I nothing better to offer for it than the beggary of my whole life. Depth, inwardness, is everything; and the greatest joy on earth is the power of creating an immortal work.

But from failure to accomplish any thing proceeds all our unamiability: broken down and weary, we sit like watchers beside the bed of our sick hope,—the crack-brained nurse who brought us up on poisoned love-philters.

Chopin, unfortunately, became so popular that there is not a drawing-room in which he is not falsified or misunderstood. The frivolous desire to play his spirituelle compositions in a capricious manner, to intrude one's own personal feelings upon the poet's peculiar world, has led to a style of playing Chopin's works which is disagreeable both to the taste and to the mind; the character of which is best described as being a mixture of buffoonery and looseness. It gives us coquetry instead of gracefulness, wantonness in the place of daring; while it makes feeling sentimental, and geniality eccentric. Only he who has known tears and blushes, who feels his heart beating even in his finger-tips, may venture to play Chopin. Some of our greatest virtuosos have been shipwrecked in the attempt: you may, therefore, imagine what amateurs make of his works. Our musical circles, which exist for the profit of vanity and tedium,—insupportable preserves of the discomfort which arises from an awkward herding together of mankind, sick-rooms of enjoyment, filled with the corrupt smell of a thousand ideas strangled in birth,—are the natural theatres for those charades and anagrams which our pianoforte-players make on the name of Chopin. I swear to you by Hermann and Dorothea, on my metrical conscience, that I would rather be present at an improvisation in hexameters, than at one of these perverse interpretations of a poet whose magical glow should frighten away all fingers that are afraid of fire. Only imagine the fate of a composition in which the prescribed measure is not placed like a child's rod above the mirror; fancy the entanglement of hurry and delay where metronomic correctness in the divisions of time is done away with, and where, not the movements of the pendulum, but the unbarred motion of the human heart, should cause the robe of the poem to rise and fall!

Some secret charm must exist in these compositions, and uncloset itself even to the unpoetic world of "lofty ignoramus," as Mme. Viardot once entitled those circles where the classics are condemned to eternal banishment, where Beyer and Rosellen are played with indescribable comprehension, and where every thing is enjoyed as ambrosia, provided that it is not salted or peppered. It must be that charm of real distinction by means of which real nobility betrays its descent, and which surrounds all outward forms of life with beauty. As Chopin is by nature an aristocrat, those saloons which do not always condescend to receive even what is vulgarly called the best society have been opened to him. But you would hardly believe in what adventurous circumstances I have been obliged to encounter this dear friend. One shudders at such popularity. Rather let us not be played, let us not please. To please! whom? with what? I once heard the B-minor Scherzo played among such a company of common buffoons (that is, on a programme of trivial show-pieces), that it seemed to me like a rose buried in a bunch of thistles. For will you not suppose that the same taste which has at least an instinctive sense of the poetry of a Chopin work also perceives the vulgarity of a bad virtuoso piece? This general predilection for Chopin is only the consequence of instinct, and not that of judgment: the noblest things that his genius has created are only possessed by a small number. I would wager my faith, my love, and my hope, that a mazourka like the one I allude to is understood by very few. This F is too fatalistic; this sorrowful, questioning close is too gloomy:—

"Ye still must shine beneath the torches' glory, Bad eyes that weep!
 Would ye could hide in shade your woeful story,
 And close, and sleep."

Chopin has been called morbid, sickly. Ah! who among us can boast of mental health? He was not more sickly than many of our greatest poets,—than Byron, than Schumann; though I am willing to allow that Kalkbrenner was more healthy. But who cares for Mr. Kalkbrenner's robust muse, with its strong-handed passages and red-cheeked melodies, now? When I was a boy, I was once obliged to play one of those pieces (so suitable to taverns) which then flooded every German and French piano-forte. In all simplicity I asked my master whether Mr. Kalkbrenner was not a sailor; for which question I received a severe reprimand. Since then I have never been able to hear a piece by this excellent man without thinking of striped trousers.

Chopin was of so poetic a nature, that, in his hands, the study itself became a poem. Let his two greatest studies, that in C sharp and that in A minor,—though apparently written with a technical aim,—let them be played with complete freedom, and any one will confess that our piano-forte literature never possessed aught more impassioned, more nobly stirring. And what wonderful originality they display? Not a measure that is not playable, and musically, charmingly new: indeed, Chopin must be called the inventor of an entirely new piano-forte life. How uninteresting is the style of any previous master (excepting Beethoven) compared with his! what a litany of gone-by, dead-alive forms! what a feelingless, prosaic jingle! If any one should, without a grimace, assure me seriously that he can play piano-forte pieces by Clementi, Dussek, Hummel, and Ries, with real enjoyment even now, I will esteem him as an excellent man,—yes, a very honest one; but I will not drink wine with him.

Do you know any nightingale that can warble a dreamy clear-obscure like the melodies of Chopin's nocturnes? I will not grieve Ilafis; but our German bulbuls appear song-sick in comparison. Has filigree work, or the Moorish arabesque, spun anything more supersensuously fine than those fantastic embellishments which remind one of silvery lace woven by elves in the moonlight? And now play one of his great songs of love, and behold the celestial passion in those summer-warm, storm-intoxicated eyes!

"For the sun is but a sparkle
 That hath heavenward floated, mounted,

Of the flame immense, impassioned,
 That within my bosom burneth."

His heart was soon consumed by the "immense flame;" for he died the fiery death of the poet. But we who have beheld the flame mount heavenwards, who have been intoxicated by the nectar which he so freely bestowed, must laugh pityingly at the kitchen fire over which citizen Dussek and worthy Hummel cook their spare Olympic meal. And even noble John Field's nectar tastes to us but as excellent sugar and water. Heaven preserve us from historical injustice! These were worthy, honest men, but doubtful poets. Supported by the consciousness of having honorably gone through their courses, they played the piano-forte according to the pious rules of their forefathers, and composed neat, correct pieces with the philister-like comfort of those whose conscience is untroubled by fancy. Innocent of the revolutionary paths of Beethoven, they leaned on the burgher-staff of custom and convenience, protected by the police, applauded by the hands of the titled, the rich, and the pensioned, carrying with them the certainty of immortality, as though they were sure of the future, for all time, through benevolent legacies. I would not venture to write a bitter word of such men during their lives. But posterity is able to be impartial, and restores the too great admiration of contemporaries to the proper degree.

Yet, though it must fulfil this contemptible office, it will also have the power to raise overturned columns, and to place crosses over sunken graves.

Chopin sleeps under the palm: upon his grave-mound the tenderest roses bloom. On a May night, when the air was full of moonlight and the scent of flowers, I sat there, dreaming, and listening to the whispers of the leaves. The softened tones of the funeral march which he wrote sounded in my ears: the dark basses, folded in mourning crapes, passed, their hesitating step often checked by tears. I know not how long I sat thus in the lovely spring night, with the dead at my feet. I had scarcely observed two forms, kneeling under the shade of the cypresses, as though they were holding a divine service of love in this spot. One was tall, with a slender and almost transparent figure: she looked like the dream of a lovely, summer night, and had thrown a sparkling net of filigree chains over her hair. The other was more fully formed, with swelling bosom and rounded arms; on her face, the story of some strange grief was written in magical motives. A ray of moonlight fell at her feet: I shuddered, for I saw that she wore red buskins.

Fine Old Tunes.

It is not always a bad thing to have what Mr. Samuel Weller would call "limited vision." In the case of Mr. Weller himself it prevented his seeing, through a flight of stairs and several closed doors, what might have been to the detriment of our dear old friend, Pickwick. In the case of some others it concentrates attention upon a small space, and extracts therefrom lessons otherwise in danger of being overlooked. Le Maître's Voyage autour de ma Chambre is a noteworthy illustration of what we mean. From the ordinary fittings of the room to which he was confined the French philosopher drew matter for speculation, the interest of which will never be exhausted. But limited vision, as a rule, is not always useful. Upon the average man its effect is to make him exaggerate the merits and importance of what he can see, and to depreciate all that lies beyond, creating out of his visible surroundings a little world apart, wherein very small things are relatively very great. Only thus do we account for a phenomenon connected with Church musicians, who are always talking of "Brown in A," "Jones in B," and "Robinson in C"—as other men talk of the Nozze di Figaro, Fuilelo, and Medea.

We suppose that organists and people who frequent "quires, and places where they sing," are more or less affected by the narrowing influence of sacerdotalism. If not exactly a "sacerdotal caste," they are sufficiently like the article to make the church their world. Looking upon Church music as a thing apart, they come eventually to regard it as unaffected by considerations which touch music secular, and as only to be judged by the low standard of its own low average merit. On no other grounds are we able to explain the reverence felt for what are sometimes called "fine old tunes," and for the importance attached to works which, out of the church, would promptly make their way to the huckster's, as waste paper. Let us add that we do not consider this to involve any censure upon Church musicians. Between their music and secular music there must exist, in any case, a broad line of demarcation; and, naturally, that to which they are, in a measure, shut up, acquires a fictitious value. But it is needful, for the sake of Church music itself, to ask those who have to do with the thing whether they should not throw upon it a little light from the outside world. If this were effected, we cannot but think that the ecclesiastical lumber-room would soon have an extensive addition to its contents. How many, for example, of the chants now used would be used any longer? There are places where the substitution, say, of "Crotch in C" for "Jones in D," or, vice versa, on a particular occasion, would be matter of grave import. Looked at as music simply, either or both would be "basketed" without compunction. Then, again, as to the "Services," we are tempted to ask—can it be that the intelligent among Church musicians really believe the majority of such concoctions at all worthy the importance assigned to them? Those who hear Church "Services" with unaccustomed ears are simply repelled by their formalism, their want of expressive and descriptive power, and their exceedingly small musical pretensions. To a large extent the case is the same with anthems, not a few of which are worthy the style in which they are sung—about the severest sentence it is possible to pass upon them. These are strong assertions, but not stronger than the thoughts of outside musicians whenever English Church music is named. All who are not "to the manner born" know that within the ecclesiastical pale—by way of consistency with surroundings, we presume—there has grown up a style of music utterly unworthy of its object, and which is the artistic counterpart of the twaddle that passes current for an average sermon.

The sooner all these things are looked into the shorter will be the existence of "fine old tunes."

The Ammergau Passion Play.

SECOND PART.

This commences with the picture of the buffeting of the prophet Micah, because he warned King Ahab not to go to war with the Syrians, and is followed by the scene of Christ's appearance before Annas. The Jew awaits the news of his arrest with great anxiety; at length Judas arrives in person and announces success, and Annas tells him, "Your name shall live for ever." The Saviour next enters the house of Annas bound and escorted by soldiers, and is led out on the balcony, where he is questioned. Finally, the prisoner is sent by Annas before Caiaphas. We have a picture of the stoning of Naboth, the Jezreelite, by order of Ahab, who coveted his vineyard; and also of Job and his comforters; and in the action which corresponds Christ is confronted with false witnesses before Caiaphas and the council of priests, and quotations are read from three books of the law to prove that he deserves death. The pose of Caiaphas is really majestic in this scene, as he delivers his soul in rolling sentences from under that imposing mitre that now is sheltered by a gorgeous baldquoin. An inner curtain here falls to permit of a front scene, in which Judas passes and expresses his intention to seek Caiaphas, that he may undo the evil he has done. His conscience already begins to sting him. Then we have the waiting-room of the guards in the high priest's hall, with the familiar episode of Peter's denial of his Master. There is yet another scene, a painful one, where the soldiers handage the eyes of Christ, strike him and spit upon him, and challenge him to tell them who did it; and then arrives the first tableau of the tenth Vornelung—Cain with his brother Abel, stretched dead by his blow beside the sacrificial altar. This is preface to the end of Judas, who presents himself before Caiaphas to beg off him whom he had betrayed; he is derided, and cast down before the priests the accursed silver—hastens out of the council hall, and we next see him in his last act, tearing his girdle from his waist, snapping off the dry branches of a blasted apple-tree, and attaching himself to a bough at its top. The curtain descends as he is "going to his own place." The prophet Daniel, condemned by Darius to be thrown into the lion's den, is subsequently brought before us, as introduction to Christ's forced visit to Pilate. The Saviour, flanked by helmeted guards, is led to the balcony of Pilate's house, where he is placed under a standard with the letters S. Q. O. R., surmounted by the golden eagle. These letters should be S. P. Q. R., but perhaps the good folks of Ober-Ammergau have some hidden import of their own in the change. The scene of Christ before Herod is very fine. The ruler of Galilee, magnificently apparelled and seated on a throne radiant with gems and gilding, has much of the mien we are apt to associate with our own "bluff King Hal." Herod did his mockery of Christ, his gibes and sneers, almost in a contagious fashion, so natural was he. The prisoner by his orders was clad in a purple mantle, and a reed put in his hands as sceptre. "Ha! ha! What a King is there!" laughed Herod, and the courtiers sardonically joined, as courtiers will. "Off with him to Pilate again," and the captive was dragged another stage on his way of agony. When we again revert to the Old Testament it is to witness the presentation of "Joseph's robe with blood besprent" to his father, by his brethren, who had sold him. Another tableau presents Abraham about to offer up Isaac on Mount Moriah. Back to the presence of Pilate, who wishes not to have his death upon his hands, Christ is borne anew, scoffed, scourged at a pillar, covered with a white shirt for derision, a crown of sharp thorns placed on his head, two rods held diagonally across it by four soldiers so as to force the prickles into his brow. This passage from the Passion is set before us with a grim literalness that makes women and the tender-hearted shut their eyes. In the next Vorstellung, which concludes the second part, Joseph is conjured up before us as he rode in triumph among the Egyptians—a gorgeous arrangement of scenery and composition of group—and afterwards we have the Israelitish sacrifice of the scape-goat. The finis of the second act is a lively reproduction of the scene under Pilate's balcony when he washes his hands and breaks his lâlon of office, and the mob howl for Christ to be killed, and Barrabas—an admirable felonious figure, hair over eyes, down look, coarse brown home-spun, tied with rope, and bare feet—to be released. It was one of the richest in color and most stirring in the entire play.

The third act of the Mystery is shorter in text than those that precede. The opening Vorstellung is designated "the Way of the Cross," and contains three tableaux, the first representing Isaac carrying up to Mount Moriah the faggots to light the fire on which he himself was intended to be sacrificed; the second designed to portray the preparations for the raising of the blazen serpent by Moses in the wilderness; the third picture brings before us a view of the brazen serpent as set up, and Moses pointing to it, before the assembled multitude. As the curtain rises on a country landscape, a young man comes on to the forestage—Simon the Cyrenean. He pauses, hearing a noise from the street to the right; he hesitates, but finally resumes his journey, and is turning in the direction of the tumult, just as the procession which has caused it comes on the scene, headed by a Roman soldier, mounted on a dapple gray horse, bearing the Imperial standard. A centurion, with the lâlon of command in his right hand, marshals a body of troops, who escort our Saviour as he totters under the weight of the Cross. A soldier roughly accosts Simon, takes him by the shoulder and shoves him under the rood, when the procession again moves onward. Meanwhile some of the wives of Jerusalem, with infants in their arms, emerge from a side street, and with tears in their eyes compassionate our Lord, who addresses them in the memorable words of Scripture beginning, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me." As the procession passes on towards the hill appointed for the execution, the Virgin Mary, bent with sorrow, slowly enters, accompanied by John and Magdalen, and follows its course in the distance. This whole passage—one of the most painful in the Iliad of our Lord's suffering—is put on the boards with a force that brings it home to the senses as if it were a scroll from the passing life of every day that was being unfolded.

The chorus on entering for the sixteenth Vorstellung (which is entitled "Jesus at Golgotha"), have changed their bright-colored mantles for others of sable, and wear mourning wreaths instead of gilt circlets that crowned them before. They sing to a soft musical accompaniment an invitation to the audience to come with them to witness the last suffering of Him who redeemed us by His blood. This is rendered more solemn and striking by the muffled sound of hammering which is heard from behind. On the music ceasing the curtain rises, discovering "the place of the skulls." The two thieves are already impaled, their arms turned back and tied over the arms of the cross. Our Saviour is nailed on the Holy Rood, which lies on the ground, but is immediately lifted to its position and fixed at the base. It was the painting that Albrecht Dürer drew, vivified and plain in the moonlight under the clear canopy of God's sky to all. How true is every detail, the mocking soldiers, the executioners going in a grim, tradesmanlike way about their business, the centurion formal as a veteran adjutant; the standard-bearer, sternly still on his gray steed; the mob, the writhing thieves, and the symmetric figure in the midst. Nothing that is related in Holy Writ was wanting, the filling of the sponge with vinegar and conveying it to his lips on a branch of hyssop to quench his thirst, the conversation with the thieves, and the conversion of one of them, the division of his outer garments by the executioners, and the spear put to the side. "The legs of the thieves are broken by resounding blows of india rubber clubs, which gave the process a repugnant reality, and their limp bodies were taken down from the respective crosses and borne away. Mary came in, with her Magdalen and others and John; next follows the Consummation, as a messenger, rushing in affrighted, announced that the veil of the Temple was rent asunder. The Virgin, red-eyed, drops sobbing to John's shoulder, and Magdalen her long blonde locks floating downward, kneels, clasps the foot of the rood and embraces it.

The descent from the Cross was not similar to that shown in the celebrated picture of Rubens in Antwerp. Joseph Mayer had been in his painful position for three-and-twenty minutes. Depending for support on a sort of console for his feet, a disguised girdle at his waist, and a band at the back of his head, while the arms were kept extended by clamps of iron bending over the fingers and connecting them to the timber; he must have had a strong trial to his nerves and powers of endurance. The cross is some twelve feet high. He states that his position on it for such a length of time is very fatiguing to the muscles of the chest, and by the wished-for moment when he is taken down his hands are quite blue and bloodless and the arms numb as when one happens to have got a limb under him in sleep so as to impede the circulation. His removal from the Cross had to be performed very gently to obviate the danger of an attack of apoplexy from the sudden return of the blood to the channels which had been shut against it. A ladder was placed at the back and another in front. A man got up on that behind, took away the crown of thorns, and drew the clamps; Joseph of Arimathea, in a rich garment, mounting on the steps of the ladder, between the crucifix and the audience, passed up the folds of a fine linen cloth, these were passed under the arms, and by degrees the body was lowered, and was slowly borne away; the curtain fell, and there was a deep respiration from the spectators. The Resurrection, which comes next in order, is analogically typified in two tableaux from the Old Testament, to-wit, Jonas in the act of being cast forth by the whale, after three days' confinement in mother-earth, and the destruction of Pharaoh's host in the Red Sea to represent the victory, through redemption, for the chosen stock. The closing scenes of the Passionschauspiel were but the familiar episode to all Bible students; finally a tableau of the Glorified, with a pink and white banner held aloft, standing on an eminence, surrounded by His mother and His faithful disciples. This brought the curtain down for the last time, and the chorus poured forth a jubilant final Hallelujah as the church clock struck five.

Professor Oakeley on the Lower Rhenish Festival.

Germany, like England, has its great annual festival held in turn at three of its principal towns—Cologne, Düsseldorf, and Aix-la-Chapelle. At the last named city the forty-seventh celebration has just taken place, the works of Beethoven naturally occupying a prominent place in the programme. The fitness of the locality for a commemoration of the centenary of the great composer's birth will be seen at once when it is remembered that his only oratorio, The Mount of Olives, was there produced, and that at the first of the festivals held at Aix the Ninth Symphony was conducted from the manuscript by Beethoven's friend and pupil, Ferdinand Ries. In many essential points the performances on these occasions differ from and are superior to those of a like kind in England. More numerous rehearsals, a greater amount of enthusiasm among the artists, and a more general interest in the proceedings on the part of the people of the town and district, all combine to render the festivals a success, while the fact that art instead of pounds, shillings and pence, is the primary object of the meeting adds not a little to the spirit with which they are conducted. From Professor Oakeley the Guardian has as usual received a most interesting report of the doings at Aix, and we propose to give our readers some extracts from his letter, setting forth the chief features of the festival.

By way of introduction the Professor writes:—"The rehearsals, of which there are six for three concerts,—instead of as—say at Birmingham—two rehearsals for eight performances,—commenced on the 3rd instant, and were superintended by the Bavarian General Musikdirector Franz Lachner, and the local music director, Ferdinand Breunung, conductors of the festival. The first three of these rehearsals are preliminary, and the three last "general," or, as we should say, dress rehearsals. To the latter, which were as fully attended, and to musicians are of even greater interest than the concerts themselves, the admission to the public was twenty groshen, or two shillings. The price of a ticket to the best place for the three concerts was six thalers, or six shillings for each concert. The performances were held as usual in the Kurhaus,—by no means, as was mentioned in 1867, an adequate or suitable building for the occasion, its accommodation being very limited; and the supply was consequently unequal to the demand for tickets, of which at least twice the number might have been sold. The total number of performers was 560—about the same as at the last festival here, the numbers at Cologne and Düsseldorf, where the halls are larger, being respectively 755 and 854 at the festivals in 1868 and 1869. The chorus consisted of 118 sopranos, 96 altos, 89 tenors, and 122 basses—total, 425; the orchestra of 24 first and 24 second violins, 18 violas, 16 cellos, 13 double basses, 4 flutes, 3 oboes, 3 clarinets, 4 bassoons, 6 horns, 4 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 contra-bassoon, 1 drummer—total, 124. The principal soloists engaged were—soprano, Mlle. Orgeni, of Berlin; contralto, Mme. Joachim; tenor, Herr Vogl, of Munich; bass, Herr Bletzacher; and violin, Herr Professor Joachim."

The performances commenced on Whitsunday evening with Beethoven's Mass in D, the difficulties of which have been so frequently dwelt on of late in our English prints, and his Symphony No. 3, "The Eroica." The Mass must, as the Professor says, be heard in Germany to be thoroughly appreciated, as there alone is it given with all the finish and completeness which are so desirable in the performance of any masterpiece. It was performed to the best advantage at Aix, the greatest effect being produced by the execution of the Benedictus with its exquisite violin obbligato played by Herr Joachim. The performance of the "Eroica" we are told was acknowledged by Joachim and many other musicians who were present to be unsurpassed:—

"The tempi taken by Lachner, who as was mentioned in reporting the Munich Festival of 1863, has a traditional reading of Beethoven's symphonies, having heard them under the composer's direction at Vienna, were in the first movement quicker than that to which we are accustomed, in the Funeral March considerably slower, in the scherzo about the same as in London, and in the last movement—before the presto—rather slower. The whole time occupied in the performance fifty-six and a half minutes, or about five minutes longer than the average time in London. The pianissimo and delicacy of the scherzo was perhaps the most marvellous part of this memorable performance, the effect of which was second within recollection only to that Munich Festival in point of power,—but it must be added that the orchestra on the latter occasion numbered no less than 254 performers, out of which number some 200 were assigned to the strings."

On Whit Monday Handel shared the honors with Beethoven, his oratorio Deborah following the inimitable "Leonora" Overture, No. 3. The latter work is a special favorite at these gatherings, and was given three years ago at Aix, under the direction of Rietz. On the performance of the oratorio the Professor says:—

"The selection at any festival of an oratorio by Handel, even if such a festival be held in special honor of any other composer, can never be out of place or unacceptable. Indeed at a Beethoven festival such a choice is especially appropriate when that master's reported opinion of the Saxon giant is borne in mind:—"Handel," said he to Moscheles in 1823, "is the greatest composer that ever lived; I would uncover my head, and kneel before his tomb." And it has been an almost invariable custom at the Rhine meetings to include an oratorio by the great choral master, as in his works the splendid chorus assembled is heard to such advantage; moreover, however high any musician may stand, it is hardly advisable to perform his works solely during a three days' festival, and a change suited to the solemnity of the occasion under notice enabled the audience to listen with renewed and invigorated attention to the less obvious music of the later composer. Deborah was in the Aix programme of 1834, when it was given with Hiller's judicious additional accompaniments, whose translation from the English text of the poet-aster Samuel Humphreys—gravely entitled in the German programme "Der Dichter Humphreys"—was also used. Last week Hiller's accompaniments were given, but not his translation, that by Gervinus having been published by Simrock, and being in every one's hand, and also having been recently adopted in the fine Leipzig edition of the score lately published by the German Handel Society. Only the first movement (which is the only original one of the four) in the overture was played. The sublime choruses "Immortal Lord," with its sequel "O grant a leader," "See the proud chief," "Lord of Eternity," and the Baal-chorus were the most effective; but the whole of the choral music was sung with marvellous freshness, smoothness, and vigor, and reflects the highest credit on the singers and on Herr Breunung for the pains evidently bestowed in training them. The part of Deborah was taken by Mlle. Aglaya Orgeni, that of Barak by Mme. Joachim, Sisera by a tenor voice, Herr Vogl, not by a contralto as in London, and Abinoam by Herr Bleizacher. Of Mme. Joachim it needs but to be said that she sustained her reputation as the first oratorio singer and first contralto in Germany. Perhaps her last song, "Low at her feet he bowed," in which Herr Joachim has enriched the stringed accompaniment, took most with the audience. To Herr Bleizacher very high praise is due for his pure and admirable reading of all assigned to him. His "Tears such as tender fathers shed" could not have been better given. The voice of the Hanoverian "Hofopernsänger" is of exquisite quality in high and low notes, and recalls Staudigl. Herr Bleizacher would be much appreciated in England, where there is at present an opening for a basso profundo, as well as for a contralto, and the latter vacancy might be worthily filled by Mme. Joachim. The singing of Mlle. Orgeni and of Herr Vogl is less suited to oratorio music. Deborah was a worthy selection of the occasion, although not ranking as a whole amongst Handel's greatest works. Several numbers of the oratorio are réchauffés from the Coronation Anthem, produced six years previously, and interpolations from Athaliah, composed in the same year as Deborah. It is recorded with some pride at Aix-la-Chapelle, that the visit of six weeks paid in 1737 by Handel to this city for the benefit of his health completely restored him, and that his greatest works, commencing with Alexander's Feast, were produced after that visit. It is related by Chrysander, that after the first bath in these sulphurous waters Handel found himself so much better as to find his way at once to one of the churches here, on the organ of which he thanked God, with all his heart, his hands and feet.

The "artists' concert," as it is termed, one of the many results of Mendelssohn's energy and devotion—the great composer having introduced the supplementary performance at the Düsseldorf Festival in 1833—took place on the following day. The programme is subjoined:—

Overture, zur "Weihe des Hauses," Op. 124.. Beethoven.
Air from "Freischütz," Mlle. Orgeni..... Weber.
Violin Concerto, Herr Joachim, Op. 62..... Beethoven.
Ballade, "Belshazzar," Herr Bleizacher..... Schumann.
Lied, "Der Wanderer," "..... Schubert.
Lied, "An die Hoffnung," Herr Vogl..... Beethoven.
Finale to Second Act of "Fidelio," Chorus....

Overture, "Coriolan," Op. 62..... Beethoven.
Scene from "Alceste," Mme. Joachim..... Gluck.
Violin solos, "Sarabande," "Bourrée," &c., Herr Joachim..... Bach.
Lieder, Mlle. Orgeni, { a "Mignon"..... Beethoven.
                                  b "Volksliedchen"..... Schumann.
                                  c "Ich wandre' nicht"..... " "
Canon, Quartet from "Fidelio"..... Beethoven.
Chorus, "Hallelujah to the Father," "Blount of Olives," Op. 86..... Beethoven.

"The two overtures were played as finely as the Leonora overture the preceding evening. The first, composed in 1822 for the opening of a new theatre at Vienna, is always appropriate as a Festival overture: in the second, only surpassed by Leonora No. 3, and perhaps Egmont, the superb undercurrent of cellos, &c., was never given with more magic. In this glorious overture to Coriolan Beethoven seems to have fore-shadowed the style of Schumann. The unrivalled violin concerto, with Professor Joachim for unrivalled interpreter, was never more wonderfully given. The great violinist received such an ovation as even to him, must be memorable. The orchestral accompaniments were gloriously played. Mme. Joachim was received with scarcely less enthusiasm and applause than her gifted husband. Her superb declamation of Gluck's fine scena astonished those who only had heard her in oratorio. Higher praise of her rendering of this recitative, &c., cannot be given than to say that it was worthy of Jenny Lind. Mlle. Orgeni made far greater effect in the air from Freischütz than she is reported to have produced lately at a London Philharmonic Concert, and was encored in Schumann's exquisite "Volksliedchen," No. 2, Op. 51. The admirable taste and voice of Herr Bleizacher were manifested in Schumann's grand "Belshazzar," and his refined rendering of "Der Wanderer" gave to that well-known song a new interest. Herr Joachim created a furore as usual by his Bach solos in B minor, and each of the artists received a "demonstration" on leaving the platform. The lovely Canon in G from Fidelio was perfectly given, though some amusement was afforded by a crash at the commencement of the exquisite prelude to it, necessitating a fresh start, caused by the giving out fortissimo of the chord in C, in consequence of a mistake as to the piece about to be performed. The "Hallelujah" Chorus was taken at a rapid pace, but went superbly."

The Festival was concluded with a supper, at which the ladies who had taken part in the performance were present. The places of honor were assigned to Mme. Joachim and Mlle. Orgeni, Herr Joachim occupying the seat opposite the President. The usual toasts followed, the great violinist making a happy speech in proposing the health of the Committee. Amongst the musicians present at this festival were observed Professor Bernier, Kufferath, and Samuel, of Brussels; Barth, of Münster; Carl Hill, of Schwerin; Professors Hutoy and Soubref, of Liège; Levy, of Carlsruhe; Vincent Lachner, of Mannheim; O. von Königlów and Franz Weber, of Cologne; Otto Schwahn, of Wiesbaden; Tansch, of Düsseldorf; Verhulst, of Amsterdam; von Wasielewski, of Bonn, &c. In consequence of a severe domestic affliction Kapellmeister Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, was prevented from attending the festival. Great enthusiasm was manifested towards Franz Lachner, whose entry into the conductor's rostrum, which was as large as an Italian pulpit, was accompanied by a flourish of trumpets, and after the last concert a laurel crown was surreptitiously placed on his head by one of the young ladies of the chorus, and an ovation followed. The Professor concludes his admirable notice by a brief allusion to the general festive character given to the quiet old town in honor of the event, and assures us that "the Rhenish Festival of 1870 has been worthy of its predecessors, of the great names with which some of the meetings have been associated, and of the mighty genius to whose memory it was specially dedicated."—Choir.

The Musical Department at Vassar College.

Many persons know of the opportunities afforded by Vassar College for literary and scientific culture, but few have any idea of its musical advantages. Therefore, having ourselves obtained some information upon the subject, we have determined to impart it, for the benefit of those who take an interest in the progress of true music throughout the land.

The objects of the Institution render it necessary that all Art studies should be subservient to the regular work; yet, as Vassar College aims to give a liberal education, a taste for the Fine Arts is encouraged, and the students are permitted to devote as much time to them as they can conscientiously spare from their daily duties. Music receives most attention, and, if the young ladies faithfully improve their opportunities and manifest a constant interest in their work, they are enabled to attain to a very creditable advancement during the period of their College course.

Prof. F. L. RITTER, of New York, has the charge of the musical department. His aim is to educate the taste of his pupils by giving them the works of those composers who are the acknowledged masters of the Art. The effects of this system, after a few years of careful training, are very marked.

Among those who assemble from different parts of the country, and continue the study of Music, are found too many of that class who fancy that they possess considerable musical knowledge, if they are able to sing a few airs from some of the light operas, or play several fashionable waltzes and brilliant variations. When good music is first given them, the majority pronounce it stupid and devoid of melody, simply because they cannot understand it. But a season of faithful study leads to the confession, that, after all, more real pleasure and satisfaction are to be found in such compositions, than in those which they formerly admired. These results are seldom accomplished immediately, and, in a few cases, years are necessary to eradicate the effects of their early instruction.

The Professor gives lessons in Vocal Music to two classes, free of expense, which all members of the College are invited to join. The excellence of his method of teaching is seen in the great improvement in chorus singing, since the commencement of his labors in the Institution. He has also been instrumental in introducing into the College library several works upon Music and musical composers, and additions are to be annually made to this collection.

A society has been organized by the students for the promotion of musical culture in the College, which, we believe, has been the means of doing much to improve and educate the taste of its members. This Cecilia Society, under Prof. Ritter's immediate direction, gives a Soirée each month, and it has been said by persons of experience that the performances would compare favorably with those of the best schools in Europe, where the whole attention is devoted to music; they are not only good, but often artistic; even the compositions of those masters, most difficult to comprehend, are rendered with remarkable understanding and appreciation.

Lectures upon Music are occasionally delivered by the Professor. As they are the same which so pleased the true lovers of the Art among his audiences in New York, the students have found them very interesting and instructive. Some of the young ladies have attempted to express their thoughts upon various musical subjects in the form of essays, and have received great encouragement from their teachers.

The universal desire among the Vassar students is the pursuit of all that is noblest and best; therefore it is easy to gratify their wishes for the study of the highest music. But when with friends, who have not learned to admire the best composers, there are many temptations to forget the good lessons formerly learned, merely for the sake of pleasing those with whom they are associated. We are glad to know that many will never sacrifice principle to a foolish desire of approbation, and we believe that of the many true musicians who leave the College, some will exert a beneficial influence in the country.

This Journal has already published the programmes of the music performed at the close of the year, under Prof. Ritter's superintendence. These give a true idea of the composers whose works are studied by the pupils of the department.

We will only add the music performed at Commencement, June 22nd, viz.:

Allegro. Fifth Symphony..... Beethoven.
Concerto, G minor, Second and Third Movements..... Mendelssohn.
Rondo. Opus 73..... Chopin.

"Il Trovatore," and the Unities.

In the comedy of Les vieux Garçons, the author, wishing to show the extreme point to which naïveté can go, makes his ingénue come away from a performance of the Trovatore with the impression that the incidents in that marvellous drama are taken from real life, and that the characters are real characters. "It really happened, I am sure it did!" cries the enthusiastic schoolgirl; an exclamation which, coming from an ingénue, seems to prove that if "great wit to madness nearly is allied," ingenuousness is separated by only a very narrow line from idiocy. It must be very difficult to make anything of "Leonora" in a dramatic point of view. All that can be done to relieve the character of its thorough staginess is to introduce plenty of sentiment into "Leonora's" music. "Leonora" belongs to neither time nor place, and the representative of "Leonora" always shows by her costume (which usually differs by a difference of several centuries from that of her two lovers) that she is conscious of the independent position belonging to her. Some day we hope to see the whole chronology of the Traviata called in question—set to rights it can never be. The reckless manner in which Leonora attires herself after the fashion of the present day, without any regard to the costume worn by the Count di Luna—the only personage in the piece whose dress belongs to any recognized period—is but the expression of despair in the matter of costume. The prima donna knows that the troubadours were the wandering minstrels of the eleventh, twelfth, at latest thirteenth century, whereas the gypsies did not penetrate into Europe until the fifteenth. Azucena and Manrico could not have been found in any part of Europe at the same time. Manrico went out before Azucena came in. Nor, even if troubadours and gypsies had flourished contemporaneously, can one fancy the adopted child of a gypsy becomes a troubadour. The other troubadours, crusaders, and the associates of crusaders, would not have liked it. Once, however, admit the chronology of the Traviata, and the inconsistencies of the other kinds in which the work abounds are but trifles. Between the character of the troubadour and that of the gypsy a certain analogy no doubt existed, though the troubadour was everywhere welcomed, the gypsy every where driven away. But they are about the same in the eyes of the proud aristocrat the Count di Luna, who treats them equally as mere vagabonds. If other more formidable difficulties in the story of the Traviata could be explained away we should still like to know who "Leonora" is. Where are her relations? Has she a father, has she a brother, has she a sister, has she a mother? Or was she a proprietress in her own right, living alone in her feudal castle with no other society than she could well avow but that of the confidante to whom she addresses her cavatinas? Of all mysterious unreal operas the most unreal is the Traviata. Zauberflöte is sufficiently unintelligible; but in Zauberflöte we at least meet with human beings, and Zauberflöte is professedly a fantastic opera. The Traviata, which we must remember is Verdi's most successful work, is such by its situations, which are very dramatic in the theatrical sense of the word, and well devised for conventional operatic purposes; the interest, too, such as it is, is fairly distributed among the four principal personages of the drama.—Pall Mall Gaz.

Beethoven and J. J. Rousseau Compared.

(From the "Guide Musical.")

According to La Fontaine's remark, Genius is like Fortune: in nearly every instance, it makes one pay very dearly for what it appears to give. Beethoven's share was immense; but he paid for it more dearly than anyone else for his, more dearly even than Mozart, whose only fine for being immortal was his dying at the age of thirty-six. Beethoven lived twenty-one years longer, but, during those twenty-one years, he entirely lost the faculty of hearing, and wrote the following lines full of sadness to Herr von Seyfried: "Art alone has kept me; it seemed to me impossible to leave the earth before producing all I felt I ought to produce. It is thus that I continued my miserable, ah! my very miserable, life, and with such a nervous organization that a mere nothing causes me to pass from a state of the utmost happiness to one of the greatest misery." With an organization of this kind, Beethoven did not require to be deaf in order to feel unhappy; let us put the matter clearly, however: unhappy, but enjoying, at the same time, those comprehensive and magnificent compensations for which the vulgar envy, and are justified in envying, men of genius. The vulgar are not so far out in their appreciations. They have no notion of the pangs which may be occasioned by bringing forth such a work as the Symphony in C minor, or the Pastoral Symphony, but they feel very well that there must be some pleasure in conceiving, producing and drawing these compositions from chaos. Such a pleasure really does exist: it is great and infinite even in its sufferings. "Art alone has kept me," Beethoven wrote, and art in this case is nothing more nor less than the pleasure above mentioned. Scattered up and down the world, there is a host of poor devils, quite as nervous, and quite as deaf as Beethoven, or more so, without art as a support, who drag on through their poverty and their sufferings as they best can, without the consolation of giving birth to a sublime symphony, or even of cheering their silence and their solitude by the elaboration of the smallest polka.

Let us exaggerate nothing, neither the happiness nor the misery of a man of genius. Beethoven could not be happy after the fashion of a notary or a banker who makes a fortune and retires from business. Nor could he be so after the fashion of those artists whose work is extremely easy and with whom success keeps up, step for step, with their efforts. He inherited from nature an aspiration for what was great and now, difficult to find, and difficult to render intelligible. To produce emotions, he was under the necessity of inventing and creating, while so many others have simply to imitate and continue. Instead of being contented with first results, he experienced incredible difficulty in satisfying himself; he searched for a long time; he erased, corrected, and recommenced with the indefatigable tenacity that Jean Jacques Rousseau displayed in the construction of his learned periods; and this is not the only trait of resemblance, revealed to us by a study of his character and of his genius, between him and the citizen of Geneva. We find in both the same natural uneasiness, the same quick susceptibility, the same misanthropy, and the same strong love of the country. Beethoven composed his finest master pieces under the same circumstances that Rousseau wrote his Julie, his Lettre sur les spectacles, and his Emile. Both suffered from an infirmity which, though different in one case from what it was in the other, kept them equally at a distance from intercourse with the world. Both loved in their heart, and loved without hope; Rousseau loved Mme. d'Houdetot, and Beethoven, ladies of high rank, if we are to believe what Wegeler wrote: "Beethoven war nie ohne Liebe, und meistens von ihr in hohem Grade ergriffen" ("Beethoven was never without some passion, generally worked up to the highest pitch"). All the difference is that Beethoven did not marry, and had near him no Therese Lovassour, flanked by her hideous mother, to disturb the repose of his life and degrade his dignity; but, though unmarried, he, also, had the burdens and annoyances of a family without its touching compensations.

Beethoven had several brothers; the widow of one of them, Carl, a cashier in the Bank of Austria, who made him the guardian of his son, a minor, would not give the boy up to him. Hence an action at law, that is to say, a might-mare which, for four years, weighed upon Beethoven's breast. How could any one ever guess the first annoyance this law-suit caused him. "This episode in the artist's life," says M. von Lenz, "shrinks into the microscopic proportions of German existence. Thus it was commonly supposed at Vienna that the Dutch particle van, in Beethoven's name, was the German particle von, implying noble birth, especially when the composer's name was written in the abbreviated form, L. v. Beethoven. Beethoven carried his case before the Court that took cognizance of action concerning nobles. The Court required the production of his patents of nobility. Beethoven carried his hand to his head and to his heart. The reader will easily believe that this proof could not have any value in a question of legal jurisdiction. The case was referred to the magistracy of Vienna. Will it be credited? This reference of the case to another court, though very natural, wounded Beethoven's feelings profoundly. He asserted that an exceptional tribunal ought to have been called upon to take cognizance of the affairs of genius, and that this notion had been forgotten in the code." The fact is, Beethoven was profoundly aristocratic, and that, too, without suspecting it. One day, he made the following assertion, reported by Schindler: "A man of a superior kind ought not to be confounded with a tradesman, and I have been so confounded." On another occasion, he heard Prince Lichnowski order his valet to wait upon him first, if he and the Prince happened to ring at the same time. Does the reader fancy that Beethoven was touched by this piece of attention? Quite the contrary; he instantly took a servant exclusively for himself. Hear again Herr von Lenz:—

"Beethoven passed his life among the high aristocracy of Vienna. He was partial to the diversion of dancing, a pleasure according with the simple manners of the period, when people still danced to a piano, but, incredible as it may seem, he could never manage to dance in time. He was awkward in his movements; he generally broke the things he touched; no piece of furniture at his own house, and least of all a piece of furniture of any value, was safe from his attacks. How often his inkstand fell into the piano near which he was working! Beethoven was an integral part of the Lichnowski, Lobkowitz, Browne, Brunswick, Erdödy and Thun families. His pupil, the Arch-Duke Rudolph, set the example.

An artist himself, he treated the greatest artist of the age as he ought to be treated, namely, as a special recipient of the bounty of heaven. Beethoven made his terms with the Prince: he desired to be alone with him during his lessons of harmony and piano. The prince kept the stipulation. Beethoven met no one save the Arch-Duke Carl, the hero of Aspern, to whom the Arch Duke Rudolph knew he was partial. Whatever charm the intimacy of such distinguished persons may have possessed for the mind of the artist, the mere idea that the lesson was at hand sufficed to render him ill. . . . Beethoven never succeeded in subjecting himself to the least constraint. If you invited him to dinner, he did not forgive you for his having been a whole day the slave of your hour. The hour for him was a motive. He still entertained the singular idea that people should eat when they are hungry. A grand day arrived, however, when he gave a dinner to Mesdames Sontag and Unger. Under this dinner, however, lurked the Machiavelic idea of making the ladies believe that the difficulties of their parts, in the Symphony with Chorus, were less than they imagined, and to prove that it was utterly impossible to change anything in them."

For four years, the fatal law-suit, of which we spoke above, completely engrossed all Beethoven's attention. He considered his honor involved in it; he himself drew up all the deeds and memoirs. His counsel, the venerable barrister Bach, senior member of the bar, allowed him to do as he liked, feeling that any other course would drive him mad. Beethoven at last gained the day by an appeal from three previous judgments, which, perhaps, cost musical art a symphony and a few other marvels. When he had won, he thought of leaving his nephew to live with him, and of keeping house. The reader should see the letter the composer sent a neighbor, asking for information about the most essential things, of which he did not know a syllable. 1. What must you give two servants to eat, morning and evening, quantity and quality? 2. How often must they have roast meat? . . . etc 3. How many pounds of meat for three persons? The neighbor ought merely to have replied: "Write symphonies!"

W. von Lenz thus finishes his curious narrative:—

"Money became an object with Beethoven from the moment that his nephew's existence was his own. For him—the young man, who bore his name—he saved. This nephew, the hostile element in the second portion of the life of the artist, who was cruelly punished for over-estimating an uncle's duties, embittered the last ten years of his existence. Beethoven nearly lost his reason on the day the University of Vienna expelled, for misconduct, the adopted son on whom he had concentrated the imperious necessity, which he had experienced all his life, of loving some one. The master's last love died the moment he saw his nephew abandon a literary career, to enter the Austrian army."

Let us leave this giddy profligate whom Beethoven constituted his heir, to reward him probably for not deigning to disturb himself and fetch a doctor, when his uncle, his benefactor, returned to Vienna (December 1826), a prey to the malady of which he was destined to die a few months later. But Beethoven had, also, a brother, a well known apothecary in Vienna, who frequently drove about in a landau and four. This brother, by name Johann, was indebted to Ludwig, the artist, for his establishment as a druggist. Though living but a short distance off, he never visited him, only sending him, on New Year's day, his card with the words: "Johann van Beethoven, Gutz-Besitzer" (that is to say, landed proprietor); and the artist wrote on the back, "Ludwig van Beethoven, Hirn-Besitzer" (that is to say, brain proprietor). The medical men ordered Ludwig van Beethoven hay baths, and, as Johann van Beethoven had plenty of hay and to spare, a message was naturally sent him to let his brother have some. Does the reader know the answer of the landed proprietor, who was a judge of herbs, and wanted to keep everything for himself? We do not think sordid avarice ever invented anything more sulkily naïve. Johann van Beethoven, the apothecary, replied that the hay from his estate was not good, and Ludwig van Beethoven was obliged to send elsewhere for some.

Such were family ties for the great artist; such was the manner in which those nearly related to him repaid his devotion and his sacrifices. Like Jean-Jacques Rousseau, however, Beethoven was himself frequently unjust and ungrateful, through being irritable and suspicious; he often rejected a benefit from an exaggerated sentiment of independence, or manifested only indignation and anger towards his benefactor. ## Music Abroad.

Bonn.—The programme for the Beethoven Festival, which had not reached us in season for our last, is now announced as follows. For the first day (Sept. 11): Missa Solemnis; Symphony in C minor. —Second day (12th): Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Aria: "Abscheulicher," from Fidelio; Sinfonia Eroica; March with Chorus from the "Ruins of Athens"; Concerto for Violin; Fantasia for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra. —Third day (13th): Overture to "Coriolan"; Elegiac Song for four solo voices; Piano Concerto in E flat; Scene and Aria: "Ah perfido"; Overture to "Egmont"; Ninth Symphony with Schiller's Hymn to "Joy." Ferdinand Hiller will conduct, assisted by the Music Director of the place, Herr von Wasielewski. The principal artists are Fran Bellingrath-Wagner of Dresden (Soprano); Frau Amalie Joachim, of Berlin (Contralto); Frl. Franziska Schrock, of Bonn, (Contralto); Herr Vogl, Court opera singer from Munich, (Tenor); Herr A. Schütz, of Hamburg, (Bass); Herr Professor Joseph Joachim, of Berlin, (Violinist); Herr Charles Hallé, of London, (Pianist); Herr Franz Weber, Royal Music Director at Cologne, (Organist). We doubt not many Americans will throng to this city of Beethoven's birth to be present at the festival.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The Forty-seventh Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine was duly celebrated at Aix-la-Chapelle on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of June. The works performed on the first day were Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica and Missa Solemnis. Herr Franz Lachner conducted. Mmes. Joachim, Orgeni, Herren Vogl, and Bleitzacher were the vocalists. Herr Joachim took the solo violin part. How he played the "Benedictus" it is superfluous to say. Among the compositions performed on the second day were Beethoven's third overture to Leonore, and Handel's oratorio of Deborah. The latter had not been heard at Aix-la-Chapelle for thirty-six years. The concert on the third evening was of a miscellaneous character. The programme included two overtures by Beethoven: zur Weihe des Hauses, and that to Coriolan; and finale from Fidelio; the final chorus from Christus am Oelberge, and the Violin Concerto, the last being, of course, performed by Herr Joachim—as only Herr Joachim can perform it.

FRANKFORT-ON-THAINE.—Miss Minnie Hauck has appeared very successfully at the Stadttheater in Don Juan, and M. Gounod's Faust.

HOMBURG.—The season has begun. A French operatic company, including Mmes. Bataille, Singalée, MM. Capoul, du Wast, and Bataille are engaged up to the end of July. They will play the most popular works by Auber, Boieldieu, Adam, Halévy, Hérold, and Ricci. The Italian operatic season commences in the beginning of August and lasts till September. Mmes. Adelina Patti, Trebelli, MM. Bettini, Berger, and Bagagiolo are mentioned as belonging to the company.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The last Concert, July 11, heads its announcement: "Honor to Beethoven." The programme, selected entirely from his works, includes Symphonies No. 1 and No. 9 (Choral); Choral Fantasia (Mme. Arabella Goddard, pianist); Dervishes' Chorus; and the Overture to "Leonore" in C. Conductor: W. G. Cousins.

NEW PHILHARMONIC. Liszt's mystico-romantic Cantata: "The Legend of St. Elizabeth," was performed at the public rehearsal, June 11, and at the last concert of the season, June 15.

The Athenæum thus comments upon Abbé Liszt's extraordinary work:

"Dr. Wylde is a bold man; else would he not have dared to bring out the Abbé Liszt's Legend of St. Elizabeth at his last concert of the season. The Legend has been more than once referred to in these columns—but guardedly; for while it has been unhesitatingly condemned by many critics, it has been extolled to the skies by the large party of worshippers who, believing in the divinity of Herr Wagner, look upon the Abbé Liszt as his chief prophet. We would fain speak with respect and deference of the greatest executive genius of the age, but, to say sooth, we feel some difficulty in expressing in at all temperate language the sensations awakened by a first hearing of St. Elizabeth. If the work had been written according to a musical scale totally at variance with that in use in civilized Europe, the effect could scarcely have been more appalling. It is idle to criticize, according to the generally accepted canons of criticism, a work composed in defiance of them. If we ventured to suggest that much of the Legend was to our ears hideously cacophonous, the disciples of the new school would probably maintain that every chord was dictated by a subtle meaning, and that to penetrate the order in disorder of the master's design is given to none but the humble believers in his genius. To us, whose faith it is that every work of Art should in itself be beautiful, such arguments have no force. We are, at all events, not alone in our judgment: for the conclusion of the first part of the Legend—all attempted on this occasion by Dr. Wylde—was followed by a volley of hearty unmistakable hisses. Mlle. Tiejens labored hard at her thankless task; Herr Stockhausen declaimed admirably; and the choruses, sung in German, were given, to quote the words of the programme, 'with a result as satisfactory as could be anticipated.' It was right to give the Abbé's oratorio once; it would be absurd to repeat it."

The Standard takes another view of the work, and says:—

"The legend of St Elizabeth is well known through Professor Kingslev's Saint's Tragedy and Montalembert's Vie de St Elizabeth, but the poem which the Abbé Liszt has set to music is probably less familiar. It is the composition of Herr Otto Roquette, who drew his inspirations (it is said) from the exquisite frescoes at Warburg, executed by Moritz Schwind. The Abbé Liszt's aim has evidently been to illustrate the principal events in the life of St Elizabeth by means of music, rather than to set the poem to vocal phrases in the ordinary way. His efforts in this direction have previously been remarkable, as may be instanced by his Hunnenschlacht, inspired by Kaulbach's cartoon, by his Faust symphony, and his Symphonische Dichtungen, works of acknowledged merit on the Continent, but which no one has ventured to bring before an English public for the reasons which it would serve no good purpose at present to discuss. The music to St Elizabeth, having the advantage of a poem to elucidate it, it was hoped would have paved the way for a patient hearing of other works of the kind by the disciples of the new school of music in Germany. But if, with the advantage of a key to composers' fancies, English audiences are indisposed to form an opinion of the suitability of the expression to the ideas desired to be portrayed, there is little chance of those less favored being listened to more patiently. The performance of the legend on Wednesday evening brought together a large number of the advocates and opponents of the school called ironically the "Music of the Future," who expressed themselves according to the light within them in a very decided manner. If such a period were possible when the strains of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and their acknowledged competers, must give way to the imaginings of Herr Richard Wagner, and Abbé Liszt, and others, it would behoove every true musician to endeavor to defer it as much as lies in his power. But there is no fear for the future of our great composers. Their works will ever be cherished whilst there are minds capable of appreciating the true and beautiful in art; and there is, therefore, no need to limit the boundary of musical thought. Every work containing original ideas honestly wrought should be hailed with enthusiasm in whatever school it was written, instead of being permitted to be cried down by the ignorant. Apart from the merits of the work itself, the audience seemed on Wednesday evening to be unanimous in their appreciation of the manner in which it was executed. Both the orchestra and the choir were heavily taxed, but accomplished wonders. With Herr Henseler's assistance even the difficulties of the pronunciation for the choir were in a great measure overcome, and his interesting translation enabled the audience to have some insight into the composer's meaning. Mlle. Tiejens' rôle was the most difficult, perhaps, she had ever been asked to fulfil. No other artist is so gifted with an organ capable of sustaining the long declamatory passages which occur in the legend, and scarcely any other would have cared to have exerted herself so much for the art's sake, seeing that nowhere does the music offer the least opportunity for display. Herr Stockhausen had the best rôle of the two, and his splendid voice was heard to every advantage, whilst his admirable musicianship was apparent all through the performance. On the conclusion of the legend the conductor, Professor Wylde, was called for, and unanimity prevailed in acknowledging the merits of such a remarkable performance.

Five Seasons of Good Music.

The Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association began in December, 1865. The subscription series of that winter consisted of six concerts. So great was the success that in the following winter the number was increased to eight, which was again the number of the third series. The appetite for music of the purest order, still increasing, warranted ten subscription concerts in each of the last two seasons; and still the demand seems to have more than kept pace with the supply. Seven extra (Benefit) Concerts also have been given. So that thus far the plan so well initiated five years ago last winter has given to the Boston music-lovers forty-eight Symphony Concerts, of the highest order so far as the programmes were concerned, and at least of a respectably high character, steadily improving, in the matter of performance generally, with not a few experiences entirely satisfactory.

This success, we firmly believe, is due above all things to the high and standard character of the selections, invariably from the works of the great masters. For this it was that secured the confidence of the best kind of audience, who formed the permanent nucleus, whose loyalty could always be depended upon so long as the programmes should be kept up to the mark. No other kind of audience,—that is to say, none without settled taste for what is highest, none without musical convictions—can be depended upon for more than an uncertain and capricious interest in anything, and only so long as that thing happens to be uppermost in fashion. These concerts, on the contrary, have sought the permanent nucleus of their supporters in the class who are drawn to music by intrinsic and abiding charms. For it has been truly said that: "The one excellence which Boston has to boast of in its music, the one distinction for which we are recognized abroad (in Leipzig, for instance), is the high tone and exclusive purity of our programmes and our musical convictions." Better orchestras, better performance, of course, are not far to find.

Now these Symphony Concerts were originally, purposely, and with clearest conviction, founded upon this idea. It was so fully and unmistakably set forth in these columns in that same December, 1865, that we are prompted to recall here a few sentences, before we proceed to the main purpose of this article, which is to show how faithfully thus far the purpose and the pledge have been adhered to.

"The concerts are so well guaranteed as to have no motive for catering to any interests but the higher one of Art. They have no need to sink their character to make them pay.

"The determination is to make them as good in matter and in execution as the orchestral means of Boston (too limited indeed!) will allow. But if we cannot have a great orchestra, we can make out a very respectable one of fifty instruments or more; and one point we can at least secure, that of pure programmes, which one excellence, persisted in, will be a greater gain than we have yet had opportunity to realize except in small chamber-concert circles. By pure programmes is meant those into which nothing enters which is not in good taste, artistic, genial, such as outlives fashion; nothing which is coarse, hacknied, shallow, "sensational" in a poorer sense; nothing which does not harmonize by contrast or affinity with all the other pieces, and serve a general unity of design; nothing which tends to make a senseless medley of a concert, and to rudely turn us out from the charmed sphere in which a Beethoven has held us into a maudlin or a vulgar element. For us Americans, in our comparatively infantile and unsettled stage of musical taste, such purity of programme may reasonably exclude many things, especially new things, which would be perfectly safe for audiences in Germany. We need at least one set of concerts in which we may hear only composers of unquestioned excellence. When we are so well acquainted with these, that we can afford to be curious about novelties, and in hearing such know how to judge them from a real standard of the best, then we too, like the Europeans, may do well sometimes to vary the old story by seeking if there be any good in Wagner, Liszt, Raff and others of the so-called "Future." But now we had better be learning the taste of wholesomer and pleasanter and better food. When we really know the good wine, we shall not be deceived by the bad; but if we begin with promiscuous mingling of all kinds, we never shall know the good. It is therefore designed to keep these concerts, this one set of concerts, in this sense pure. There are plenty of opportunities to hear the other things, the "effect" pieces, the hacknied things, the questionable things, the things which set the hands and feet of the crowd going, but which bore the man of musical taste and feeling, in all the other concerts more or less. Will you not allow us to have one place, where a certain unity of tone and purpose reigns, sacred to the immortal and unquestioned master spirits of our Art, one place for culture? Must every experiment be vitiated and made neutral by the admission of incongruous elements? It will at least be something to hear a Symphony in right connections.

"But programmes may be pure, even in a more exclusive sense than is here proposed, and yet not be dull or heavy. Charming variety, freedom from ennui, and constant renewal of delight are perfectly possible in a concert where everything is artistic and by unquestioned masters. All depends on the selection, grouping, proportioning, contrasting of the materials."

In pursuance of this policy, the 48 Concerts have helped to make us acquainted (in many cases by repeated hearings) with 34 different Symphonies, 20 Concertos, and 33 Overtures. Thirteen of the Symphonies, ten of the Concertos, and sixteen of the Overtures were wholly or virtually new to a Boston audience. And the list of valuable new acquaintances has been further extended by selections from works in other forms, instrumental and vocal, by Bach, Durante, and others, as the following summary will show. As they were Symphony Concerts, it is natural to begin with

BEETHOVEN.

All the Nine Symphonies have been given, except the first: viz., No. 2, No. 6 (Pastoral), No. 9 (Choral), once each; No. 3 (Eroica), and Nos. 4, 5, and 8, three times each; No. 7, four times.

All the five Concertos for the Piano forte,—two of them entirely new to Boston, and two more as good as new when these concerts began. The one in E flat (No. 5) was played four times (by Mr. Dresel, Mr. Perabo twice, and Miss Mehlig); that in G (No. 4) three times (Mr. Leonhard); that in C minor (No. 3) twice (Mr. Lang, Miss Dutton). Mr. Lang also introduced No. 1 in C, and No. 2 in B flat.—Also the Triple Concerto, for Piano, Violin and 'Cello, has been twice performed (by Messrs. Lang, Eichberg and Fries, and by Messrs. Perabo, Listemann and Fries).—The Violin Concerto (first movement only) has been played by Carl Rosa, Camilla Urso, and Listemann.

Six Overtures: "Leonore," No. 3, (five times); "Coriolan" (3); "Egmont" (2); "Prometheus" (2); "Weihe des Hauses," op. 124 (2); op. 115 (2);—the last two new to Boston.

Three pieces from the "Ruins of Athens" (Der-vish Chorus, Turkish March, Duet for Soprano and Bass).—Scena and Aria from "Fidelio" (Miss Anna Whitten.)

HAYDN.

Eight Symphonies: three of them wholly new here, three others virtually new. One of these was given twice, another three times. The Haydn Symphonies were made a leading feature in the fourth season of the Concerts.

"Serenade" for string orchestra (arranged from a quartet).

MOZART.

The five Symphonies which are of frequent occurrence in concerts anywhere, viz., the "Jupiter" in C; that in G minor (3 times); D, No. 1 (2); the "French" so-called in D. The two in D were new here.

Concertos: For Piano in D (H. Daum); for two pianos (Lang and Parker), twice.

Overtures: "Magic Flute" (3); "Idomeneo," new.

Two Choruses; 8 Arias and Songs (five of them new to our concert rooms).

J. S. BACH.

Orchestral Works: Suite in D, twice; Organ Toc-cata in F, arranged for Orch. by Esser, three times.

Chaconne for Violin (2); four Arias, with Orches-tra, from Cantatas, and Passion Music (Mrs. C. A. BARRY).

All heard here for the first time.

CHERUBINI.

Four Overtures, all new here but the first: to the "Water-Carrier" (4 times); "Anacreon" (4); Me-dea (3); "Les Abencerrages."

GLUCK.

Overtures to "Iphigenia in Aulis," twice.

Arias: Alto, from "Orfeo," "Addio, O miel sos-piri" (Mrs. Barry); Tenor: "Nur ein Wunsch," from "Iphigenia in Tauris" (Mr. Kreissmann).

MENDELSSOHN.

Three Symphonies, once each: viz. the "Scotch" in A minor, the "Italian" in A, and the "Reformation" (new).

Three Concertos: For Piano, in G minor (Lang); in D minor (Dresel, Parker); for Violin (Rosa, Mme. Urso twice).

Six Overtures: "Midsummer Night's Dream" (2); "Melusina" (5); "Hebrides" (3); "Ruy Blas" (3); "Meeresstille," &c., (5); Trumpet Overture (new).

For Piano: Serenade and Allegro Gioioso (Parker); Rondo, op. 29, (Perabo)—both new.

Double Choruses for male voices: two from "Anti-gone," one from "Edipus."—Seven smaller choruses and Songs.

Music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," orch. and chorus, entire.

SPOHR.

Symphony: "Die Weihe der Töne."

Overture to "Jessonda."

W. S. BENNETT.

Overtures: "Naiads," twice; "Waldnymph" (new), twice.

WEBER.

Three Overtures: "Euryanthe" (4); "Oberon" (3); "Jubilee" (2).

For Piano, with Orch.: Concert-Stück (Miss Dut-ton, Miss Mehlig); Polonaise in E, transcribed by Liszt (Lang, twice, Miss Alide Topp).—Without Orch.: "Slumber Song," tr. by Liszt (Dresel).

SCHUMANN.

All the four Symphonies, besides the "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," which is mainly Symphonic. Three of these had not been heard here before. The Symphony in C was given three times, the others twice each.

The Piano Concerto three times (Dresel, Miss Topp, Leonhard), new.

Overtures: to "Genoveva" (5 times); Manfred." Both new.

For Piano: "Etudes Symphoniques" (Perabo); Canon (Dresel); "Abendlied," arr. by Joachim for Violin and Piano (Rosa and Dresel).

Choruses, mixed voices: "Gypsy Life"; Chor. of Foresters from "Pilgrimage of the Rose."—Various Songs, (Kreissmann, Osgood, Whitney, &c.)

LIANDRI.

Arias from his Italian Operas, as arranged by Robert Franz: two for Soprano (Miss Whitten); two for Contralto (Mrs. Barry).

SCHUBERT.

Symphonies: the great one in C, No. 9 (4 times); Unfinished, in B minor (twice).

Overture to "Fierabras," new, (four times).

Fantasia, op. 15, for piano, with orch. accomp. by Liszt (Lang), new.

Songs: "Suleika" (Mr. Osgood), &c. &c.

GABRIEL.

Symphonies: No. 1, in C minor, twice; No. 2, in E (new); No. 4, in B flat.

Overtures: "Echoes from Ossian" (3); "In the Highlands" (2). Both new here.

ROSSINI. "Tell" Overture.

MORCHELLES. "Les Contrastes," for 8 hands (Dresel, Perabo, Lang, Leonhard).

CHOPIN. Piano Concerto in E minor (Leonhard 3 times, Miss Topp); Concerto in F minor (Miss Mehlig).

HUMMEL. Septet (Perabo pianist), twice; Concerto in A minor (Parker). Both new here.

SPONTINI. Overture to "La Vestale." New.

WAGNER. Overture to "Tannhäuser."

LISZT. Transcriptions for P. F. with orchestra: from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" (Miss Topp), besides those already named—Piano Solo: "Rhapsodie Hongroise" (Miss Topp); Paganini's "Campanella" (Miss Mehlig). New.

HENSELT. P. F. Concerto in F minor, new, (Mr. C. Petersilea).

BURGMUELLER, NORBERT. P. F. Concerto in F-sharp minor, new, (Perabo).

JOACHIM. Hungarian Concerto for Violin (first movement), new, (Mr. B. Listemann).

FERD. DAVID. Two short Violin solos (Rosa). New.

TARTINI. Violin Sonata: "La Trille du Diable." (Listemann).

ERNST. "Elegie" for Violin (C. Urso).

VIEWTEMPS. Ballade et Polonaise (Urso).

REINECKE, C. Vorspiel from "King Manfred," Orch. (new).

DURANTE. Magnificat in D, for chorus of mixed voices (Mr. Kreissmann, Conductor). New here.

Such is the record for five years of steadily increasing success. The lesson for the future will be in order as the concerts for the coming season (the plan of which we have already in part foreshadowed) draw nigh.

DEATH OF WILLIAM KEYZER. As we go to press we learn that this venerable musician, familiar by sight only to the younger musical generation, but who once bore an important part in musical affairs in Boston, died in Roxbury last Tuesday evening. He was born in Amsterdam July 12, 1790, and died on the same day 1870, at the good old age of eighty. He was a man of good education and refinement, formerly a merchant in good circumstances. Passionately fond of music, he acquired much skill on the violin as an amateur, having been the pupil of Spohr, Rode, Lafont, and others, and well acquainted with most of the great violinists. Meeting with reverses he came to this country and soon settled down in Boston, where he succeeded Henry Schmidt as Conductor of the old Academy Concerts (1842?), when we were getting our first taste of the Beethoven Symphonies; indeed it was he who first brought out here the Seventh Symphony, which he admired beyond all others.

For many years he has lived infirm and retired, though for a long time he kept up his interest in musical matters, eager to hear every great thing like the Choral Symphony, and finding solace in his violin till within a year or two of his death. He used to be an excellent Quartet player. He was an honest, severe critic, (as our own pages, in the earlier volumes, will bear witness), strong in his prejudices, yet genial, kindly, full of anecdote, widely esteemed, and tenderly regarded by the few who have known him intimately. Peace and harmony be with him!

The Cincinnati Saengerfest.

The 17th Saengerfest was held in Cincinnati during the month of June. Although these Saenger-festivals are purely German in their origin; although the music is executed by Germans, and that which is performed is German music; although the German beverage abounded to the exclusion of the stronger and viler drinks of whiskey and brandy; although the hall was built in the German quarter of Cincinnati commonly called "Over the Rhine," being separated from the more American portion of the city by a canal, the festival had, nevertheless, somewhat of a national character. The interest manifested by the native born citizens of Cincinnati in the success of the festival, was astonishing and very gratifying to the Germans. The influence of such festivals upon the social and musical condition of a city or country is greater than appears at the first glance. There was a time when jealousies existed between the native born and the adopted citizens of this country. These feelings have, however, died away. The war has brought both classes closer together, and if there yet exists a doubt in the minds of some, that the foreigner can, or will not love this, his adopted country, we would simply point to the many battle fields, where the German and American are covered with the same sod. Of all foreigners, the German seems to have obtained the purest, and hence the most lasting influence upon the affairs of this country. America and Germany have closed ranks and clasped hands to stand together and support each other, not only in the love for free government, but also for the cultivation of the arts, and among them the oft neglected art of providing proper amusement. We can not sanction all the modes of enjoyment as cultivated by the Germans; neither do we believe that Americans have sufficient pleasures. The one dreams and plays perhaps too much; and surely the other does too little of it. Hence, we rejoice to see Germans joined by Americans, since both, as we hope, will be benefited.

The Germans and Americans of Cincinnati have in reality vied with each other to make this festival a success, and a success it was. The social, financial, as well as the editorial aid of the American portion of Cincinnati, has struck a chord in the heart of Germans which will long vibrate, and strengthen that concord and confidence which has so long existed.

While we visited the city, we asked ourselves the question, why is it that Americans alone do but seldom if ever, originate and execute such enterprises as the late festival? At a future day we may give expression to our thoughts on this subject. To day we must speak merely of the festival itself. The city has from Wednesday until Saturday thrown off its burden of cares and business, and appeared attired in a holiday garb. Many streets, especially those "over the Rhine," were beautifully decorated. The hall itself, a temporary structure, is built on a magnificent scale. It is 250 feet long, 110 feet wide, and 75 feet high. There is room for 1300 singers and 300 musicians, and sitting room for 10,000 persons. The interior, as well as the exterior is beautifully decorated with flags, festoons, pictures, mottoes, etc. While we were pleased with the unusual amount of harmony prevailing, we could not but feel sad to see the signs of Germany's political division. There was the black, red and gold flag side by side with the black, red and white. Oh Germany! when will the time come when we will know but one German government, and one German flag?

Wednesday was the great reception day. A procession, such as was never before witnessed in Cincinnati, passed through the streets. The singers were greeted with festoons and flowers; arches were built over the streets, and the houses were decorated with flags and mottoes. The evening service consisted of the performance of the Jubilee Overture, which sounded magnificent. This was followed by a Chorus with Orchestra, composed by Philip Walter, the leader of the festival. This chorus was performed by the entire Cincinnati societies, numbering 350 singers, while the orchestra comprised 156 instruments. Governor Hayes then addressed the singers, after which the banner of the Saengerbund was presented. After a chorus by Mendelssohn, Rabbi Lillenthal addressed the singers. The Hallelujah Chorus was then sung, and the Cincinnatians were addressed by a Mr. Müller, in behalf of the visiting societies. After singing Krentzer's "Der Tag des Herrn," the ceremonies for the evening were included. The building looked beautiful in the gas light, and its acoustic qualities were all that could be desired.

The programme for Thursday consisted of a Symphony by Abert, entitled "Columbus." We were somewhat surprised at this selection, but the audience proved to be well pleased. The piece is not as original as might have been anticipated, but shows great talent. The "Storm Myth" by Lachner then followed. An air from "Figaro" was sung by Mrs. Dexter, who won for herself laurels by her magnificent voice and correct singing. She was frequently applauded. Mr. Kopta then played the E minor Concerto by Mendelssohn, op. 64, for violin with orchestra. Mr. Kopta is an artist, every inch of him, but the size of the room as well as the confusion, proved fatal to his playing. He could be enjoyed by those nearest, those somewhat removed from the player could hear him, while many could merely see the motion of his arm. Why will musicians make such wrong calculations and lose sight of the relative size of room and strength of instrument? A chorus by Fisher was then performed which finished the first part. The second began with Mozart's overture to "Magic Flute." Mr. Charles Walter then played the Concerto in F, by Chopin, which was followed by the Shadow Dance, sung by Mrs. Dexter, who gave great satisfaction in everything she performed. "Salamis," by Gernsheim, closed the concert for Thursday, which would have been a success, but for the ill management of the ushers. Great confusion and constant noise in the rear part of the hall marred the pleasure of the evening, and even threatened the future success of the festival. Better arrangements were however made on the following evening. The following was the

PROGRAMME FOR FRIDAY.

10. "Wanderers Osterfeier"—C. Goetze—Arion des Westens, from St. Louis.

11. "Columbus Symphonie," Allegro—S. S. Abert—Orchestra.

Our readers will observe that the programme was entirely free from the clap-trap which was resorted to at the peace jubilee in Boston and lately again at New York. This should be a lesson to Messrs. Gilmore & Co., showing that humbug is not needed to obtain the attention of Americans.

Good order prevailed everywhere, and the whole city seemed determined to enjoy the days of festivities. Our opinion is still, that a more moderate chorus and orchestra will do better service, speaking from an art standpoint. Space will not permit us to criticize the programme and performance as we would wish. The whole passed off well. Chorus and orchestra were well handled by Mr. Walter, and the 17th Saengerfest passed into history to be followed by the 18th in St. Louis.

The pic-nic was, as far as weather and management are concerned, a perfect success. It grieves us however that Germans cannot select another day for their closing exercises. Aside from the religious views which can be taken of this their Sunday pic-nic, we cannot lose sight of the fact, that the law secures quiet and undisturbed rest to all. No matter whether American views are right or wrong, proper respect for their convictions, after liberally aiding in the festival, should have induced the Germans to hold their pic-nic on Saturday, as they were requested by many influential citizens. The religious convictions of the one class is as dear to them as the so-called liberalism can be to the other.

A Collection, which, like the title is extremely happy in its adaptation to the wants of Sabbath Schools. It will secure a warm welcome from lovers of this class of sacred music.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

The German's Fatherland.

FROM THE GERMAN OF ARNDT.

[The Advertiser prints the following, translated from the German Poet, Arndt, which will be read with interest at this time:]

Where is the German's fatherland?
Is't Prussia? Suabia? Is't the strand
Where grows the vine, where flows the Rhine?
Is't where the gull skims Baltic's brine?
No; yet more great and far more grand
Must be the German's fatherland!

How call they then the German's land?
Bavaria? Brunswick? Hast thou scanned
It where the Zayder Zee extends?
Where Styrian toil the iron bends?
No, brother, no; thou hast not spanned
The German's genuine fatherland!

Is then the German's fatherland
Westphalia? Pomerania? Stand
Where Zurich's waveless water sleeps;
Where Weser winds, where Danube sweeps:
Hast found it now? Not yet! Demand
Elsewhere the German's fatherland!

Then say, where lies the German's land?
How call they that unconquered land?
Is't where Tyrol's green mountains rise?
The Switzer's land I dearly prize,
By freedom's purest breezes fanned—
But no, 'tis not the German's land!

Where, therefore, lies the German's land?
Baptize that great, that ancient land!
'Tis surely Austria, proud and bold,
In wealth unmatched, in glory old?
Oh! none shall write her name on sand;
But she is not the German's land!

Say then where lies the German land?
Baptize that great, that ancient land!
Is't Alsace? or Lorraine—that gem
Wrenched from the imperial diadem
By wiles which princely treachery planned?
No; these are not the German's land!

Where, therefore, lies the German's land!
Name now, at last, that mighty land!
Where'er resounds the German tongue—
Where German hymns to God are sung—
There, gallant brother, take thy stand,
That is the German's fatherland!

That is his land, the land of lands,
Where vows bind less than clasped hands;
Where valor lights the flashing eye;
Where love and truth in deep hearts lie,
And zeal enkindles freedom's brand;
That is the German's fatherland!

That is the German's fatherland!
Great God! look down and bless that land!
And give her noble children souls
To cherish while existence rolls,
And love with heart, and aid with hand
That universal fatherland.

Haydn, Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, etc., as Contrapuntists.

FROM EULEST'S "Letters on Music."

At the close of my last letter, I probably offended a few orthodox devotees of Haydn. If it be difficult to express ourselves so clearly that our well-wishers will understand us, what precision, what transparency will suffice to make those understand who are determined not to do so? Nothing would pain me more than to be accused of injustice towards Haydn; for I feel a particular respect for him. But is it not possible, while defining the limit of a man's power, to recognize him to the fullest within that? For nothing is really limitless. If I insinuated that his intellect was not sufficiently versatile to resolve a problem that demanded a complication of very different experiences and capacities, I hope I shall not be taxed with having attempted to detract from his talent, or to undervalue his mind. In the domain of pure music, Haydn led his century onwards; he invented the symphony and the string quartet, in a measure. Let this console us; although in mixed music—if I may make use of these opposing terms (pure and mixed) in the sense they take in mathematics—he did not produce equally reformatory effects.

Perhaps this is the proper place in which to consider Haydn's contrapuntal style in opposition to that of others. Lay three contrapuntal works by Haydn, Bach, and Beethoven before you. Although that by Bach may at first appear learned, it is self-existent throughout. So inborn was the nature of counterpoint to this man, so familiar to him were the secrets of this art of antithesis, that he was able to give to all the sorrows, all the confidence of his great ecclesiastical soul, expression in it. I might call his style, in opposition to the essentially Catholic one of Palestrina, essentially Protestant; while the great Italian counterpoints his cantus firmus with dogmatic repose, Bach's emotions ever become freer and more universal. He only thinks of general effect: and it troubles him not if he is sometimes rough, or overturns an old tradition. Theory, it is I! (La théorie c'est moi!)

Beethoven counterpoints in opposition to all foresight; unexpectedly, genially, he strikes like the lightning, and his heavenly spark never fails to kindle. Whoever has studied this man observantly must have remarked how restlessly his powerful nature labored to unite his own artistic differences. Thus it often seems as if he had the possibility of a collision in view, to avoid which he sets all his powers in motion. In counterpoint he opposes a great question to an impassioned, audacious answer, a bold attempt at reconciliation; or, as in the first theme of the Eroica Symphony, he commences with the apparently undeniable and irrevocable, painfully contests the same in a continually increasing gradation, and then, after many trials, the subject is finally declared indubitable. This is the dramatic style of counterpoint, in which contradiction is personified. We may call Haydn's style lyric. This man's counterpoint does not impose on us with the power of Bach, or strike us with the geniality of Beethoven; but it enchants us by its purity. You may inspect it through the finest magnifying glass, but you will not be able to detect the slightest incongruity in it. Here we find an analysis of a harmless, cheerful, lovely marriage of thought, and analyzed on each side: but here is no doubt, no trial; in a certain sense it is an embodiment of social joy. And on this account its effect is purely lyrical.

And Mozart? He wrote in the traditional contrapuntal style,—one that was in no way peculiar to him. It was out of humorous gratitude towards the great Italian masters that he laid the primeval cantus firmus at the bottom of the finale to his Jupiter Symphony, in order to display, through it, the historical development of counterpoint.

Allow me to add a few words here about the fugue. Or do you tremble, like the sorcerer's pupil? Is it not a shameful abuse of your curiosity, after so many dry exhortations, to lead you deeper and deeper into our secrets, and even to open the sanctuary of our temple to you, before the door of which a threatening cherub stands, to frighten dilettantism away? But confide in my courtesy. I will not take you into the laboratory, for you may be quite indifferent in regard to the manufacture of a fugue; but it cannot be a matter of indifference to you to become acquainted with this form of art, and gain an insight into it.

Architecture has been termed frozen music. Well, if you know what the pointed Gothic arch is, you know what a fugue is; for the pointed arch is a frozen fugue. In a contrapuntal work, fugues are like the final pointed completion of these arches in our Gothic cathedrals. Wherever a noble, a believing mood of mind strives upwards to the highest, wherever a last majestic result must be brought forward for universal recognition, the fugue becomes the most natural means of expression: for no art-form embraces such consciousness within itself: not one is so well capable of preaching the truth to be told, in many tongues at once. For the peculiar characteristic of this form lies in the fact that several voices have united to say the same on different intervals. Commencing according to prescribed laws, gradually growing more and more free, on every side they fall into the conversation; ever we find the same purport, sometimes diminished, sometimes magnified, again inverted, until we are filled with admiration for such a many-voiced and many-sided treatment of one thing. The fugue naturally takes its place in great vocal and instrumental works, wherever a feeling of noble completion is to be expressed; but this tone of universality must arise as naturally out of the subject as does the capital complete the pillar.

But the old composers wrote detached fugues? Certainly: and yet Bach felt the necessity of prefixing something to his clavier and organ fugues, to increase their effect; and thus he created his preludes, in which he laid down the general idea, out of which the fugue, the particular idea, grew. We should, however, cease to write such fugues. The old composers are unapproachable in this art; and we should do well to consider the art of fugue as historically completed, in the same way as do our painters consider the Madonna, when they conclude not to paint Madonnas any longer. Look at Mendelssohn's prelude and fugue! An intelligent attempt has been made to give a modern meaning to these frozen forms: how clear, how learned was the labor! But I prefer, ten times, to play any fugue at random from the "Well-tempered Clavier." Here I feel the natural, the inborn: there, only the acquired. The modern spirit is of so boundless, so desiring, so liberty-loving a nature and the fugue is so limited, so undesiring, so subject to the law! But Klengel's canons? I must confess to you that this dexterity awakens more astonishment than admiration within me. What assistance do I find in the gymnastics of thought, that only make me more learned, not more wise? Can this be a work of art, which only employs my intellect, and not my heart? Klengel's wit is often genial, especially in the invention of the voices: but musical wit is only a mere succedaneum. I shall never forget how I felt, when, after enjoying a dozen of these canons, I heard a song of Franz Schubert's: the breath of forest-flowers after a two-hours' lecture on abstruse sciences, the face and voice of the beloved one after a morning sermon.

Now let us touch upon the free-fugued style. Here we are not bound by laws, or restrained by limits; for we break the rules whenever our power of construction threatens to fail us. When Beethoven desires to concentrate his thoughts, he clothes them in the armor of fugue; and thus he acquires something metallic, monumental. But what a sense of glorious freedom seizes us, when the fire of his passion bursts this coat of mail asunder, and we seem to inhale, with him, deep draughts of fresh air! Much of the colossal effect of his symphonies must be ascribed to the contrast between limitation and freedom; between the fugued and the free style. This is the path on which we must proceed farther. We will abandon the pure art of fugue to the academists, the lords of debt and credit, who have neither wish nor courage to be free: for what is freedom to those who were born in a cage? Let them flutter patiently on: they might break their necks outside, for their pinions are far too tender.

Margaret Fuller.

BY C. P. CRANCH.

While others stood aloof and smiled in scorn
Of one to new and noble effort born;
Or, from tame rounds of fashion and of wealth,
Turned, glancing back by stealth,
And wondered,—then but slowly, faintly praised
The exuberant soul that dared to flash and soar
Beyond the petty bounds
Of their trim garden grounds,—
She with wise intuition raised
Her image of ideal womanhood,
The incarnate True and Fair and Good,
Set in a light but seldom seen before,
While, with the early watchers in the dawn
Of intellectual faith, her hopeful eyes,
Patiently waiting, from the crowd withdrawn,
She saw a newer morning rise,
And flame from cloud to cloud, and climb
Across the dreary tracts of time.
The garnered wisdom of the past she drew
Into her life, as flowers the sun and dew;
Yet valued all her varied lore
But as the avenue and door
That opened to the Primal Beam,
And sense of Truth supreme.
Her sweet persuasive voice we still can hear,
Ruling her charmed circle like a queen;
While wit and fancy sparkled ever clear
Her graver moods between.
The pure perennial heat
Of youth's ideal love forever glowed
Through all her thoughts and words, and overflowed
The listeners round her seat.
So, like some fine-strung golden harp,
Turned by many a twist and warp
Of discipline and patient toil,
And oft disheartening recoil,— Attuned to highest and to humblest use,—
All her large heroic nature
Grew to its harmonious stature,
Nor any allotted service did refuse;
While those around her but half understood
How wise she was, how good,
How nobly self denying, as she tasked Heart, mind, and strength for truth, nor nobler office asked.

The Italian Operas in London.—Covent Garden.

(From the "Saturday Review," June 18).

Once again we are blessed with two establishments for the representation of opera in the Italian language. We say "of opera in the Italian language," because such an institution as a bond fide Italian opera, at which music and performers are exclusively Italian, is a thing of the past—gone, in all probability, never to return. Whether this be for good or for evil, we are hardly prepared to say; but with regard to the fact there cannot be a doubt. Even when the works of an illustrious Italian musician, Cherubini for example, are called upon to vary and enrich the repertory, what he composed for the Italian stage is never thought of, but what he composed for the French stage, to French libretti, is resorted to as a matter of course. A noticeable instance has been offered in Medea, and another is now promised in Les Deux Journées. About this question there is a good deal to say on both sides; but the present is not the time to discuss it. We have to treat of Italian opera under such conditions as are immediately vouchsafed to us.

The co-existence of two houses, whatever risk it may entail upon speculators, is an advantage to the public. Last season, when Messrs. Gye and Mapleson joined fortunes, the amount of enterprise was reduced to a minimum. The services of Sir Michael Costa, Signor Mario, Mlle. Pauline Lucca, and others were dispensed with; Mme. Adelina Patti appeared, evening after evening, in the same familiar parts; while Mlle. Christine Nilsson was heard in one new opera—an opera which, but for a single scene, would have stood little chance of permanent acceptance. In fact, so barren a season, with such resources at command, is unparalleled. The "condition," however can hardly be said even now to have been broken up, Messrs. Gye and Mapleson being still the duumvirate at Covent Garden. But among the artists who formed the Maplesonian contingent in 1869, when the much talked of alliance was ratified, one only of considerable importance belongs to the Covent Garden troop. We naturally refer to Mlle. Tietjens. Mlle. Scalchi is a contralto of more than average ability, and Mlle. Bauermeister a fair comprimaria. These named, however, are all named, excepting certain members of the orchestra and chorus (including Mr. Carodus, leading violin) who went over to Covent Garden when Signor Arditì consented to share the office of conductor with Signor Li Calsi.

Notwithstanding the loss of several distinguished artists engaged to them last year, the directors of the Royal Italian Opera have still a generally efficient company. To encounter the formidable opposition at Drury Lane no little energy was demanded. The result is that we have got back Mme. Pauline Lucca and Signor Mario—a gain to frequenters of the theatre not to be lightly estimated. Then, as a matter of course, Mme. Adelina Patti occupies the place which, for eight or nine years, she has held undisputed, as "L'étoile des étoiles" among prime donne—the legitimate successor of Mme. Angiolina Bonio, with a dramatic genius to which that accomplished vocalist could by no means pretend. Mlle. Vanzini, too, the American—"comprimaria," at least, by right of natural gifts and ability, but prima donna, on occasion, when the "prime donne assoluta" take repose—is again in the company, together with Mme. Dell'Aneso and Mlle. Locatelli, who have for some years filled subordinate parts at the Covent Garden Opera. In the men's department, besides Signor Mario, already named, we have had—to complete the list of tenors—the German Dr. Gunz, who it may be remembered "created" Jason, in Medea, when Cherubini's tragic masterpiece was first produced, for Mlle. Tietjens, at Her Majesty's Theatre; Herr Wachtel, another German, who, four years ago (his second trial in London), made such an impression that few ever dreamed of his adventuring among us again; Signor Naudin, the original Vasco di Gama of the Africaine, perhaps his chief distinction, though assuredly not his only one, if industry and versatility count for anything; and Signor Marino, the Hidalgo, very serviceable in his way, as we have been occasionally reminded this season. Of baritones and basses Messrs. Gye and Mapleson have enough and to spare, despite the loss of Mr. Santley, Signor Poli, &c., now attached to Drury Lane. But on the whole it must be admitted that, in their instance, quality hardly mates with quantity. Of Signor Graziani, with his fine though limited voice, and eager ambition to figure as an actor, we need say nothing; Signor Cotogni is a baritone of all trades—from Hamlet to Figaro; M. Petit is the Mephistophiles of M. Gounod's Faust, by right of his having been the original when that singularly over-estimated opera was produced at the Paris Theatre Lyrique; Signor Baggiolo, who has a voice which atones in some measure for lack of dramatic talent and certain deficiencies as a singer, is chief bass; and Signor Capponi, a Stentor in his way, is "basso secondo." With these are associated Signor Tagliafico, now nearly voiceless, yet more than ever intelligent, and as representative of small "character-parts," sui generis, unique; Signori Fallar, Cassaboni, Caravoglia, and Rossi, subordinates; and, for buffo assoluto, Signor Ciampi, whose continued tenure of a place filled of old by such artists as Lablache and Ronconi, seeing that Signor Ciampi is not possessed of a single qualification for it, is one of the most significant existing indications of the decadence of Italian opera. The foregoing, with the unimportant exception of Signor Caravoglia, all belonged to the old Covent Garden company. But, not content with these, Messrs. Gye and Mapleson prudently sought out reinforcements; and some singers unknown to London were engaged. We have had a new seconda donna—Mlle. Olma; a new contralto—Mlle. Cari; a new tenor—Signor Vizzani; a new comprimaria—Miss Maddigan; and a new prima donna assoluta—Mlle. Mathilde Sessi. The seconda donna is so completely a novice that the mere fact of bringing her forward at such a theatre as the Royal Italian Opera shows an indifference to public appreciation almost without example. The contralto, after making a very good impression as Maffeo Orsini, in Lucrezia Borgia, was discarded and allowed to go over to the other theatre. The tenor has, up to this time, only appeared in one part (Manrico, in Il Trovatore), his performance giving rise to conflicting opinions. The soprano (Mlle. Sessi), although at present little of an actress and hardly a singer of the first class, has done valuable service.

But to pass from the stage to the orchestra: how well the new system of employing two conductors has answered may be gathered from the fact that, with two companies as well as two conductors, much less was done last year than previously, when one conductor held supreme authority. Nevertheless, although Signor Arditì has joined the rival establishment at Drury Lane, and Signor Li Calsi, for reasons unexplained, has seceded, we have once more two conductors at the Royal Italian Opera. One of them, Signor Vianesi, who directs the music at the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburg, is, if we may be allowed to judge from a short experience, expert and ready at his vocation; of the other, Signor Bevilacqua, as much cannot with truth be affirmed. Thus, what the able conductor may succeed in doing the less able conductor is as likely as possible to undo; and Signor Bevilacqua gives promise of being as perpetual a drawback to Signor Vianesi as Signor Li Calsi was, last year, to Signor Arditì. We have no wish to reconsider the differences which led to Sir Michael Costa's retiring from the post he used to occupy with such distinction; but we have little hesitation in saying that, were the eminent ex-conductor to attend a performance under Signor Bevilacqua, he would find it difficult to recognize his old and well-tried orchestra—once the most famous in Europe. On the other hand the chorus at the Royal Italian Opera is excellent—thanks to the foreign reinforcements brought to it by Mr. Mapleson. And yet there are not, at least, as far as our information goes, two chorus-masters, any more than there are two stage-managers, two ballet-masters, or, to adopt the conventional phrase, two "principal scenic artists;" though why not these—why not, in short, to exhaust the theory suggested by two orchestral conductors (and two directors), a double staff altogether, to emulate the rival Harlequins, Columbines, Clowns and Pantaloons in a Drury Lane pantomime—is, under the circumstances, difficult to understand.

Having set forth at length and in detail the resources, vocal and instrumental, at disposal of Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, we have now to consider what has actually been done since the opening of the theatre. In the way of novelties there has been nothing to speak of. True, only two were announced in the prospectus—an opera, entitled Esmeralda, by Signor Campana, whose maiden effort at Her Majesty's Theatre (in 1860), produced for Mlle. Piccolomini, hardly justified the belief that he would again be put forth at one of our Italian lyric theatres as a champion of modern art, and Signor Verdi's often advertised Macbeth. The repertory of the Royal Italian Opera is, however, very extensive, consisting, according to official assurance, of not less than forty-nine works, and within a period little exceeding two months the directors have been able to produce three-and-twenty of them in a more or less complete and satisfactory manner. Thus, one after another, they came out:—Lucia di Lammermoor, the Huguenots, Guillaume Tell, Fidelio, Lucrezia Borgia, La Figlia del Reggimento, Il Flauto Magico, La Traviata, Medea (Cherubini's, of course), Musaniello (second and third acts only), Don Pasquale, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Don Giovanni, Faust e Margherita, the Sonnambula, the Favorita, Martha, Hamlet, the Africaine, Le Nozze di Figaro, Dinorah, the Trovatore, and Fra Diavolo. How these familiar works were cast, and how performed, may be gathered from the list of artists set forth in the preamble. We shall not be expected to go over old ground; and a word or two about some of the singers, more especially about Mlle. Sessi, who, as a stranger, puts forth the highest pretensions, will suffice.

The opera which, to employ the conventional term, "inaugurated" the season was a well worn one; but the chief character being allotted to a young soprano unknown to the English public, Lucia di Lammermoor was heard under conditions which now-a-days can recommend it. How badly off must we be for dramatic composers when such a piece as this of Donizetti's—not to speak of half a dozen other pieces of like calibre—can hold the stage of Europe as it were in perpetuity! And yet Lucia in the shape of a prepossessing newcomer, with voice and artistic acquirements enabling her to go creditably through the part, must always, until better things are at hand, be attractive.

Mlle. Mathilde Sessi, if she does not warrant the enthusiastic laudation of French critics, boasts undeniable qualifications. Much has been said and written about her profusion of fair hair, the charm of which, unlike that of Horace's Pyrrha, is not so much in the binding up as in the letting loose; but she has other things besides an abundant natural head-dress to recommend her. Her voice is of agreeable quality, especially good in the upper tones, and flexible enough to cope with the most elaborate passages of the Italian school. The music of Donizetti seems to come to her quite naturally. Her most effective display, vocally considered, is that of Lucia's madness, her least effective, perhaps, that of the signing of the contract. Without going into further details, we may add that the impression created by Mlle. Sessi has been generally favorable. She does not shine as an actress; nor are her personal endowments such as to lend poetical illusion to the scene. That she is small in stature, however, says nothing—Mme. Patti and Mlle. Lucca being equally under the middle size; but there is a want of mobility in her features, which under all circumstances wear a stereotyped expression. Though by no means over-well supported by her associates, Mlle. Sessi on the night of her first appearance was received with every token of encouragement.

The few words of criticism we have given to her Lucia may apply with equal fairness to the various parts she has since essayed, ample as they prove her title to consideration. It has been asserted that Mlle. Sessi shines more in comic than in serious opera. We confess our inability to see the distinction. She has no histrionic genius; and, were it not that neither actually represents anything, her comedy might be tragedy and her tragedy might be comedy. As Maria in La Figlia del Reggimento, or as Norina in Don Pasquale, her physiognomy is as perversely immobile and her gestures are as perversely conventional as in Lucia, Astraffamante, or Ophelia. Yet about Mlle. Sessi's versatility there cannot possibly be a question. Every part seems to come ready to her hands. She has not only successfully essayed the characters we have enumerated, but has added to them the lachrymose Violetta of Verdi's Traviata, and the lively Susanna in Mozart's Nozze di Figaro—furthermore, on a recent occasion, appearing substitute for Mme. Adelina Patti, as Zerlina, in Don Giovanni, and issuing from the ordeal with untarnished laurels. That Mlle. Sessi will ever be an actress is hard to believe; dramatic instinct seems to be denied her; but that she has the means of becoming, with perseverance, a singer of almost, if not absolutely, the first class, we are convinced. It has been within the province of few to execute the difficult bravura music of the "Queen of Night," in Mozart's Flauto Magico, and that of the operas of the modern Italian school with equal facility. Such, nevertheless, is Mlle. Sessi; and as such it behoves amateurs to watch with interest her future career.

Years bring no improvement to Herr Wachtel, who is now just what he was on the occasion of his first visit to England (in June, 1862), when, with Mlle. Adelina Patti, he appeared in Lucia as Edgar—vox et preterea nihil. In his best days Herr Wachtel could not sing; his pronunciation of the Italian language was unpardonable; and an occasionally vacant stare—as though he was (to quote the late Mr. Dickens) "looking intensely nowhere"—made up the sum total of his shifts and resources as an actor. Herr Wachtel's sudden retreat, on account of some supposed misunderstanding with Mme. Patti, to which the daily papers have given a sort of vague publicity, cannot be looked upon as a misfortune for the Directors of the Royal Italian Opera. In Guillaume Tell, in the Huguenots, and above all in Don Giovanni (as Don Ottavio), he had declared himself no less incompetent than in Lucia di Lamermoor.

Dr. Gunz, who has also left us, simply because his engagement was for a short period, belongs to a different school. His voice is harsh and ungrateful, but he is an artist, an artist of intelligence, which his performances of Jason (Medea) and Tamino (Il Flauto Magico) are enough to prove. Signor Mario's return has been hailed with unanimous satisfaction; for though his voice is now but a wreck of what it used to be, when he does (which is not seldom) sing a phrase in his old manner, it is a phrase sung as no other than Signor Mario can sing it; while, as an actor, at this moment he remains facile princeps, distancing all competitors—of which one scene in the Favorita, not to name his striking impersonation of Raoul in the Huguenots, must convince impartial judges. It is cruelty to so brilliant a singer and consummate an actress as Mme. Patti to bring her forward, evening after evening, with parts in which we have known and admired her almost from the outset of her career—Rosina, Amina, Zerlina (Don Giovanni), and so forth. Her almost only chance of new distinction this season has been afforded by Meybeer's Dinorah, in her assumption of the demented heroine of which, Mlle. Irma di Murska excepted, she is unrivalled. To Mlle. Patti rather than to Mlle. Sessi—who, by the way, has been taking from her many of her best characters, Lucia, Norina (Don Pasquale), and Maria (La Figlia del Reggimento) among the rest—should have been assigned the part of Ophelia, as to the only singer who had a chance of equalling, if not, indeed, of surpassing, the remarkable impersonation of Mlle. Christine Nilsson, and thus of keeping upon the stage of Covent Garden (it cannot be given at Drury Lane, being the exclusive property of the rival theatre) the grave and elaborate opera of M. Ambroise Thomas.

Mlle. Pauline Lucca has returned with all those provoking inequalities, as singer and actress, which, while themselves exercising a certain indescribable fascination, prevent her from becoming what her great and natural endowments ought to make her. That Mlle. Lucca is a genius in her way, we are ready to admit; but that she can ever be a finished artist appears to us scarcely possible. Even her best characters—Valentine, in the Huguenots, and Selika, in the Africaine of Meyerbeer—want something more to be unconditionally accepted as exemplification of legitimate art; her Zerlina in Fra Diavolo is a sprightly piece of acting and no more; her Leonora, in the Favorita, has one impressive scene (the last); her Margaret, in Faust, is as full of blemishes as of beauties; her Cherubino, in the Nozze di Figaro, is a lively caricature at the best, showing, moreover, incapability to enter into the spirit of Mozart's music, music as Orphean as it is unaffected, music utterly spoiled by such torturing of the time and overstrained expression as Mlle. Lucca exhibits—for instance, in "Voi che sapete," which is nothing if not flowing. It is a pity that so much of good should find so much to counteract it, as in the talent of this lady, who possesses a soprano voice almost unparalleled in splendor; and if she could make herself mistress of the Italian language, might become an ornament to the Italian lyric boards.

Mlle. Tietjens is now what Mlle. Tietjens has been for some time—in certain respects the finest dramatic singer on the stage. It is no little to say of her that, when she retires, such operas as Fidelio and Medea must inevitably be laid upon the shelf. That this unquestionable great artist should have made herself so common by singing in and out of season is much to be regretted; and if she forms no longer the popular attraction she used to be it can only be thus explained. Mlle. Tietjens, however, has earned new honors recently by consenting to play the part of Gertrude in Hamlet—one undeniably of the first order. Last year, it is true, the Ophelia was Mlle. Nilsson; this year it is Mlle. Sessi; but Mlle. Tietjens, in her own department, that of high tragedy, had as little to fear from Mlle. Nilsson as she had to fear from Mlle. Sessi. We have no wish to probe the question farther. Enough that Mlle. Tietjens now represents the Queen, and represents it so admirably that she not only creates the strongest impression, but, in one scene (the great scene between Hamlet and his Mother), almost, by force of example, makes an actor of Signor Corogni—the Hamlet of the period.

On Tuesday night (since the foregoing observations were in type) Messrs. Gye and Mapleson's principal novelty for the season—the opera of Esmeralda—was produced. An article might with fairness be exclusively devoted to such an event; but in this instance we should have been compelled to manufacture the article out of nothing. Esmeralda is unquestionably the worst Italian opera ever produced in London since Alcina, in 1860; and as the composer of Alcina is also the composer of Esmeralda, Signor Campana may, at least, be credited with consistency. What he was ten years earlier he is precisely now. He has neither receded nor advanced. We sympathize with Signor Cimino, an Italian author of some literary distinction, who has constructed, on the whole, a tolerably good book out of M. Victor Hugo's well-known romance—though inevitably dispensing with Quasimodo, next to Esmeralda the most interesting personage.

We sympathize still more with Mme. Adelina Patti, who makes such an ideal character of the heroine as to excite regret that she has not been supplied with music as captivating as that to which Carlotta Gristi, still remembered as the pearl of "dances," had to mime and dance, a quarter of a century ago, at Her Majesty's Theatre, when, under the memorable direction of Mr. Lumley, M. Perrot brought out his famous ballet. It is as well to state here that the reported success of Esmeralda at St. Petersburg is a delusion. It was given three times only—with Mme. Volpini (not Mme. Patti) as the heroine. Mme. Volpini is an extremely clever artist; but we doubt if she could have thrown half the spirit into the character, or invested it with half the poetical charm, which Mme. Patti exhibits. Twice the genius of Mme. Patti, however, would fail to secure an abiding success for music that is beneath criticism; and such is the music of Signor Campana—music as destitute of originality as it is destitute of grammar. If a man has something to say, and yet cannot say it in polished language, we forgive him, because what he says, however linguistically ill-expressed, may be something we have not heard before; but if a man has nothing to say, and speaks at once both volubly and ungrammatically, we set him down as an unwelcome intruder.

It would serve no purpose whatever to attempt to bolster up Signor Campana's opera with this and that reservation. It is irredeemably bad, and should never have been accepted at such a theatre as the Royal Italian Opera. If it be true that Mme. Patti was the cause of its being given, we cannot compliment her on her taste; and for that reason we are less disposed to regret the inutility of the exertions she uses to captivate her audience. What the applause, "encores," and "recalls" of "first nights," signify no one knows better than Mme. Patti herself. They meant less than usual on the occasion under notice. Mlle. Scalchi who plays Estella, Emerald's mother (made disagreeably prominent by Signor Cimino the librettist), Signor Naudin who sings the music, such as it is, allotted to Cyprian Phœbus wonderfully well, and Signor Graziani, whose Claude Frolo is about as mysterious as his Rigoletto or his Nelusko, are burdened with less responsibility, but claim consideration, inasmuch as they do all in their power to induce people to believe that they are in earnest.

We must credit the Covent Garden directors with the fact that the expenditure they have bestowed on the "getting up" of Esmeralda might be represented by the smallest imaginable amount. They have indeed done nothing whatever for it in the way of "mise en-scène;" and, seriously we cannot blame them. Our only complaint is that, under any circumstances, they should have thought it expedient to bring out such a work. Several operas by Verdi are unknown to England; or, if Verdi is looked upon as stale, there is his successor (and imitator) Signor Petrella, of whose music not a note is familiar here; or, again, if enough has been heard of Verdi and his school, and something fresh is indispensable, there are composers among us able to write twenty times better than Signor Campana. Such an opera as Esmeralda can only be ridiculed by musicians and connoisseurs; while the chance of its winning favor with the general public is to the last degree remote.

Awaiting the next novelty—Verdi's Macbeth—we have no more to say at present about the Royal Italian Opera, which, certain deficiencies allowed for, still holds its own and may still proudly claim to be regarded as one of the first lyric theatres in Europe. Our next notice will be devoted to some account of what has been done, up to this time, at the rival establishment at Drury Lane Theatre.

Mignon at Drury Lane.

(From the "Morning Post," July 7th.)

The performance last night of the opera of Mignon, composed by Ambroise Thomas, was the most brilliant event of the season, and as great a success as it is possible to desire. The part of Mignon is one that displays in an extraordinary and unexpected degree, not only all the known qualities of Mlle. Nilsson as an actress and singer, but serves to develop a power hitherto only imagined, but now completely realized, of expressing in an intensified degree all the higher and unusual characteristics of a tragic genius of rare rank. In nearly every part in which she appeared this season some individual qualities have been discovered and displayed by her, so that each performance has been to a certain extent an improvement upon a previous one, and has placed Mlle. Nilsson, as an artist, upon the most elevated position it is possible for her to occupy, and she has strengthened that position by her thorough originality. In many of the characters played by her, her wonderful voice and style alone affect her hearers; but in Mignon the voice, singing, acting, appearance, and depth of pathos reach straight to the hearts of all. The greatest homage was paid to her last night by the audience, not always by applause, but in many instances by a silence that was almost breathless. She was recalled, with the other artists associated with her, at the end of each act, and at the conclusion she appeared twice; the second time almost dragging the composer upon the stage to share the plaudits with her, which honor he seemed to take unwillingly, as though he owed the successful reception of his work to the genius of the prima donna, and was unwilling to lessen the obligation he owed her. But, great as Mlle. Nilsson's success was, there were other artists whose exertions were as proportionately successful. Madame Volpini, as Filiana, a confirmed coquette, acted and sung most splendidly; and Madame Trebelli-Bettini, as Frederico, made a small part as completely interesting as possible. In the ballet or rather several ballets, which form no unimportant portion of the opera, Mlle. Fioretti danced in a manner which gave great liveliness to the scene; and as Giarno, the chief of the strolling performers, Signor Ragner deserves a word of commendation for his effective acting and singing in a difficult part. Signor Gassier's Lactes was an excellent performance; his appearance in the costume of an ancient Greek was the summit of burlesque dressing. The singing of Signor Bettini was very pleasing and much more free and acceptable than his acting, which was stiff and unmeaning. The character which next to that of Mignon was most perfectly studied and satisfactorily rendered was M. Faure's Luthario. Graceful and picturesque in his attitudes, effective and expressive in facial expression, the part was, like nearly everything that M. Faure undertakes, finished, correct, and artistic.

The chorus was very good, and the band, directed by Signor Arliti, performed their portion of the work in the most perfect style. The opera has been well put on the stage, and with some attention to correctness of costume. It may be, however, open to doubt whether the zebra pattern parasols were as generally known in the last century, in which time the action is supposed to take place, as their liberal use in the opera would lead the audience to suppose. The scenic effects are in general excellent, and the whole opera is placed upon the stage in a creditable manner.

In the scoring of the music M. Thomas repeats many of the effects already familiar in his Huilet, but as a rule the instrumentation is excellent and clever. There are many lively and taking melodies in the work, which will make it a perfect treasure to the "arrangers" of waltzes, galops, and other dance tunes. The concerted music is exceedingly weak, but many of the songs are beautifully constructed. M. Thomas is as fashionably original as most modern composers, and has succeeded in producing an opera which will always be pleasing when performed as it was last night. The story or plot has been considerably varied from Goethe's Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, one character being mixed with another in a most wonderful order, or disorder. It is enough to say that whether the idea be taken as Goethe's or as the free translation of Messrs. Carré and Barbier, it makes a plot of unusual power and interest, and has inspired M. Thomas to write music in the execution of which last night a combination of genius was displayed which makes the first performance of Mignon a most unusual event to chronicle.

Michael Kelly.

This well-known singer and composer was born at Dublin, 1762, and died in London, 1826. His father was an eminent wine merchant in Dublin, and for several years master of the ceremonies at the castle. At a very early period young Kelly displayed a passion for music; and as his father was enabled to procure the best masters for him, before he had reached his eleventh year he could perform some of the most difficult sonatas then in fashion on the pianoforte. Rauzzini, when engaged at the Rotunda in Dublin, gave him some lessons in singing, and persuaded his father to send him to Naples, as the only place where his musical propensity would receive proper cultivation. At the age of sixteen he was accordingly sent there, with strong recommendations from several persons of consequence in Ireland to Sir William Hamilton, the then British Minister at the Court of Naples. Sir William took him under his fostering care, and he was placed in the Conservatorio la Madonna della Loretto, where for some time he received instructions from the celebrated Pineroli. Sir William Hamilton also did Kelly the honor of introducing him to the King and Queen of Naples, who particularly noticed the young Irishman. Having had the good fortune to meet Aprilli, the first singing master of his day, that great artist being then under an engagement to visit Palermo, offered to take Kelly with him, and to give him gratuitous instruction while there. This proposal was, of course, gratefully accepted, and he received Aprilli's valuable tuition until the end of his engagement at the theatre. The Neapolitan's kindness, however, did not terminate there, for he sent Kelly to Leghorn with the strong recommendation of being his favorite pupil. From Leghorn young Kelly was engaged at the Teatro Nuovo, at Florence, as first tenor singer. He then visited Venice and several of the principal theatres in Italy, in which he performed with distinguished success. He was next engaged at the Court of Vienna, where he was much noticed by the Emperor Joseph II. He had likewise the good fortune to become acquainted with Mozart, and was one of the original performers in his "Nozze di Figaro." Having obtained a year's leave of absence from the Emperor for the purpose of visiting his father (at the end of which time he was to go back to Vienna, where he was in such favor that he might have ended his days happily), he returned to England by the same opportunity as Signora Siorace. In April, 1787, Kelly made his first appearance at Drury Lane Theatre in the character of Lionel, in the opera of "Lionel and Clarissa." Here he remained as first singer until he retired from the stage. He was, besides, for several years principal tenor singer at the Italian Opera, where he was the stage manager. The death of his friend Stephen Storace, in the year 1797, first induced Kelly to become a composer, since which time he composed or selected music for upwards of sixty pieces for the different theatres. Among these we may enumerate as among the most popular, the following: Castle Spectre, 1797; Blue Beard, 1798; Of Age To-morrow, 1800; Love Laughs at Locksmiths, 1804; Deaf and Dumb, 1804; Youth, Love, and Folly, 1805; Forty Thieves, 1806; Adrian and Orilla, 1806; Wood Demon, 1807; Foundling of the Forest, 1809; Nourjahad, 1813, etc. It has been truly observed that a joke of Sheridan's, which has been quoted ever since, has unduly depreciated Kelly's services to the music of the stage. When he embarked in trade as a wine merchant, Sheridan proposed that the inscription above his door should be, "Michael Kelly, composer of wine and importer of music." Kelly, though a shallow musician, had a highly cultivated taste. His own airs, though slight, are always elegant; and his knowledge of the Italian and German schools, not very general among the English musicians of his day, enabled him to enrich his pieces with many gems of foreign art. The popularity, therefore, of Kelly's numerous pieces had a very favorable influence on the taste of the public. As a singer his powers were by no means great, but his intelligence, experience, and knowledge of the stage rendered him very useful.—London Chir.

Dickens's Home at Gad's Hill.

The spot is one of the loveliest in Kent, and must always be remembered as the last residence of Charles Dickens. He used to declare his firm belief that Shakespeare was specially fond of Kent, and that the poet chose Gad's Hill and Rochester for the scenery of his plays from intimate personal knowledge of their localities. He said he had no manner of doubt but that one of Shakespeare's launts was the old inn at Rochester, and that this conviction came forcibly upon him one night as he was walking that way, and discovered Charles's Wain over the chimney just as Shakespeare has described it, in words put into the mouth of the carrier in King Henry the Fourth. There is no prettier place than Gad's Hill in all England for the earliest and latest flowers, and Dickens chose it, when he had arrived at the fulness of his fame and prosperity, as the home in which he most wished to spend the remainder of his days. When a boy he would often pass the house with his father, and frequently said to him, "If ever I have a dwelling of my own, Gad's Hill Place is the house I mean to buy." In that beautiful retreat he has for many years been accustomed to welcome his friends, and find relaxation from the crowded life of London. On the lawn playing at bowls, in the Swiss summer-house charmingly shaded by green leaves, he always seemed the best part of summer, beautiful as the season is in the delightful region where he lived. In a letter written not long ago to a friend in America he thus described his home:—

"Divers birds sing here all day, and the nightingales all night. The place is lovely, and in perfect order. I have put five mirrors in the Swiss chalet (where I write), and they reflect and refract, in all kinds of ways, the leaves that are quivering at the windows, and the great field of waving corn, and the sail-dotted river. My room is up among the branches of the trees; and the birds and the butterflies fly in and out, and the green branches shoot in at the open windows, and the lights and shadows of the clouds come and go with the rest of the company. The scent of the flowers, and indeed of everything that is growing for miles and miles, is most delicious."

There he could be most thoroughly enjoyed, for he never seemed so cheerfully at home anywhere else. At his own table, surrounded by his family and a few guests, old acquaintances from town,—among them sometimes Forster, Carlyle, Reade, Collins, Layard, Maclise, Stone, Macready, Talfourd,—he was always the choicest and liveliest companion. He was not what is called in society a professed talker, but he was something far better and rarer.—From ATLANTIC MONTHLY for August.

A Successful Manager.

(From the New York Weekly Review.)

A successful manager has become a somewhat mythical person in this part of the world, especially in musical matters. If one would take the trouble to foot up the losses caused the last three or four years by musical enterprises, he would find the total to be a sum of such vast magnitude as to pension off a good many tenors, prima donnas, and bassos, for the rest of their lives. The losses sustained by people who have attempted but one concert are already considerable; but what are these losses compared with those arising from the vast undertakings called concert tours and operatic performances, throughout the States. These campaigns have been really the most disastrous on record, and yet in this desert of smashed managers there is the oasis of one who has been entirely successful from the beginning of his career until the present time. And this one is comparatively a stranger among us, having been in this country but a few years, and by no means enjoying the experience age can give. But an innate love of order, a fine appreciation of the details of business, and the talent of profiting by circumstances, has carried this young man over difficulties which have often been stumbling blocks to more experienced managers. Our American readers will already have guessed that we speak of Mr. Carl Rosa. He is really the most successful musical manager of the present time in this country. His career as such commenced in 1867, soon after his marriage with Mme. Parepa. His first step was giving, on his own account, concerts and performances of oratorios, in various States, which at once proved a decided success, artistically as well as pecuniarily. Then he resolved to go to California with a complete Italian Opera troupe. This was a great undertaking, as the expenses amounted to more than eleven hundred dollars, in gold, which then had not sunk quite so low in the estimation of the people as at the present time. But a well applied and rationally supported energy will surmount greater obstacles, as the result showed in this instance. The company gave eighteen operas, partly in English and partly in Italian, among which were "Don Giovanni" and "Robert le Diable," with Mr. Carl Rosa as conductor in every instance, in which capacity he won the applause of competent judges. The pecuniary harvest reaped by these performances was not only a golden, but also a very weighty one, considering that it amounted to thirty thousand dollars in gold. After this splendid success, Mr. Rosa, encouraged by his undaunted wife, concluded to return by the overland route. At that time the blessings of the Pacific railroad were unknown, and the trip across the Rocky Mountains included hardships to which opera singers and especially ladies—were entirely unused. But the troupe bravely stood the test. It gave concerts on its way back, in every place which offered an opportunity, sang in Salt Lake City, to the immense satisfaction of the Saints as well as to its own, and arrived at last at Chicago, where the same unprecedented triumph awaited it. It was here that Mr. Carl Rosa conceived the plan of organizing a concert troupe on a gigantic scale—an undertaking which was again crowned with the greatest success, until the artists reached Baltimore, when Mme. Rosa became ill, and was confined to her room for about fourteen weeks. As unfortunate as this incident was, it had the beneficial effect of affording a welcome repose and an opportunity of planning the formation of the best and most complete English opera troupe ever formed either here or in Europe. It is now more than six months since this undertaking was first attempted. To give an idea of its magnitude, we will simply say that the troupe consists of seventy two members, with whom the managers have been travelling over the greater part of the East and West; that they carry with them properties to an extent unheard of in the annals of travelling companies; that they have with them all the principal scenery, including the incantation scenes from "Freischütz" and the market scenery from "Martha"; that they travel with two baggage masters and a host of agents. The expenses involved in this last enterprise are, of course, enormous; but, as the money is well laid out, the return cannot fail to be satisfactory. The artistic and pecuniary success of this last enterprise has surpassed the most sanguine expectations. The repertoire embraces well known operas by English composers, some of the French and Italian school, and "Freischütz," "Oberon," "Figaro's Marriage," and "Don Juan," a fact which, better than anything else, shows the ready will, the enthusiasm, and the good fellowship of every member of the troupe; for it is no easy matter to bring out operas of the last mentioned calibre, when the company is one week in one place and the next in another. All these operas have been given with a correctness, finish of detail, and an ensemble seldom met with in the rendering of English, or, in fact, any other opera. And the public has appreciated such praiseworthy efforts, as may best be seen in the fact that, in Boston alone, twenty performances yielded nearly sixty thousand dollars. Mr. Carl Rosa has not only been the principal conductor, but also the soul of the whole undertaking. On his shoulders has fallen the greater burden of the management, and he has displayed a foresight, a tact, a talent, and a respect for the musical intelligence of the American people, which will readily explain his extraordinary success. That this success is largely due to the great artistic position and popularity of his wife, M<sup>me</sup>. Parepa-Rosa, is a matter of course; but we have seen that the greatest singer will fail to be beneficial to a manager, if the latter does not come fully up to the requirements imposed upon him in this country.

Violins and their Manufacture.

(From the "Galaxy" for August.)

It cannot be denied that no creation of art has been so little understood as the violin. This wonderful instrument has always been an enigma to the musical world. That it does not understand the language of man is most fortunate, since thereby it escapes the confusion of conflicting opinions. In the interest of art, I have determined to publish the results of my long experience in relation to this subject.

It is very generally known, that until the earlier part of the eighteenth century the old Italian masters produced the best violins; and that after their period the manufacture of the instrument rapidly decayed. The violins then made attained a high price, and at this day are eagerly sought by all artists and amateurs, because it is believed to be demonstrated beyond a doubt that no violin can be constructed which will be found as well adapted for solo performances as those of the old Italian masters, until it has been used a hundred years. Many violin manufacturers have in vain endeavored to overcome this difficulty. At last Vuillaume, of Paris, invented a chemical process by which wood was rendered old, and for a time he created a furor with his instruments. It turned out, however, that after a few years his violins deteriorated, and finally became utterly useless. This failure established, it was declared, the impossibility of making violins which would prove of real value before attaining a great age. This induced Ole Bull to have an instrument made of very old wood, and at first he thought himself successful in securing his object; but he also became convinced at last, that every newly made violin must have a harsh sound unless constructed of chemically prepared wood.

Like everything else in the world, however, the art of making violins has progressed. Mr. Ole Bull will remember a violin which was shown to him in Columbus, Ohio, and his opinion asked concerning it. He pronounced it excellent, and held it to be an old instrument; and when he was informed that its maker was Mr. George Gemünder of New York, he declared that the wood must have been chemically prepared, because he held it to be impossible that a new instrument should furnish so good a tone. This fact ought to teach Mr. Bull, however, although he possesses the power of drawing from the violin its sweetest sounds, he cannot give them to it. To play a violin according to the rules of art, and to construct one according to the same rules, are two very different problems; therefore let each man stick to his trade. Nevertheless, on meeting him after a separation of eighteen years, Ole Bull, in a conversation about violins, ventured to deny that I was a judge of musical tone in these words:

"You are no judge of a violin tone," he said, "because you do not play the instrument."

This assertion shows that even artists are at times mistaken in their ideas. I have a hundred times as many opportunities for studying tone, through hearing daily many different violins, as an artist who hears only his own violin; and as regards performing on the violin, I can play it well enough to test it; but that is no reason why I should be an artist skillful enough to play a solo. It is not that kind of skill which makes the judge of tone or the good violin-maker, but the educated musical ear, which is not always to be found among the solo performers; for if an artist cannot tell by its sound if a violin is made of prepared wood or not, he has not begun to master the science of musical tones. This belief that only players are judges of musical tones is general enough; but what an error!

Experience has taught me that sound judgment of tone and the ability to play well are rarely found united; since one who has had no opportunities of listening to different instruments, and has not had his attention drawn to their peculiarities, may, it is true, be a good performer, but he can never be a judge of their tone-quality. For that reason there are good judges of tone who, at the same time, are neither artists nor even ordinary performers. Indeed, if solo performers as a general thing were good judges of tone they would not so frequently in concerts use feeble Italian violins and violoncellos, which are either too old, or have been rendered worthless by bungling workmen to whom they have been intrusted for repairs. In this way many a concert performer has spoiled his career: and still most of them are satisfied if only they have Italian instruments. The science of musical tones has been my life-long study; without this it would never have been possible for me to do what I have done—to construct violins for the present and the future, which have proved satisfactory to the most critical artists; and, when fashioned after the style of the old classical violins, and represented to be of them, they have drawn from hearers expressions of delight at the fine quality of their tones, which are all that can be desired. For even though a violin is of the finest tone, as long as it has the appearance of being new, the opinion concerning it will always be: "The instrument will be as good as those of Italian masters after it has been played a hundred years." By this I have been convinced that the prejudice of artists is the greatest obstacle to the revival of the violin manufacture. Great musicians have not always a fine appreciation of sound; and yet they venture to criticize violins, and thereby do a great injury to progress in the construction of these instruments. The great musician, Ole Bull, declared that a violin of my make, because of the fine quality of its tones, must have been constructed of chemically prepared wood: yet it is not hard to detect an instrument that has been made of such material, inasmuch as its tones are necessarily lifeless, like those of old Italian violins after they have been spoiled through repairs by bungling workmen.

When the process of preparing wood for violins was invented, it was generally believed that by this method instruments could be constructed which would compare favorably with the best then in existence; but when the process proved a failure, the whole art received a severe blow from the reaction and prejudice thus created. After that, it was believed that every new violin, even though its tone was far better, and its material apparently of the soundest kind, must nevertheless also be made of chemically prepared wood. Such a prejudice is now a great obstacle to the manufacture of good violins, and will perhaps remain so until through excessive age the last good Italian violin—of which there are now very few in the world—has become utterly useless.

But thanks to the great masters, they have laid a foundation for us to work upon in the construction of violins, which renders them immortal. Their system, however, is understood by very few violin-makers, because there are very few intelligent men who devote themselves to this art. Most of those who study it are mercenary in the extreme, while there are others like the potter who only knows that his wares will ring if struck by the finger. France is indisputably in advance of Germany in this respect. In Mirecourt, where most French violin-makers are engaged in working to supply the trade, the most wonderful imitations of the renowned Italian instruments have been produced; even in the inner work the system of the Italian School may be recognized. Unfortunately, however, these instruments have been rendered worthless from the very nature of their material, since the wood of which they are constructed was previously either baked or chemically prepared.

Lupot, especially, brought the Italian method into prominence in France, and after him its influence was extended very much further by Vuillaume of Paris, whose workmanship, as long as he followed the Italian method, was so exquisite that specimens of it are to-day worthy of our admiration. But when he hit upon the perverse idea towards the close of his career of making the top of the violin thinnest in the middle, he showed a great ignorance of musical tone, since violins so constructed cannot be touched vigorously with the bow without the sound breaking and the vibration being shortened. Of these instruments Vuillaume spread a great number throughout the world, which were constructed in direct violation of the principles of acoustics, and they have neither been good at any time nor can they ever become so. Many who possess his instruments will now be able to comprehend that they own violins which, though made by a famous man, are still by no means good.

Besides Vuillaume, there is in Paris at present no violin-maker of remarkable importance, or who has accomplished any thing extraordinary. No other violins that have been made in Paris can be compared, in point of workmanship, with those of Vuillaume. Excepting those of his make, the instruments manufactured in Mirecourt are much finer than than the violins of Paris, and greatly surpass them in tone whenever they are made of wood that has not been spoiled in preparing.

The greatest progress in Germany has been made by Bausch in Leipzig, and Bott in Vienna. The former shows great talent in the construction of violins, but still more in the manufacture of bows, in which, as a skillful artist, he has as yet shown himself unsurpassable. The musical world is under deep obligations to him, because he has spread the influence of his school throughout all Saxony, so that excellent bows are now made there; nor is his system alone followed, but also that of Vuillaume, although their imitation of the Tourt bows, from their being unable to give the requisite shape to the heads, has not been very successful.

It might be worth while to recommend that the nuts of violin and violoncello bows be constructed after Vuillaume's style, be rounded like his, and provided with the same run or course, this being a great improvement.

As for Bott's violins, they are tasteful and elegant, and constructed in full accordance with the classical models. Bott is well versed in the science of musical tones.

Many may now be interested in hearing something more definite about the manufacture of the violin by the renowned old Italian masters, since not a few are completely in the dark as to the merits of the various schools. This is owing simply to the fact that many a musician even has not acquired the technical education that enables him to tell what outline and what swells will produce a desired quality of tone, even if all the instruments of the masters were in a good condition; but inasmuch as of every school there are some that have been spoiled by botchers in repairing, and some that are yet good, it is not hard to see how the doubt and confusion have arisen.

These great masters having left for posterity a large number of models upon which no one has yet been able to improve, we must regard their designs as perfect. I have constructed violins in accordance with their systems, and in so doing have become so familiar with the characteristic tones they produce as to be able to see that each of the masters found the very tone which he was seeking for, and that each one, in his instrument, produced an interesting quality of tone. In this way they created such a variety of instruments as must satisfy the desires of every artist and amateur. Let us now consider the tone-characteristics of the great masters' best creations, or of instruments made according to their systems.

Niccolò Amati of Cremona, and his disciple Jacob Steiner of Ahaus, a Tyrolese, both manufactured violins which are now chiefly to be found in households. Because of their slender, rounded, sweet, silver tones, they are the favorite instruments of amateurs. This tone characteristic is the result of a small, round, and long swell, and a neat outline which is somewhat smaller than that of the instruments of Stradivarius. The latter, having sought a more sonorous tone, did not make the arch of his violins so high as did the two former masters, but gave it a wider and flatter swell, by which the noblest concert-tone was attained, together with an aristocratic and majestic form of the instruments.

As long as Joseph Guarnerius worked after the system of his great master Stradivarius, the instruments of his make were similar to others of that school; but he afterwards produced models which were rather smaller, and had more circular curves, the tone of these being somewhat weaker, but sparkling, quick, and remarkably brilliant. He even gave each violin that he afterwards made a different shape and character. It is said that he spent a long time in prison, and amid great privations secretly constructed these instruments; at any rate, in all his creations his great genius is plainly to be recognized.

Duffu Prugar of Bonnonia lived in the sixteenth century. His violins have a large and broad form, and are tastefully ornamented with carved work. The tone corresponds with the form, and between them they produce a powerful concert-tone. There being, however, very few of these instruments in existence, a great number are annually manufactured in France after this model, and sent to all parts of the world.

Magini's violins are also mostly of large form, but of a higher arch than those of Prugar, as well as much fuller toward the end than any that have here been mentioned. For that reason they have great fullness of tone, but have a deeper color of sound on the G and D strings.

Gaspar da Salo constructed very interesting violins, of widely different styles of build. His small violins have high, round and beautiful curves, and a peculiar tone, not very strong, but brilliant. His large violins, however, are flat, though not flatter than those of Stradivarius, and have a beautiful tone.

For solo performances they are far preferable to his smaller instruments.

Although each of these masters constructed violins of different models, still each one's products can be recognized by certain characteristics impressed thereon. That we find so great a variety is a proof of their endeavors to bring their work to perfection; by this means they have saved the trouble of searching and experimenting to those who desire to ascertain what shape and curve will produce a required quality of tone.

Many are still of the opinion that in the construction of a violin the determination of the quality of tone to be produced is impossible, and that the result must be purely accidental. This is perhaps true as a general thing, since most violin-makers understand their business no better than a carpenter would; for to construct a violin according to the rules of art, one must have enjoyed a thorough technical education. He who has acquired the requisite knowledge knows from what the various shades of sound arise, and how they can be produced.

To the repairer especially is this knowledge most indispensable, since he is intrusted with the most valuable instruments; but unfortunately the thoughtless manner in which persons who own such instruments frequently give them into the hands of patchers and fiddle-makers is truly to be deplored. It shows, however, what a lack of judgment there is in these matters. By such botchers most of the Italian instruments have been ruined, people being usually of the opinion that if a workman makes a neat job of what is given him, and knows well how to use the chisel, file and sandpaper, he is perfectly fit to be intrusted with such an instrument; but that is just where lack of knowledge becomes apparent. The man usually does more injury to the instrument with his neat work in a single half hour than one would suppose possible.

It does no harm to make bad violins, but bad repairing ruins instruments that masters have created. A violin-maker who cannot construct excellent violins himself cannot be a good repairer. It seems, however, that all things in nature are so wisely ordered as to allow also the little-gifted and the little learned to enjoy their life; that is, they enjoy it through the sacrifices that by mistake are put in their power.

This is a plain and simple exposition of the violin manufacture and the science of musical tones. To those who disagree with the views herein expressed we recommend further study of the subject, believing confidently that their experience will in the end bear out that of the writer.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 30, 1870.

Richard Wagner.

Our friend of the London Musical World wonders that we waste our time in the translation of some passages from "that miserable piece of egotistical coxcombry and absolute nonsense, the pamphlet called Ueber das Dirigiren," and asks: "What, in the name of Music, does any sensible American care about such stuff?" Pray do not be alarmed; we never dreamed of undertaking to translate the whole work, or even the larger part of it; that would indeed be a thankless and a dreary task. But we have given a few of the opening chapters by way of specimens to gratify the curiosity of our readers, and because, with all their egotism, they do contain some good hints about the matter of conducting an orchestra. With the same view, we may make a few more extracts, referring meanwhile to Ferdinand Hiller's pungent criticism, which we have copied at the same time, for an aperçu of the general drift and spirit of the whole.

While we are by no means convinced by Wagner's theories, nor partial to his music, we have endeavored so far as possible to do him justice. So, when we can conveniently, we let him speak for himself. Often enough before—perhaps too early for our present audience—we have expressed our distrust of his principles, our distrust for his practice, and have given our reasons. Lately, during the year past, we have allowed his admirers to speak pretty freely and fully in our columns; giving place for instance to the long and glowing article about him from the Revue de deux Mondes, as well as to the letters of a young friend whose face is set toward "the Future." Soon we propose to translate some of what we consider the sounder criticisms of the best German writers upon music, such as the talented Otto Jahn. Meanwhile we go back to our own first honest endeavors to get at the truth, and hereby resume the thread.

We attempted years ago to give our readers an outline of Wagner's theory of Operatic composition, as developed in the three volumes of his book, entitled "Opera and Drama." We stated his fundamental criticism upon the Opera as hitherto existing: to wit, that the mistake has lain in the endeavor to construct it on the basis of absolute music, making music the end instead of the means; whereas the only true lyric drama, hitherto never realized, can spring only from the marriage of poetry and music. In his own operas, his Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, he thinks to have emancipated the poet from that completely menial relation in which he has stood to the musician, merely furnishing the latter with some slight verbal text for the forms in which he chooses to compose, as recitative, arias, ensembles, chorus, ballet, &c.—and thus producing texts or libretti of the most empty, trivial character. Here is a double slavery; the composer cuts his music to the fashionable patterns required by the singers for the display of their voices and tours de force; while the poet writes to order for the composer. In the drama according to Wagner, the music is nothing but the art of expressing the thoughts furnished by the poem.

His whole thinking on the subject seems to have fallen under the control of an ingenious simile. He makes Poetry the masculine and Music the feminine element of expression. He denies to Music any power of independent production; and considers all the efforts of absolute, or purely instrumental, music as doomed to everlasting impotence, as so much barren yearning for delivery. This he thinks to be the characteristic of all our modern instrumental music, in symphony, and overture, and chamber music. Instrumental music exhausts itself in a vain struggle after definite expression. In confirmation of which criticism, he points to the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the last word of instrumental music, from its genius par excellence. After striving in vain for utterance through the orchestra, until the instruments themselves do all but speak in human recitative, he suddenly bursts the bonds and calls in words, the "Hymn to Joy" of Schiller. And that bold act, thinks Wagner, marks the transition from the music of the past to the music of the future, from music pure, and barren, to music in its true and fruitful function as co-factor with Poetry in the living and perfect Drama. Music, according to him, can only bear, it cannot generate; the generating power is extraneous to it and resides only in the poet.

We perhaps wrong his thought in this bald statement, divesting it of all that wealth of ingenious and happy illustration with which he develops it. But we believe we give the kernel of the thought. Richard Wagner is himself both poet and musician, alike an adept at both arts; he has carefully prepared his own librettos; and it must be a satisfaction for once to have librettos which, when only read, amount to real poems. His practice, too, in this double character of poet-composer, may be better than his theory. Lohengrin and Tannhäuser may be works of genius;—genius enough to save them from the consequences of the worst preconceived theory of composition. But we must say, this theory hardly chimes with musical experience. We do not think that any true music-lover, who has had personal experience of the power with which Beethoven's symphonies address the deeper instincts of the soul, would willingly exchange them for any amount of the best poetry skilfully set to Recitative. We do not think it will be owned, by true music-lovers, that instruments have failed, in those instances, to convey some meaning; that those Adagios and Scherzos are not bond fide live creations, real deliveries of divine brain-children, or that they convey to you no adequate expression of the tone-artist's inmost life and purpose. Nor is it at all true to history that instrumental or pure music exhausts itself in a vain effort and is on the decline. On the contrary, the age runs into instrumental music; no music has such power over a community at all musically cultivated, as that in the grand orchestral forms; and it is matter of almost universal experience, that as we grow more musical the love for instrumental music gains upon, sometimes outlives the love for vocal. Music may correspond to the feminine principle:—so far we do not quarrel with Wagner's analogy. But what is the feminine principle in the soul? It is Feeling, Sentiment, as contrasted with the colder masculine principle of Intellect or Reason. Words are the language of the intellect, tones are the language of the heart. Love and Wisdom, (no one disputes the axiom of the Swedish seer in this) are the feminine and masculine principle in the universe. But Love is first, before and deeper than Wisdom. And so the poet says:

"Thought is deeper than all speech, Feeling deeper than all thought," &c.

It is this Feeling, this something deeper in us than words can utter, or than can ever take the definite forms of thought, that seeks its utterance in music as its only natural language. It is this that necessitates the art of music in the life of man. The symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven never had existed but for these experiences in human souls of something deeper, finer, more essential than words were ever framed to utter. Vague are they? But the very definiteness of words perverts their sense and puts their heavenly influence to flight. Why do our deeper moods love silence? Music is but the audible breath of such full silence. Hence there may be, there should be profound moral and spiritual culture in listening sympathetically to great instrumental music. You want no words; you do not ask a literal meaning; you enter into the spirit of it, which is somehow wondrously in harmony with deeper depths than you were perhaps aware of in your spirit. No, Herr Wagner! the great tone-poet does not need the word-poet to impregnate his creative genius, or to furnish him the wherewithal to express himself. Pure music is a very subtle, perfect medium of expression. Its fluid, universal language conveys the deep and universal sentiments, the sense of the Infinite, the spiritual part of us, in which we are all most deeply related to one another and to the source of all, as words with their limitations and distinctions never can do. No human being, not even Coleridge, or Goethe, or Shakespeare, lives more fully revealed, expressed, communicated to mankind, than Beethoven, the meaning of whose life and character flowed almost wholly into instrumental music.

Those symphonies may not be rendered into words; yet who that loves them deeply does not feel that he knows Beethoven? Dumb otherwise, as he was deaf, almost, yet what great soul has succeeded better in making himself understood? And should the Choral Symphony become universally recognized as the greatest, will that be at the expense of the other Symphonies? shall we love the Fifth and the Seventh and the "Pastoral" less, that we love the last one more? Did the orchestra in that one outburst into human speech yield up its soul forever, and pronounce pure instrumental music henceforth obsolete? The musical genius of mankind says no; it plunges more and more deeply into the mysteries of instrumental music, because it has more to utter than words and voices can convey. It remains to see whether the zest of symphonies and overtures and quartets will sicken under the new charm of the interminable Wagner recitative, shaped to the mould of cunningly contrived alliterative verses, borrowing from them its only melody or rhythm, and for modulation knowing no key-note, but swimming ambiguously in all keys at once.

But we anticipate. We must see how Wagner theoretically arrives at and justifies these peculiarities of style, or rather of musical structure. The generative power of the poet, he says, manifests itself chiefly in the formation of melodies. Not that he supplies the melodies ready made to the musician's hand. He says repeatedly, to be sure, that the melody is already implied in the versification of the poem; but then he explains this to mean that the poet in his verse gives the musician the fructifying seeds; "the fruit is matured and moulded by the musician according to his own individual means." "The risings and fallings of the melody must conform to the risings and fallings of the verse; the musical time or measure is governed by the expression designed by the poet; and the musical modulation brings out as clearly as possible the bond of relationship between the single tones or keys of feeling, which the poet could only indicate to a limited extent by means of alliteration." As an instance of a melody thus springing immediately out of the word-verse, he cites the manner in which Beethoven in his Ninth Symphony has set the words: "Seid umschlungen, Millionen, &c." ("Mingle in embrace, ye millions"). In Lohengrin all the melodies are made upon this principle.

Wagner proclaims a sort of revolution in the sphere of Modulation. Hitherto it has been supposed essential to any unity in a piece of music, that all its harmonies should pivot as it were upon one prevailing key; that the deviations therefrom should keep as much as possible within the next related keys, as those of the Dominant and Subdominant, Relative Major and Minor, and so forth; and that, however exclusive or centrifugal the movement, everything in it should still gravitate back to the central key note and starting-point. A certain family affinity of keys, with only exceptional intermarriages of now and then a branch into a remoter race, has been an essential law of all good music. Wagner throws down the barriers of this patriarchal system of modulation, as he calls it. He wants the whole range of keys: these are to the musician what the vowels and consonants are to the poet, who intimates affinities and contrasts of feeling by alliteration; and the musician has to show the ground-relationship of all the keys of feeling. Thus Wagner makes a formal declaration of independence against the patriarchal regime: "All keys are equal, and essentially related; the privileges of tone-families are abolished." In his Lohengrin he has practiced accordingly. All who have heard that opera admit that "he has fully succeeded in abolishing all individuality of keys;—F sharp minor sounds like G minor, and G minor like C sharp minor; he carries you from D major to G major, through A flat minor; the mixture of the tri chords of B flat, G flat and A is a very common modulation with him; in short he actually allows us to hear nothing but the monotonous "ground-relationship of all keys."

A striving towards a similar result is truly said to characterize the music of our time. Composers like Schubert, Chopin, Schumann and Robert Franz seem to chafe against the limits of our diatonic scale and the modulation it prescribes; they blend the different keys together, as if to make out one more rich and universal. But Wagner was the first to raise this to a principle. Having to bridge his way so often in the shortest manner from one to another of all twenty-four keys, he naturally has recourse to perpetual employment of the chord of the diminished seventh, which is the transitional element par excellence in harmony, binding the most heterogeneous keys together. Lohengrin is full of Diminished Sevens, accompanying the recitative; indeed it is said there is a scene in it, occupying sixteen pages in the piano-forte arrangement, where you hear absolutely nothing but diminished sevenths. It must be like tossing on the restless sea of harmony without course or compass.

CARL ROSA.—An article which we copy on another page presents this well-known artist, one of Boston's favorites, in the character of "A Successful Manager," giving him due praise. Certainly it was in quite another character that he first won our sympathies. When the blushing, modest, thoroughly German looking youth, resembling the young Mozart, as so many fancied, drew his bow before an audience in the Music Hall, in the first of the Parepa concerts, the impression made was purely that of an ingenuous, sincere, and genial votary of Music, one dedicated to Art for Art's sake. The sweet, true tones of his instrument, and his manly style, marked him as a violinist of a noble school, one who had not known Joachim in vain. And this impression was confirmed in the very first of the Harvard Symphony Concerts, to which Carl Rosa lent new interest by his fine rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and the Charonne of Bach. This was the young artist's free-will offering to the first foundation a permanent series of good concerts in this city, and to that good act we are in part indebted for their success that dated from that moment.

But there is not necessarily any inconsistency between the two characters. If Carl Rosa, upon marrying Parepa, entered on a new and strange career, sharing the more enterprising and exciting fortunes of a famous prima donna, and finally becoming her conductor and her manager, it does not follow that the artist spirit was extinguished in him. Developing a new talent he has not renounced his finer nature; on the contrary his enthusiasm for what is purest and highest in Art still burns undimmed, as all who know him well can testify. And in this new sphere has he not shown it by the triumphant zeal and energy with which he has brought an English Opera Company to such good performance of works like the "Marriage of Figaro," "Oberon," and "Don Juan"?

Rosa is young. Born in Hamburg, March 22, 1842, he began the study of the violin when he was six years old. Lindenau was his first teacher. He made his first appearance in public in 1850, at the age of eight, playing a Concertino by Jausa. From that time the boy played frequently in concerts; went on a concert tour to Scotland in 1854, and returned there three successive seasons. In 1858 he went to the Conservatory at Leipzig, where for about three years he studied the violin under David and Dreyshock, Counterpoint under Hauptmann and Richter, &c. He was a favorite with students and professors, and it was always a point of interest to hear him in the Abendunterhaltungen (or evening musical entertainments). There we remember meeting him in the Spring of '61 at the hospitable house of Moscheles, and with what interest he evidently was regarded. From Leipzig he went to Berlin to complete his general education, as the phrase is, and heard lectures at the University. Thence, in the same year, to Paris, for further study of his instrument at the Conservatoire; and in that city he gave several concerts, followed, the next year, by a concert tour through Germany and Denmark. He was called in '62 to Hamburg as Concertmeister of the Philharmonic Society, and remained there two years, during which time he gave concerts of Chamber music, in connection with the singer Stockhausen; Madame Schumann, Brahms, and other noted artists sometimes taking part. Both in Germany and in London he enjoyed the intimacy of the great violinist Joachim, in whom he had the best of models. It was in 1865 that he went to London for the season, and there played in a concert where Mme. Parepa sang. With her he was engaged by Mr. Bateman for the Concert tour in America, which led to their return here, their happy union by the most intimate of all ties, and their identification of themselves ever since, and we trust for many years to come, with this country; for Rosa has taken the first steps to become naturalized as an American citizen. They are now seeking summer rest in England. Should they in the autumn essay English opera there too, before returning to us in the winter, we doubt not they will meet with warm reception.

MICHAEL KELLY.—The sketch of this clever musical Irishman, who knew Mozart, which we copy on another page, strangely omits to mention that very interesting book of "Reminiscences," which he published in his later days, and which was even reprinted in this country many years ago. Copies are rare, but it is well worth reading.

SUPERVISOR OF MUSICAL INSTRUCTION. Mr. Julius Eichberg has been appointed by the School Board Supervisor of Musical Instruction in the Public Schools of Boston, and is to conduct the teaching of that branch personally in the high schools. His term of service will commence at the beginning of the next school year, September 1st, and his salary has been fixed at $3800 a year. This office has been newly created. The place could not be filled by a more worthy incumbent than Mr. Eichberg.

Our Singers Abroad.

MRS. C. A. BARRY. The Florentine journal L'Italie, of June 28, has the following account of the performance of Rossini's Maze, in which our townswoman bore a distinguished part.

"The Philharmonic Hall which now covers the spot where once stood the gloomy prison of the Stinche, was filled on Friday last with the new and masterly harmonies of the Messe Solennelle of Rossini. We listened religiously to this religious music, and many times felt ourselves transported to a divine and supernatural world.

"Religious music is very difficult—because it is for the masters themselves very difficult to distinguish the limit which separates the sacred from the profane; but Rossini, in the Messe Solennelle, appears to have traced very clearly the exact limits; it is therefore truly a religious music, destined to raise souls to a contemplation of eternal truths. The various pieces are not all stamped with the same grandeur of character, but it is true of them that they are far removed from things terrestrial, and make us to forget profane music.

"The chorus Cum Sancto is something sublime and superhuman; the concord is so perfect, the notes so copious, the harmony so majestic that no one escapes the influence of this music, which speaks to the heart even more than to the soul. The chorus singers were greeted with such enthusiastic applause that they had to repeat this piece; but, one is more deeply moved by the Sanctus and Benedictus. One does not lose these harmonies which conduct the soul by a sublime ascent till within the infinite spheres. Here it is not enthusiasm alone—it is an abandon in which the heart is buried. The Qui tollis and Agnus Dei pleased us very much; they were certainly very remarkable, but somewhat eclipsed by the sublimity of the preceding pieces one has just listened to.

"Mme. Barry and Mme. Albertini-Baucaride interpreted their roles with great dignity and grandeur, and the Orchestra, directed by M. Mabellini sustained itself nobly through the difficult task.

"We must praise the initiatory step of the Society of St. John the Baptist, who wish to raise up the love of the great works, and the æsthetic sentiment of the Art, honoring thereby the immortal names which are the glory of our country.

"The Messe will be repeated Wednesday, the 29th. This repetition of a most admirable work will satisfy the curiosity of those persons who could not attend the performance on Friday last."

And the following naive extract from a private letter from a young American in Florence appears in the Transcript:

"But I must tell you about Mrs. Barry. She is setting the Italians crazy with her beautiful voice. Vannuccini (the teacher) pronounces her a great master of music, and I doubt if there is much for her to learn. Yesterday she made her debut in the Philharmonic Hall in this city, in Rossini's 'Messe Solennelle,' and carried the day. You know the Italians are very demonstrative, and if they like you, will show it to the utmost; and if you are disliked, they always hiss. But there was no end to the 'Bravos,' 'Ahs,' and general applause; and it ended in their giving her the most gorgeous bouquet I ever saw. It measured two yards in circumference, with the initials 'C. A. B.' on it, and each of these letters was six inches in length, formed of white pinks on a scarlet centre of the same flowers, surrounded with a border of Cape jessamines as large as our roses, and as strongly and as delicately perfumed as tube roses. The Italians speak of her affectionately as 'l'Americana Contralto.' Not many Boston musicians can say that they have sung in the presence of royalty, and have had a prince and his wife so perfectly delighted with one as they were with her (!) The Prince and Princess are going to call on her some day at two o'clock, which is looked upon as a great honor."

The Paris American Register says:

"Miss MINNIE HAUCK, the American artiste of whom we have already spoken in our columns, has been gaining repeated and brilliant success before critical and appreciative audiences in Vienna. She made her first appearance on the 6th of May, in the rôle of Marguerite in Gounod's 'Faust.' Her youth, her graceful acting, added to the extreme power and richness of her voice, at once enlisted the sympathies of the entire house and confirmed the opinion we had already formed, that her artistic career is certain to be a series of successes. The clearness of her low notes surprises and captivates the hearers. The German press was unanimous in predicting for our fair countrywoman as high, if not higher reputation than that obtained by Sontag. Miss Minnie Hauck's subsequent Zerline in the opera of 'Don Juan,' represented on the 20th of May, before an overflowing house, was most enthusiastically applauded. Rarely, if ever, were the musical lovers of Vienna favored with such a thorough artistic impersonation of Zerline. Miss Hauck's acting is free from all staginess. Her delineations show deep study; and yet, withal, she preserves intact that youthful freshness which appeals so strongly to the spectator. Her Marguerite had raised expectations that were fully, we may indeed say, more than realized, by the immense powers that she puts forth in Zerline. As an operatic vocalist, Miss Minnie Hauck is evidently called on to fill a high position; and we are but too happy to be afforded an opportunity of congratulating her on her recent success in Vienna, thus according our meed of praise to American talent, as so well represented by this lady."

MADAME CORA DE WILHORST (Miss Withers that was, of New York) has been singing with moderate success in Paris; and has now been engaged for the Italian Opera at Hamburg, to sing, with Patti, such parts as Margaret of Valois, in "The Huguenots," and Donna Elvira in "Don Giovanni."

Mlle. Nilsson and the Approaching Musical Season.

The coming of Mlle. Nilsson, now so near at hand, is looked forward to with all the more interest from the fact that it is so long since we have been visited by a really great prima donna. Those we have had have become almost traditions. Grisi and Sontag were of the number, but both of these illustrious singers were past their prime when they arrived in this country. Grisi helped out her failing powers as a vocalist by her noble presence and fine acting, but at times it was the reverse of pleasant to listen to her endeavors to repeat her former triumphs in some great aria that had already passed beyond her reach. Bosio and Patti were young when they went from here, and it was reserved to Europe to mature their powers and bear them at their best. Steffanone was great but unreliable. La Grange stayed long enough to let us all witness the decay of her fine powers. Miss Kellogg, charming singer that she is, has never been able to cope successfully with the great tragic parts, and has given us satisfactorily only the comedy side of the lyric stage. Parepa was accepted as a prima donna on account of her great ability as a vocalist, but it was always somewhat under protest and with much shutting of the eyes to the many obvious incongruities and shortcomings.

But Nilsson comes without any drawbacks. She is in the prime of her youth and beauty, in the meridian of her powers as a singer, at the full tide of her triumphs upon the European stage. She comes of a people who have already given to us certainly one of the greatest singers that ever lived, being born of humble parents in the south of Sweden. She is the eighth child of the family.

As has been almost without exception the case with all truly musical natures, hers was one of inheritance, and, as has always happened, the musical instinct manifested itself at a very early age. Her father was an ardent lover of the art, and had charge of the music at the church in the little village of Husaby. He was but a peasant, but his life was refined by this beautiful art. He taught his son Carl the violin, and Christine, the little sister, would get the boy's fiddle, and pick out for herself on it the tunes she had heard him play. Her proficiency soon became so great that the neighboring people came to listen and admire, and finally Carl took her with him to the country fairs at the market towns, and there she attracted great attention. Happily, she attracted that of the good Thorerhjelm, a magistrate of Ljungh, who offered to provide for her musical education. The offer was accepted, and Mlle. Valerius, afterward Baroness of Lenhusen, became her earliest instructor. The little peasant was soon put to school, and afterward sent to Stockholm and placed under the care of a composer and teacher of talent, Mr. Franz Berwald. From Stockholm she went to Paris, and there studied carefully for three years before she went upon the stage. Her debut was made in 1864, in Verdi's "Traviata," a character not specially to her taste, and in which she failed then to make a great success. Mozart's music suited her better, and in the "Magic Flute" she gained her earliest triumph. From that time to the present her career has been one of uninterrupted success. Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust," Alice in "Robert le Diable," Cherubino in the "Marriage of Figaro," Lucia in Donizetti's opera, and Ophelia in Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" have been among her important rôles. Of late she has been singing at Drury Lane, in opposition to Patti at Covent Garden, and has, so far as popular enthusiasm goes, certainly borne away the palm. The marvellous purity of her voice, her great beauty, the excellence and loveliness of her private character, the charm of her acting which gains constantly in fervor, seem to be the principal elements of her success.

That she will be fully appreciated in this country there can scarcely be a doubt. Her renown as an oratorio singer is in no way inferior to that she possesses as a prima donna. At the Handel Festival in 1868 at the London Crystal Palace, and at the Birmingham festival of the previous year, she took the same position that Mme. Parepa holds with us. It is sincerely to be hoped that the company that supports her will be a good one, and that the whole success of the enterprise may not be made to depend upon her single talent. If she is really well supported we may look for a more brilliant season of opera than we have had since the days of the Havana Italian company.—Sun.

AUBER.—The Figaro, of London, indulges in this style of gossip about one of the most distinguished of living composers; "M. Auber, now in his eighty-ninth year, thinks it time to retire from the direction of the Conservatoire Imperial de Musique, Paris. The illustrious composer is at length beginning to pay the penalty of great longevity. Somnolence has laid hold of M. Auber, as loss of memory, or dotage, lays hold of persons of his age. He passes his days, both in public and private, fast asleep. M. Auber nodded through a session of a Fine Art Committee, appointed by M. Maurice Richard, to inquire into the state of the drama and the lyrical stage in France. He nods over his plate when he dines at the Tuilleries, and may be seen any day, between two and five, fast asleep in an open carriage in the Bois de Boulogne. "Ce diable de sommeil," as he calls it, interferes with an opera M. Auber is composing. M. Auber is liveliest at breakfast, when his muse is most propitious in inspiring him with fresh melodies for his forthcoming score. As he has not voice enough to hum them to his musical secretary, he calls to the servant to bring him without delay writing materials. But the pen is scarcely put in his hand when he falls fast asleep over his task. M. Auber was all his life a great sleeper. His most graceful compositions, he himself admits, were torn from him between sleeping and waking."

Books.

- BAKER'S HARMONY AND THOROUGH BASS.
B. F. Baker. Cloth, 2.00
A work which enters minutely into the analysis of Chords, Scales, Modulations, &c., calculated to be of great assistance both to the student and musician.
- SILVER WINGS. A new collection of Sabbath School Music. Boards, 35
Paper, 30
A Collection, which, like the title is extremely happy in its adaptation to the wants of Sabbath Schools. It will secure a warm welcome from lovers of this class of sacred music.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to
7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Translations, for this Journal, from "Ueber das Dirigiren," by RICHARD WAGNER.

III.

Having shown that the right tempo must be sought for in a thorough understanding of a composition and of the whole way of rendering it, Wagner proceeds:

The old musicians, such as Haydn and Mozart, had so true a feeling in this matter, that they used for the most part very general indications of the tempo; "Andante" between "Allegro" and "Adagio," the simplest possible gradation, nearly exhausted all that they deemed necessary. And with Sebastian Bach we find the time actually not marked at all, which in the genuine musical sense is the most correct way. In fact he said to himself something like this: "If one does not understand my theme, my figuration, does not feel for himself its character and its expression, what can such an Italian time mark tell him?"—To speak from my own individual experience, I may mention that I furnished my earlier operas, which were given on the stage, with verbal indications of the tempi, and still further fixed them unmistakably enough (as I supposed) by means of the metronome. The consequence was that, whenever I heard a stupid tempo in a performance, say of my "Tannhäuser," the conductor always defended himself against my recriminations by declaring that he had followed my metronome marks most conscientiously. From this I saw what an uncertain guide the Mathematics are in music, and from that time I not only dropped the metronome, but contented myself with general indications of the principal time measure, bestowing my sole care upon the modifications of that measure, since of these our directors know as good as nothing. But latterly, I find, these general indications have confused and vexed the conductors again, the more so that they are expressed in German, and the gentlemen, accustomed to the old Italian patterns, are puzzled about what I mean, for example, by "moderate" (mässig). I had an annoyance of this sort lately on the part of a Kapellmeister, thanks to whom the music of my "Rheingold," which in the rehearsals, under a conductor guided by myself, lasted two hours and a half, stretched itself out in the performance, according to the report in the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung, to three hours. In like manner I was once informed, by way of characterizing a performance of my "Tannhäuser," that the Overture, which, as I conducted it in Dresden, occupied twelve minutes, here took twenty. These remarks apply of course to the regular bunglers, who show an uncommon awe in the presence of the Alla Breve time, steadily adhering to four correct normal quarter beats per measure, in order to keep alive within themselves the consciousness that they are really conducting and are there for something. How these four-footed creatures have crept out of the village church into our opera theatres, God only knows.

But "dragging," on the other hand, is not the peculiarity of the elegant conductors of these later times; on the contrary they have a fatal fondness for hurrying and dashing through a thing. * * *

Robert Schuman once complained to me in Dresden, that in the Leipzig concerts Mendelssohn had spoiled all his enjoyment of the Ninth Symphony by a too rapid tempo, especially in the first movement. I myself have only once heard Mendelssohn conduct a Beethoven Symphony, at a rehearsal in Berlin. It was the eighth Symphony (F major). I observed that he singled out a detail here and there—almost at random—and labored with a certain obstinacy upon the clear delivery of that, succeeding so admirably with that one detail, that I was only puzzled to comprehend why he did not bestow the same attention also upon other nuances. On the whole this incomparably cheerful Symphony glided away smoothly and entertainingly to an extraordinary degree. Personally to me several times he expressed himself to the effect that a too slow tempo does the most harm, and that he always recommended, rather than that, to take a piece too fast; that a really good rendering was at all times something rare; but one could deceive an audience about it, by simply not allowing much of it to be remarked, and this was best done by not dwelling long at any point, but hurrying swiftly over it. Mendelssohn's own pupils must have heard more, and with more precision, from the master on this subject; for it cannot have been a chance suggestion merely expressed to me, since I had afterwards occasion to learn the consequences, and finally the reasons of that maxim.

Of the first I had a live experience in the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society in London. Mendelssohn had conducted this for a long time, and here they had expressly held fast to the tradition of the Mendelssohnian way of rendering, which on the other hand was so well adapted to the habits and peculiarities of the concerts of this Society, that the suspicion must seem unavoidable that the Mendelssohnian rendering was given to the master by this orchestra. As an uncommon quantity of instrumental music is used in these concerts, but with only one rehearsal for each concert, I was myself obliged often to let the orchestra just follow the tradition, and thereby I learned to know a manner of delivery which most vividly reminded me of Mendelssohn's remarks to me. The music flowed like water from a town pump; any holding in was not to be thought of, and every Allegro ended as an undeniable Presto. It was painful enough to try to make any headway against this; for with a correct and well modified tempo, for the first time, other faults of rendering, hidden beneath the general water flow, revealed themselves. The orchestra in fact played never otherwise than mezzo forte; it never reached a real forte, nor a real piano. So far as possible in the important cases, I made it a point at last to insist upon what seemed to me the proper rendering as well as the corresponding tempo. The sound musicians had nothing to say against it, and rejoiced sincerely in it; it evidently seemed to suit the public too; only the critics were enraged about it, and these so frightened the Directors of the Society, that on one occasion I was actually begged by them to let the second movement of the E-flat Symphony of Mozart be played through again with the same reckless speed that they had been accustomed to, and as Mendelssohn himself allowed it.

But finally the fatal maxim took a precise verbal form in the request made to me by a very genial elderly contrapuntist, Mr. Cipriani Potter (if I mistake not), whose Symphony I had to bring out, and who earnestly besought me to be sure and take the Andante quite fast, since he had great fear lest it might prove wearisome. I assured him that his Andante, however short its length, must certainly in any case be tedious, played in a tame and unexpressive manner; whereas it might enchain the audience, if the very pretty naive theme were rendered by the orchestra somewhat as I hummed it over to him, for so at any rate he had intended it. Mr. Potter was much moved, admitted that I was right, and excused himself only by remarking that he was no longer in the habit of taking that sort of orchestral rendering into the account. In the evening, just after that Andante, he pressed my hand most joyfully.

I have been really astonished to find how little of this true sense of tempo and right rendering our modern musicians show; and this experience I have got, alas! among the very chiefs and Coryphæi of our musical life of to-day. Thus I found it impossible to make Mendelssohn understand my feeling of the perverse way in which they generally spoil the tempo of the third movement of the F-major Symphony (No. 8) of Beethoven. This is one example out of many, that ought to open our eyes to a terribly questionable side of our musical art sense.

We know how Haydn, using the form of the Minuet for a refreshing transition from the Adagio to the final Allegro of his Symphonies,—particularly in his last masterworks in that kind,—went so far as to quicken its tempo quite decidedly, and contrary to the peculiar character of the Minuet. Clearly he adopted into this movement, especially for the Trio, even the "Ländler" of his day, so that the designation "Menuetto," as regards the time at least, was no longer appropriate, and the title was preserved merely for tradition's sake. In spite of this I believe, that already Haydn's Minuet is commonly taken too fast; it is certainly so with that in Mozart's Symphonies, as one must very clearly feel, if he should hear, for example, the Minuet of his G-minor Symphony, or, still more, that of the one in C, played in a more moderate tempo; in which case the latter, commonly dashed through at Presto speed, receives a wholly different expression, at once graceful, vigorous and festive,—whereas otherwise the Trio, with the thoughtfully held becomes a mere unmeaning rush of sound.

Now Beethoven, for his 8th Symphony, as well as in some other works, had in mind a real genuine Minuet; this he places, by way of complement and contrast to a preceding Allegretto Scherzando, between two large principal Allegro movements; and, that there may be no doubt about his purpose in regard to the tempo, he marks it, not Menuetto, but Tempo di Menuetto. Now this new and unusual characteristic of the two middle movements of a Symphony has come to be entirely overlooked: the Allegretto Scherzando, it was supposed, must represent the customary Andante, and the Tempo di Menuetto the customary "Scherzo;" and, since this conception would not work with either of them, the result was that the whole wonderful Symphony, whose middle movements yielded none of the usual effects, came to be looked upon by our musicians as a sort of incidental side work of the Beethoven muse, who after the severe exertion of the A-major Symphony thought she would do something light for once. Accordingly they always drag the Allegretto Scherzando, and then with unwavering resolution treat the Tempo di Menuetto as an enlivening Ländler, and you never know what you have heard when it is done. But commonly one is glad when the torture of the Trio is over. This most charming of all idylls, with the usual swift tempo, and with its triplet passages for the violoncello, becomes a veritable monstrosity: this accompaniment is accounted one of the most difficult of all for violoncellists, who work away up along and down along with its hurried staccato, without producing at the best anything more than an extremely painful scratching. But even this difficulty solves itself naturally and of itself, just so soon as the right tempo, corresponding to the tender song of the horns and clarinets, is taken; while those instruments, on their part, surmount all the difficulties to which the clarinet, particularly, is so painfully exposed, that even its best artist must be constantly in dread of a so-called "squawk" (Kicks). I remember how all the musicians seemed to breathe again when I made them play this piece in the right moderate time, by which means also the humoristic sforzando of the Basses and Bassoons immediately made its intelligible effect, the short crescendi became clear, the soft pianissimo of the closing bars became effective, and indeed the main part of the movement acquired its right expression of an easy, comfortable gravity.

Now once I was present with Mendelssohn at a performance of this Symphony under the conductorship of the late Kapellmeister Reissiger in Dresden, and we conversed together about the dilemma I have just described; I told him I believed that I had come to an understanding with my colleague there beforehand, as to its right solution, for he had promised me to take the tempo slower than usual. Mendelssohn admitted that I was perfectly right. We listened. The third movement began, and to my dismay I had to hear the same old Ländler tempo; but before I could express my indignation, Mendelssohn smiled to me, rocking his head in a contented way, and exclaimed: "Yes, 'tis good so! Bravo!" So from dismay I fell into astonishment. Whether Reissiger was open to severe blame or not—I could readily see that he might have relapsed into the old tempo from reasons which would lead me into farther explanations—Mendelssohn's indifference to this strange artistic proceeding naturally awoke in me the doubt, whether anything distinguishable presented itself here to him at all. I seemed to look into a very abyss of superficiality, into an utter void.

Honor to Beethoven.

[From the London Orchestra, July 15].

The centenary festival is the declaration, by general consent, of what a man is and what he is not. The Art-world resigns the gratification of carping and despising, for the luxury of praising and patronizing. Individual reprobation passes into collective admiration. The innate power of genius has reconciled its enemies, time has leavened the lump, the right decision has been communicated to all, and the poor, misunderstood, degraded, crack-brained artist—crack-brained, because he could and did see inconceivably above every one around him in his day and generation—is at last admitted into the goodly company of apostles and prophets as one who has portrayed passions that all can feel, and manifested truths which all willingly and gladly recognize. No doubt there is somewhat of pretension and affectation in these high solemnizations in honor of the individual artist; but the ceremony is commonly founded upon justifiable pride and honest science, and accompanied with much self devotion and very general affection.

A hundred years ago—a week before the Christmas next coming—there came into this world of ours the Beethoven, who in his lifetime was received only by the few, but whose popularity now is as deserved as it is universal. He appeared in the musical world at an epoch when the colossal giants—having discovered that music meant infinitely more than mere art in sounds, and was one of the highest means of giving outward expression to the soul of man—had resigned the practice of simply obeying directions and working in ordinary forms, and taken to the higher effort of illustrating emotion, describing passion, and grasping the gamut of sounds as the medium of illustrating their analysis of the entire range of the human heart. Handel had turned the accustomed current of harmonical combination into a way of his own, chiefly distinguished for its marvellous unalterability. He knew much and felt much; had settled within himself what would assuredly move, and what was simply necessary to carry on. Whatever his state of mind, he was ever ready to cover so much paper in his own grand and steadfast manner; accurate, reflective, and when necessary discharging the suppressed electric light of his well balanced and thoroughly-held-in-hand imagination. The passion never disturbed him, it only forced out the corresponding expression. He saw all that was necessary, and declined to see more than was necessary. Every great composer in writing draws upon a certain amount of stock kept at command for ready and instant use. Is he gay or melancholy, passionate or enthusiastic? He has the illustrations lying in his brain and memory for each of these feelings; he may do something that he did not do before, but he is not taken off his balance, and is prepared to do all that is required of him. This was essentially the case with Handel, and his accurate perception always led him to a right use of the enormous stock he had treasured up in his youth. Bach had never the means, nor had he the opportunity of accumulating the funds in reserve like Handel. He had never been to Italy, petted by Cardinals, adored by the bright stars of vocalization, worshipping by instrumentalists of world-wide renown, and pondered over and marvelled at by all contemporary composers. Bach was a dweller in small towns, occasionally a visitor at miniature courts, a player on rough and roaring organs, a teacher of inaccurate and occasionally impracticable amateurs, an inhabitant of small cottages, a husband of a wife who brought him children enough for five wives, and thus his opportunities for self-reflection were not apparently very great, and his means of knowledge resulting from observation and compassion were exceedingly limited. These things he found to be right and lovely, and amid much of trial, much of delight, he set to work to do that which lay before him to do. Here he had the advantage over Handel—the calls of the Christian year—real, good, bettering work, work that must be done, and by the best part of his being. As an amateur, he tried the science of music in his own way, beginning with the possible—almost the childish. But work for his choir, food for his congregation, the motet for the day's festival, was his business, the occupation of his life. Not for him was the occasional anthem for a royal wedding, or the burial of a royal consort, or the crowning of the new monarch; his grand Bishop was the humble pastor of his well known parishioners; his audience—tradesmen and the poor; his choir and band—the children from his own school; and the only romance, the only enthusiasm he could get was from the calls for the next Sunday, or the nearest forthcoming feast-day. He needed no more, for they drew from him all that prejudice and foresight, all that learning and judgment, all that heart and imagination could supply. His business was work for the sanctuary—not one of rare doings, high celebrations, gorgeous dressings, and scenic bowings and genuflections—but the sober, decorous, and unpretentious formalism of the Lutheran. He attempted to do well—to do his best, kept on, and ultimately determined the problem—that the legitimate employ of imitative counterpoint was a progressive thing and illimitable—end or perfection, impossible. He had large means as to performance, and there was no necessity to be economical as to time. He started determined to be true to himself and his mission, and was enabled to fulfil it. No living man could take up his mantle. With him died a power that no self-taught man has ever before or since accumulated in one person. The all of difficulty and excellence in the massing of sounds together had been drawn out of him. He obeyed the laws lying in nature for the combination of sounds, and used them with purity and just judgment for the exhibition of thoughts which it has taken a century and a half to understand and appreciate. As the high prophet in music of the Christian life he well painted the best and holiest feelings of our nature. Of the quick dash of Handel in fixing in sounds the lower feelings—the more mundane states—he knew nothing. It was not required of him; but he put into musical forms of love and devotion, of faith and hope, of joy and grief, more than the world had before ever dreamt of. He proved that there was a true life in sounds, and that there was another language besides words for the development of all the best portion of the human heart. Of Bach's children—and he had over a score—none could follow him, and his best taught son, Emmanuel, turned court devotee and walked not after the footsteps of his father. Emmanuel eliminated a courtly system of forms and fashions out of the manuscripts of the old Lutheran Cantor, and opened models for Haydn. The old world spirit and the Christian devotion were lost. Mozart discovered it in his last career, and did just enough to direct the spirit of Beethoven.

But Beethoven in his manhood was not concerned in the music of the sanctuary. He pleaded and worked for truth and heart in musical art, but whether sad or smiling, anxious or weeping, he was outside the work—the true work, doubting and defying, if not absolutely scoffing. And the rancor of the hatred was at times the more intense and fearful from his own knowledge that his real place, his proper duty was only to be found in the sanctuary. His songs, quartets, operas, cantatas, overtures, and symphonies are only so many avant couriers of his grand illustration of the Eucharistical service—the climax of all his work—and only marred by his too great desire to teach its poetry and its faith. To the unbeliever it is merely so much dust and ashes—the confusions of a thoughtful but ill regulated and unbalanced intellect; to the pious in church harmony it is rank heresy; to the conventional artist it is morbid thinking and miserable working. It has no padding, no straw stuffing—there is no dishonor of this sort. But it is Beethoven as Beethoven always was.

If writing the Pastoral Symphony, he made a church of his garden, or of the forest, and was worshipping in his own strange way, for his heart was one reservoir of reverence. By the closing of his outward ears he was shut out of the world, feeling upon his own full feelings with all the simplicity of a child. He more often wrote in a passion, in an agony than aught otherwise, with a vague notion that man was his brother and God his Creator, and it was his duty to instruct the one and honor the other; and his temper was not a little embittered by the perception that his thoughts were mistaken and his purposes rendered of no avail. He held in hatred all hollow and untrue composition, and in some sense with him all music should or ought to be holy music.

His characters in the opera of the "Fidelio" are all decided and real, but they are more like beings of a superior world, and have the true Shakespearean impress. They discuss, open prison doors, dig graves, attempt murders, sing joyful psalms, as if the inmates of some monastery in the wilderness standing out in all its silent serenity, and knowing nothing but its own reclusive world within. Beethoven, like Bach, has left no Elisha; we are in the dark ages—the times of brown—for the tinsel is too transparent to produce any other feeling than the most intense melancholy. There will be no progress without more of the Beethoven faith and the Bach mode of work.

Liszt's "St. Elizabeth."

A writer in the Globe (London) makes the following remarks upon the cantata of the Abbé Liszt, which has recently been performed at the New Philharmonic Concerts:

The story of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, whether viewed from the ultra-Catholic side of the Count de Montalembert, or from the ultra-Protestant side of Canon Kingsley, is an interesting and beautiful story—one whose principal incidents are eminently fitted for artistic treatment. As subjects for the pencil, they have been treated again and again; but the idea of working them into a dramatic poem fitted for musical illustration has seemingly first occurred to, certainly been first carried into effect by, Herr Otto Roquette and the Abbé Liszt. Whether their combined achievement is to be regarded as a final one, admits of a good deal of doubt—doubt only to be satisfactorily resolved in the "future," when almost everything which musicians have hitherto called music has ceased to give pleasure, and not till then. Meanwhile, an opportunity of making acquaintance with the kind of art which is to take the place of the art of Haydn and Mozart has been afforded to those who have not done so already in a performance, under the direction of Dr. Wyld, of the work to which we have referred, "The Legend of St. Elizabeth," tastefully advertised as "the most sensational musical work of modern times"—a title likely, it might have been thought, to be disputed for some of the musical works performed by certain "colored" vocalists who occupy the lower room in St. James's Hall. We go to the hearing of a new musical work, if not always with the hope, certainly with the desire of being pleased with it; and the task of recording and justifying disappointment is as little agreeable to us as disappointment itself. To say that the Abbé Liszt's share in "The Legend of St. Elizabeth" is altogether devoid of beauty or freshness, that there is nothing in it which we recall with pleasure, and over which we would willingly linger in a future inspection of the score, would be to say a great deal too much. The introduction, for example, though unduly protracted, is elegant and agreeably instrumented. A chorus of children in the first scene is fresh and characteristic, and, taken at a somewhat slower pace than it was taken by Dr. Wyld—"con grazia" as it is marked by the composer—would make a good effect. The treatment, also, of the principal motivo, towards the end of the same scene, is graceful and ingenious. But what are a few oases in a desert such as that over which we travelled on Wednesday night, mocked too, as we were so often, till bitter experience taught us better, by so many mirages? Regarded as a whole, the music of "The Legend of St. Elizabeth" is deficient in form and coherence, and disfigured by a greater number of hideous effects than have, it is to be hoped, ever before been included in the same limits of time or space. Choruses, every few bars of which are in some different key or time, are connected together by passages seemingly interminable of aria parlante—suggestive of nothing but astonishment that any singers should ever have been able to execute them with approximate correctness. How far use might reconcile us to some of the combinations which the Abbé Liszt has essayed, we are not in a condition to say. Use will reconcile men, as it is said to reconcile a certain class of anguillide, to a good deal which, without it, is assuredly very hardly borne. But even the worm—not "used" to torment—will turn on its tormentor; and the audience of Wednesday, patiens injurie as they had so far proved, rose against a certain Crusaders' March at the end of the performance, a certain double pedal in which irritated them after a while past endurance. It is needless to say that "The Legend of St. Elizabeth" does not contain anything that could by any figure of speech be called an aria. The rigid exclusion of all such concessions to human weakness is an essential part of the system on which the composer has worked. "When a man talks to me of his system," said Lord Byron, "I give him up." We do not give up the Abbé Liszt, for we are not without hope of hearing him once again on the piano forte—not, however, in his own music.

Music in Race.

Mr. Henry F. Chorley read a paper some time since, with this quaint title, before the Anthropological Society of London. We are indebted to the Choir for the subjoined report:

He began his remarks by apologizing for having made the attempt to deal with so vast a subject as national music in the limits of a single paper. In a course of lectures at the Royal Institution he had some years ago dealt with the subject at greater length. These lectures he had prepared for publication, but had purposely held them back because of the unsettled condition of some parts of the subject. All he could offer at the present time would be fragments, not completed work. The difficulty of knowing how much of national music so called is genuine, was great. His experience convinced him that genuine national music exists in smaller quantities than has been believed. Then how often were airs incorrectly written. Notation, it must be remembered, was a modern art, and could not be accepted without caution. If poets commit errors in writing the ordinary words of their poems, how much more common are mistakes in the multiplicity of signs in musical notation. Of the travellers to whom we are often indebted for the notation of national airs, nearly all are amateurs, and many are ladies. Then as to the ancient pictures of musical instruments, it was a mistake to accept them as correct. Literal truth in art was a thing only recently gained, and this had no doubt been obtained at the expense of imagination. He would not therefore of necessity believe in the pictures of preposterous harps, played by preposterous men, on the walls of Egyptian palaces. While speaking with gratitude to all those who had investigated this subject of national music, he would say that he thought the instruments of the ancients had been too much overlooked. The modification which accent and rate of movement produce in music is very great. Who would suppose that the stirring "Scots wha hae" and the plaintive "Land of the Leal" were the same air? The pastoral air from "Messiah," "He shall feed his flock," was then played, and repeated in double quick time with the accent strongly marked, producing an excellent and pretty dance tune.

In the music of worship, said Mr. Chorley, we must distinguish between what is mystical and what is congregational, between what is witnessed and what is partaken of. For himself, he had never been moved so deeply by gorgeous ritual music such as he had heard at Cologne and Vienna, as he had been by the simple, unisonous singing of a vast congregation, which came upon the ear like the voice of many waters. Here he would notice that in German oratorios, whenever a psalm tune or chorale occurred in the music, it was the custom of the congregation to lift up their voices and swell the sound of choir and orchestra. But in England these oratorios were turned into mere concert music.

After a short reference to the music of the synagogue as the most ancient service music in existence, Mr. Chorley passed on to say that the social conditions and the varying character of different nations affected their music. For example, France and Italy have in their national music nothing to correspond with the German students' songs, while the madrigal comes from the south. He knew of no more vivid expression of nationality in music than was to be found in the German songs of the table. He had in his time done a good deal in adapting English words to German music, but the result has always been unsatisfactory. This could not be helped. To each, his own. The strong, stirring, muscular songs of the Germans have no equivalent. In the early history of nations, as must be evident to all, music did not keep pace with art and manufacture. Witness the curious productions of Eastern mosaic, when compared with the cacophony, the mere drum music, in which the people delighted. Some of the most beautiful national airs come from the north—from Russia, Denmark, Norway, etc. The airs of Serbia were equally noted for beauty. The music of chimes and bells must by no means be overlooked in the study of national music. Their purpose was no doubt originally to warn, and to collect men in cases of danger. Here he could not but be reminded of Miss Ingelow's poem, "The High Tide in Lincolnshire," where the summons from the belfry tower was described with so much force and picturesqueness. The music of bells was so free and so changing that he believed it had suggested many effects in melody. A Norwegian air, evidently indebted in such a way, was put in as an example. In the Low Countries it was the custom of organists to play on the bells, and he had himself tried the art in Holland years ago, but found it to require much more physical strength than he possessed. He had said nothing of the music of our own islands.

He was reminded of the old story of the man who wrote a book on Ireland, one chapter of which ran as follows: "Chap. VI. ON SNAKES IN IRELAND.—There are no snakes in Ireland." With British national music the predicament was of a precisely opposite kind. There was so much to be said that he could not now deal with it to any advantage. He might hope, however, at some future time to resume the subject on which he had so imperfectly spoken that night. A vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Chorley for his paper.

How to Form an Art Museum.

Here is the conclusion of Mr. CHARLES C. PERKINS's very valuable article on Art Museums in the last number of the North American Review:

At the Archæological Congress held at Dresden in 1852, the Baron d'Aufsees exposed his long cherished scheme of establishing a collection of material relating to German history, literature and the fine arts, from the earliest times down to the middle of the seventeenth century, including an archæological and artistic library, and of rendering these treasures useful by publications, manuals and other means. He offered to loan his own vast collections to the museum for a period of ten years. This noble project was received with enthusiasm, and Nuremberg was selected as the city in which it should be carried out. The next year Bavaria approved the resolution, and the Diet at Frankfort decreed that the museum should be called "National." Four years after its foundation it had become so prosperous, through the liberal gifts of King Louis and the kings of Bavaria and Prussia, that its directors were enabled to purchase the noble old Carthusian convent, where its collections, including those purchased from Baron d'Aufsees in 1864, are now arranged. Here are pictures, engravings, tissues, faiences, goldsmiths' work, medals and seals, the most remarkable of which have been reproduced in a series of drawings, photographs and engravings, already 100,000 in number; 60,000 tracings and drawings illustrate secondary classes of art (as, for instance, all forms of the bed from Roman times to the present day), and the history of eminent persons is followed up through portraits, coats of arms, seals and medals. At present such laudable enterprises are subordinate to the purchase of the masterpieces of the past, which are becoming more and more rare. The directors wisely spend their available funds in this way, because they know, to borrow the words of M. Muntz, that when America shall enter into the lists, they will no longer have the opportunity.

This reflection is one which, as Hamlet says, "should give us pause," at least long enough to express the hope that America will not wait until Europe shall have gathered all the harvest of the past into her museums. It strikes us the more, because we have lately met with it elsewhere, even more forcibly expressed. As, for example, in the Chronique des Arts, which counsels France to secure all French masterpieces for her national and municipal museums before America, recognizing the necessity of forming museums, shall compete for them and increase their already enormous value. "The day cannot be far distant," says the writer, "when the United States will desire to form collections, for it is impossible to admit that so intelligent a people can long continue to ignore the fact that fine arts make men moral by raising them to a comprehension of the beautiful, and that they increase the wealth of nations by developing good taste in their artisans."

Accustomed to a central authority which has the power to lead, decree and foster such institutions, we cannot wonder that Europeans are unable to comprehend our backwardness in imitating their example. They forget that individual exertion must here take the place of government action; that the will of many must be first influenced instead of the will of one, and that when this is accomplished we have no palaces and castles to supply us with works of art. They do not recognize that we are called upon to solve a new problem, and to discover some way of overcoming the obstacles which are created by our position.

The history of many ancient and mediæval cities governed by democratic forms, and actively engaged in commercial pursuits, proves that these are compatible with the utmost splendor of art attainment. Athens, Argos and Samos in antiquity, Florence, Venice and Genoa in the Middle Ages, were all commercial and all republican. They were led by men who gave the impulse to popular taste and fostered its growth; Pericles made Athens the artistic glory of Greece, and Cosmo de' Medici decked Florence with art's brightest jewels. Being themselves monarchs in disguise, they formed a radiating centre which illuminated the whole body politic in matters to which democracy and trade are necessarily indifferent. In avowed monarchies we find always the same cause of artistic life or death; namely, the presence or absence of a central directing spirit, whether inspired by selfish motives, and patronizing art to enhance the splendor of a reign, or by noble motives; with these it is one of the most elevating and civilizing influences which can be brought to bear upon a people. In either case the leader must impose it upon his subjects until they have learned to love it, and can no longer exist without it. Munich would still be the insignificant and unattractive capital of a second-rate European kingdom, had not King Louis been filled with an enthusiastic love of art, and a consequent determination to make it one of the richest centres of art upon the continent. While still Crown Prince of Bavaria he employed agents to point out and obtain for him all available masterpieces, and thus the marbles from Ægina, the Barberini Faun, and many other treasures found their way to the Glyptothek instead of the British Museum. So also in England all the growth of industrial art may be traced back to the action of Prince Albert. So also the power vested in the Emperors of Russia and Austria, and the King of Bavaria, has been made use of by enlightened men in their dominions to create the new museums of which we have spoken in these pages.

But where are Americans to find a substitute for this apparently necessary centre of action? This is a question which we have not hitherto been called upon to answer, and which demands our gravest consideration. We cannot hope to find it at Washington, nor in our State governments (though these may eventually aid us by making the study of drawing obligatory in the public schools), nor can we look for it in unassisted individual action, which must be limited and comparatively feeble. Our only hope lies in the stronger action of universities and educational institutes. Harvard and Yale, by founding art professorships, and by aiding art projects to the extent of their ability may put into willing hands the lever with which to move the American world. We look to them for aid as we look to no other source, because we know that they can most reasonably be expected to understand the importance of the work which art museums and schools of design are capable of accomplishing. Our hope for the success of the proposed Museum of Art in Boston, for instance, is mainly grounded upon the consent of its educational institutions to take an active part in its government, and to loan it their art collections. If art is a unit, so is education; the cause of cultivation is one, and whether we labor for it through letters or through art, we are equally serving the same noble end.

If European speculators upon future art collections in America cannot fairly estimate how the absence of a central authority is felt when the attempt is made to found them, neither can they sufficiently enter into our national character to know our dislike of taking such slow, well calculated steps as are necessary to insure their success. The course taken at Kensington and at Vienna, of planting an acorn with hope that it may grow into an oak, does not tally with our impatient desire to realize our ideas at once in full splendor. We need art in America, and some one immediately proposes to purchase the Villa Albini, transport its matchless bas-reliefs from the spot where Winckelmann's fostering care united them, and turn the Casino into an American Academy, which shall at once stand on a par with the French Academy at the Villa Medici. We want museums, and our tendency is to spend all our money in erecting a huge building whose empty halls will do but little to help us toward the end we have in view. What we shall do if we are wise is to begin by building only for the purpose of placing collections already bought or given; or better yet, by hiring for this purpose some vacant rooms, where they can be kept until we have matured our plans and found out exactly what we want. The Kensington Museum began in "the Brompton Boilers," and iron sheds were added to cover new acquisitions; so also the collections at Vienna have been for years kept in the rooms of the Imperial "Ball Haus" awaiting the completion of a building fitting their present importance. So again the collections of the Nuremberg Museum were temporarily placed for eleven years before its directors purchased the Carthusian convent to receive them.

All these examples teach us that our motto should be, "Festina lente." Given that we start with a few rooms full of really good objects,—a collection of Chinese or Japanese lac and enamels, for instance, which it would always be easy to form in this country,—and with works of art loaned for a time by public institutions or private persons, supplemented with as many originals and reproductions as our funds will allow us to purchase, we cannot fail, if we open our doors freely by day and in the evening to the public, to excite an ever-increasing interest which will lead to gifts of money and works of art, and eventually to the erection of such a building as will be an honor and an embellishment to any city.

No man ever regretted the time spent upon a work which when finished was pronounced perfect, and no one ever gauged a result, whether bad or good, by the hours or years spent over it. The only important thing is that when done there should be no cause for regret. Better never have museum buildings than have had ones, for if they are so they will give the lie to that clause of our programme which professes to serve the cause of art through architecture, the oldest and one of the noblest of arts.

A Mass in the (French) Country.

The Saturday Evening Gazette translates the following, which shows what church music comes to sometimes in old Catholic countries.

If the Fête Dieu lasts fifteen days in the Paris suburbs, the Military Mass lasts all the year round at Bourges, says a writer in a late number of L'Opinion Nationale. Imagine the imposing effect produced in the immense Gothic cathedral by a detachment of twenty-two soldiers escorting the regimental band. The little altar bell tinkles freely. Por-rr-tez armes! cries the officer, and at once there begins a "religious" fantasia on themes from Gounod's Faust with solos for the cornet; the music echoes under the sacred arches, and accompanies, without intermission, the morning service. One can hear but little of a Faust fantasia, without murmuring the words of the song, without recalling Goethe's poetic phantoms, without looking round as if for the lost friends whose voices are heard afar off. "Pleasures for me, les folles maîtresses!"—sing three trombones in unison, while the priest intones the Kyrie Eleison. R'ppez v's armes! shouts the captain, to give a little unity of effect. The priest has hardly finished before the flageolet sighs: "Allow me to offer my arm, my beautiful girl," etc. You cast your glances round to see to which Marguerite Faust may be speaking, but you only detect a sapper slyly holding out a snuff-box to a comrade who can hardly reach for a pinch with his gloved fingers, and he swears perceptibly in his beard. The priest has meanwhile been reading some terrible lesson on eternal punishment, and the captain, knowing the absolute need of keeping up a unity of impression, cries in a terrible voice: Por-rr-tez armes!

A ray of sunlight comes through the windows of the choir, and you see illuminated a crowded world of the old saints: Saint Cecilia, leaning on her dumb harp, "the musician of silence," as a contemporary poet has called her; Saint Mark, reclining on a lion; Saint John, with the eagle bearing his pen; Saint Stephen, stoned to death; all of the heroic legends of the primitive church—the period of the martyrs before that of the executioners. The paintings in the windows were spread extensively over the pavements by the light which passed through them, and all the painted figures seemed to breathe. "Let me look at thy face," sings the cornet, and the vision is gone. Faust and Marguerite again pass before you. "Let me look at thy face," insists the cornet, just at the moment when the chorister raises the chaubon of the priest. "To your knees!" says the captain. They beat a salute. "Vive l'Emp!" begins a heedless soldier, who is immediately hushed up. The little bell sounds oftener, but not less feebly. The Faust fantasia is stopped just at the point where a religious sentiment enters into Gounod's work, and the mass is over. The twenty-two soldiers put their twenty-two guns on their left shoulders, and the crowd slowly melts away before them.

A Sketch of the Troubadours, Trouveres, and Minstrels.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

[From an interesting Series of Articles in the "New York Weekly Review."]

In Provence, on the flowery shores of the Durance, in the land where Grecian culture, tended by the Romans, had never wholly been destroyed, where the arts of peace had long flourished, and yet more richly after the migrations of the nations, and in emulation of the Spanish Arabs; under the brilliant heaven of Southern France, where nature, womanly beauty, manly courage, and courtly manners lent their highest charms to life, the luxuriant flower of lyric song first sprang forth among the troubadours. It is true that the music and poetry of the troubadours was a natural outgrowth of that epoch of stirring life, of love, longing, hatred, joy and melancholy; but every mental growth demands its appropriate soil. And only in the highest circles could an appropriate field for lyric song then exist among men set apart from, and above the merchant and laboring classes, subject to King and Church, yet devoid of asceticism and inspired with a love of freedom and order; accustomed to splendor, beauty, and ceremony from childhood, and yet regarding the culture of letters as an occupation of equal honor with that of the profession of arms. Though the profession of singer had been regarded as an honorable one since the time of the Gallic bards, and though the jongleurs, musical and poetic conjurers who travelled from castle to castle for the entertainment of barbarous chieftains, had preceded the troubadours, it was only towards the end of the eleventh century that it came to be considered as a matter of perhaps even more consequence that a youthful knight should know how to compose, sing, and play, than that he should invent verses, and read and write correctly. The Romance tongue or Provençal language, afterwards called the Langue d'oc, in which the troubadour songs were written, was already formed, and accepted as the language of the people, in the beginning of the twelfth century. It had been spoken, though in an unformed state, as early as the ninth century, by Charlemagne and his successors. The art of the troubadour was entitled the gai saber (or gaie science), and to the idea of gaiety a noble meaning was attached. The true chevalier, it was said, should never lose his normal feeling of enthusiasm and joy; like an interior sun, the joy of love should illumine his life, and continually excite him to lofty actions and fortitude in trial, purifying his soul from envious, sombre sadness, from avarice, torpidity, and hardness of mind. Melancholy was regarded as a morbid feeling born of scepticism and degeneracy, a want of power to accomplish great deeds or duties. Gaiety or joy was a state of mind regarded by the troubadours as corresponding with that of religious grace. The end of their profession was the service of religion, honour, and woman, in deed and in song; one of their mottoes was "Love and religion protect all the virtues;" another ran, "My soul to God, my life for the king, my heart for my lady, my honour for myself." Now, as once before, in apostolic times, Christianity displayed its creative power, and in a territory apparently opposed to its own aims and the ascetic tendency of the church—the domain of profane honour and love—the life of which was expressed in songs whose freedom was antagonistic, as their mysticism was related, to the spirit of early Christianity; songs so exalted in character, so devoid of vulgar licentious feeling, that they seem to float like forms of light above the troubled waters of those troublous times.

Although the aristocratic element certainly preponderated among the troubadours, they often allowed poetic genius to atone for lowness of birth, bestowing the order of Knighthood, and admitting to their ranks men who did not possess the distinction of nobility. North of the Loire, the citizens and the nobility were considered as orders far removed, consequently we find only a few of what we should term professional men, and still fewer citizens, among the ranks of the trouveres of the North (the successors of the troubadours, who wrote in the langue d'oïl or langue Française).

The troubadour most esteemed was he who could invent, compose, sing, and accompany his own songs; but those who were unable to play the instruments of the period—the harp, lute, viola, or citara (the ancient Irish rotla or crowth)—were accompanied by a salaried minstrel, who perhaps also arranged the accompaniment which he played; in the South, the minstrels were termed jongleurs, or violars. If a troubadour was not gifted with a fine voice, he employed a singer (cantadour or musear) to perform the songs which he could create, but not sing. Many among the troubadours and their successors, the trouvères of the North, were so gifted as satirists, that their satirical songs (sirventes) were dreaded in the highest quarters, and became social and political weapons, not unlike, in their influence, the leading articles of our principal journals to-day. They also mingled, with the recital of recent actions, that of the great deeds of Charlemagne, Charles Martel, and other renowned soldiers; though they sometimes ridiculed even these, and made them serve as mere foils to the virtues of a conventional and imaginary hero. With these exceptions, the same general mood is to be found in the songs of the troubadours, which seem to have been written from the same point of view, and only differ in form, where they display very great variety. The songs of the trouvères, modelled on those of the troubadours, in spite of being written in a different idiom, the langue d'oïl, cannot be said to have originated another school, but followed the type which the langue d'oc so finely coloured; they all treat of a mistress, insensible to the cruel, yet pleasing torments which her charms have inspired, and to her lover's misery in absence; or they contain praises of the pleasure felt in supporting the pain and sacrifices imposed on the lover by the honored lady. We find metaphysical and abstract obscurity enough, in some of the later specimens of these poems, written after the use of allegory became common; but nearly all of the earlier ones betray the fire of veritable passion and inspiration. The palm of purely lyric, musical song properly belongs to the Southern troubadours, however; the trouvères, who drew greatly on the primitive Saxon and Celtic traditions, excelled in longer romances, such as the Roman du Rou, the Percival, and many others, which were afterwards imitated by the German Minnesänger.

The merit of the troubadours and trouvères in furthering the progress of music as an art, was, that they liberated melody from the fetters of calculation, gave it the stamp of individuality, and bore it, on the wings of fancy, into the domain of sentiment. They had the further merit of introducing new and peculiar rhythmic changes of time, which, apparently irregular, were really forcible, symmetrical, and original. It is also more than probable, as I have already remarked, that the troubadours received new ideas in regard to melody, from the East, as they found among the Arabs not only a different system of tones, but many fanciful vocal ornaments, then unknown in Europe, and which they introduced in their own songs, on their return from the crusades. But as harmony was in that day yet undeveloped, the flowing vine of melody received little support from it, and therefore often appears weak. The rules of composition were then highly complicated and ill classified, yet they were well understood by the best educated troubadours, and though their earlier songs were stiff, closely resembling the Gregorian chant in form and style, in some of the latter ones, especially those of the Northern trouvères, we find graceful melodies that leave little to be desired, and that possess more real variety and individuality of character than do the words attached to them. Their charm is, to the musician, unique, genuine, healthy, vigorous and sweet as the songs of a choir of birds, heard on a spring morning in the heart of a fresh and dewy wood, when the wind is blowing, and the sun shining.

Music Abroad.

London.

HONOR TO BEETHOVEN BY THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY—A hundred years ago Beethoven was born, and Beethoven commemorations are just now in fashion. In Germany their number will be legion before the actual birthday arrives next December; while even New York has found time to keep the feast, burning gunpowder, hammering anvils, and singing "Hail Columbia" in honor of the mighty master, with as much zest as Boston displayed, not long ago, when making a similar noise in honor of peace. Observing all this, English music lovers have been anxious about the credit of their own nation, which cannot afford to let the event pass unnoticed. There was good cause for anxiety. The Crystal Palace, rarely backward in stimulating hero-worship, kept, as it still keeps, silence, and the programme of the festivals at Birmingham and Hereford showed, as it still shows, a neglect of Beethoven utterly unaccountable. Happily the Philharmonic Society came to the rescue, and on Monday last honored itself as well as the master by giving a special performance of certain representative works. Our oldest musical institution could do this with singular propriety and grace. It had relations with Beethoven himself of the most honorable sort; engaging his services in health, and when his countrymen neglected him in sickness, easing the burden of care laid by scanty means upon a sensitive nature. "Say to these worthy men that if God restores me to health I shall endeavor to prove the reality of my gratitude by my actions." This was all the acknowledgment Beethoven could make; but the Philharmonic Society may well regard it as the greatest distinction earned during fifty-eight years of labor. A connection begun thus, and sustained by frequent performances of the master's works, imposed an obvious duty upon the society which has been discharged with earnestness and success.

The programme showed the different styles of the master at several stages of his career; and did so in a manner to which little or no objection could be made, bearing in mind the conditions under which it was drawn up. With regard to several selected dates works more thoroughly representative might have been chosen; but the limits of a single concert are far too narrow for the adequate illustration of even a part of Beethoven's career. All things considered, therefore, the Philharmonic programme was a satisfactory scheme. It began with the Symphony in C, No. 1 (1800), and ended with the Symphony in D minor, No. 9 (1823), the years between being represented by the Choral Fantasia (1808); the overture to Leonora, No. 3 (1806); the scene "Ah! perfido"

(1796); the terzetto "Tremate, empi, tremate" (1801); and the Dervish chorus from the Ruins of Athens (1811). Both symphonies were well, if not perfectly given, the purely orchestral movements of No. 9 showing especial care in performance. As a matter of course the Ode to Joy—for which it is vain to wish a faultless rendering—tried the chorists somewhat; but its difficulties were overcome with more than average ease, while the solos, entrusted to Miss Arabella Smythe, Miss Elton, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley, could hardly have been in better hands. The Leonora overture calls for no remark, but the Choral Fantasia has seldom been performed in a fashion more worthy of its surpassing beauty. Mme. Arabella Goddard's rendering of the solo part, for example, was distinguished by exquisite taste and brilliant execution to a striking degree, and fairly won for the accomplished pianist a demonstrative recall. An encore was awarded to "Ah! perfido," which Mlle. Nilsson sang with a dramatic power leaving absolutely nothing to desire; and a like honor fell to the Dervish chorus.

It deserves to be noticed, in conclusion, that during the Philharmonic season Mr. Cusins has directed the performance of all Beethoven's symphonies; and that, as a special feature of Monday's concert, a bust of the great musician, surrounded by flowers, had a conspicuous place.—Musical World, July 16.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The operas given since we last referred to the doings at this theatre have been La Sonnambula, Un Bullo in Maschera, La Figlia del Reggimento (followed by acts 2 and 3 of Masaniello), Don Giovanni (with Signor Mario, vice Herr Wachtel, as Don Ottavio—a change of which few would be likely to complain), Fra Diavolo, Dinorah, Hamlet, Le Domino Noir, and I Puritani—all but three of them repetitions. Amateurs of the old school, who remember that until Mr. Lamley introduced his famous "long Thursdays," which combined singing with dancing in almost equal proportions, the nights for Italian opera were two (Tuesdays and Saturdays), may reasonably look with amazement at the present state of things. During one week (the week before last), there were no less than ten performances of Italian opera—six at Covent Garden, and four at Drury Lane. If these ten performances were all more or less productive, the conclusion must inevitably be adopted that, from a luxury, Italian opera has become a necessity. However our inclination might tend that way, we are, nevertheless, unable to think so. Necessities are not to be paid for at opera prices, any more than bread and beer are to be paid for as venison and champagne.

As Elvira in the Puritani—that often vainly revived opera of Bellini—Mme. Adelina Patti has won a new triumph. That she could sing the music to perfection no one ever doubted, any more than that she would give dramatic significance to a part however in itself devoid of significance (which may be said more or less of all the dramatis personæ in the Puritani). Mme. Patti does both, and if any artist now living could impart new life to Bellini's last opera it would be this young and gifted lady. The other parts are sustained by Mlle. Locatelli (Henrietta), Signor Vizzani, the new tenor (Arturo), Signors Baggiolo, Graziani, Rossi, and Fallar (Ricardo, Giorgio, "Sir Bruno," and Walton. About these, Signor Vizzani excepted, there is nothing new to say; but to the Elvira of Mme. Patti we hope to return. Enough just now that her reception was throughout enthusiastic.

The operas which have been given this week are the Puritani, second time (Monday); Le Nozze di Figaro (Tuesday); and Don Giovanni, with Mme. Lucre, for the first time in England, as Zerlina (Thursday). To the Zerlina of Mlle. Lucre we may return. The opera announced for this evening is Il Barbiere.—Ibid, July 16.

DRURY LANE.—The Orchestra, of July 22nd, says:

At Drury Lane, on Wednesday afternoon, an overcrowded house, despite the torrid heat, hung delightedly on Mlle. Nilsson's accents in Marguerite. The tenor was a new comer, Signor Perotti, who ventured, without a rehearsal, on music which he had not sung for two years. His debut was very favorable; he possesses a voice of good quality, and an easy intelligent style: the Faust indeed was by no means a pendant to the Marguerite. The names of Mme. Trebelli Bettini (Siebel), Santley (Valentine), and Faure (Mephistopheles), show the excellent cast which, in conjunction with the Swedish singer, made the representation perfect in all respects.

The other operas at Drury Lane which have filled up the week have been "La Sonnambula"—Mlle. de Murska as Amina—"Otello" with Mlle. Nilsson's charming Desdemona, and "Il Trovatore" with the Hungarian prima donna as Leonora. Interest centres upon the production of "The Flying Hollander" on Saturday. This work—in the earliest style of Wagner—contains none of his latest mannerisms, but abounds in music not only of a high but as easily appreciable order.

On reading the accounts published of the magnificent scenery secured, after being expressly stipulated for, by Herr Wagner for his opera of "Walkyrie," one is tempted (says the Pall Mall Gazette) to inquire how it is that a composer who, in his critical writings, is never tired of inveighing against the depraved and sensual character of modern operatic representations, and of proclaiming his own idealist expositions, should condescend to rest his chances of success to so great an extent on the splendor of mere decorative accessories. When the "Rheingold" was about to be produced last year, it may be remembered that Herr Wagner stopped the rehearsals, and put off the first representation of this work for some considerable time, on the ground that the scenery was insufficient; and, in fact, the scenery, when the opera was at last brought out, was worthy of a Porte St. Martin féerie or, better still, of a Drury Lane pantomime. It cannot be said that the musical element was neglected in the "Rheingold," for a series of curiously contrived tableaux were unfolded and exhibited to a continuous musical accompaniment, which lasted four hours. This mere "prologue," as Herr Wagner called it, was, it is true, divided into four acts, but the acts were separated only by dioramic effects, during which the music was carried on without any interval of repose, without even such breaks as are mercifully interposed between the movements of symphonies. We can well understand that an opera by Herr Wagner would be very trying without magnificent scenery, but before he can be said to have attained a legitimate success as a musical composer he ought to be tested even as that object of his scorn, Rossini, even as the contemptible and scarcely to be named Donizetti, have been tested—by having some one work performed in which the scenery will be as gorgeous as that of "Il Barbiere," the costumes as picturesque as those of "Don Pasquale." Meyerbeer, taunted with the important part assigned in his works to scenery, ballets, processions, and mise en scène generally, replied, when he had leisure to do so, by composing "Dinorah," the simplest and certainly one of the most charming operas in existence—"Der Fliegende Holländer" (or "The Damned Dutchman" as the opera by Wagner announced for performance at Drury Lane is called in the Italian version) is not a true Wagnerian work, or no manager unsupported by a subvention would think of bringing it out. Its melodies have, like Italia, "the fatal gift of beauty." It is, in fact, written in the first manner of Wagner, whereas he is now in his third or fourth—new developments of style being visible, it is said, in each of his two last operas, "Rheingold" and "Walkyrie." It is a remarkable fact that in experimenting with Herr Wagner managers have thought it expedient to "try back." After "Tannhäuser" (1845) no Paris manager could be found rash enough to make a still more advanced demonstration with "Rheingold" (1869). The director of the Theatre Lyrique, confirmed Wagnerist as he was, would not even risk "Lohengrin" (1850). He preferred to go back all the way to "Rienzi" (1842), the first of Herr Wagner's operas; and now the manager of Drury Lane, instead of the once contemplated "Tannhäuser," wisely contents himself with such an early work as "L'Olandese Dannato," otherwise "Der Fliegende Holländer,"—Herr Wagner's second opera, produced immediately after "Rienzi," at Dresden, in 1843, when the composer was chiefly under the influence of the thoroughly melodious Weber.

THE BIRMINGHAM TRIENNIAL FESTIVAL will be held on the 30th and 31st of August and the 1st and 2nd of September. Much complaint is made because the programme is made up with so little thought of Beethoven's Centennial birthday; and as a consequence, the "scheme" has been modified so far as to give up one half of one evening concert to selections from the master's works. Truly a small allowance! For the rest:

Its leading features are identical with those of the preliminary programme already noticed, but some of the minor arrangements are modified and others are entirely new. The principal artists will be as follows:—Vocalists—Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Lemmons-Sherrington, Miss Edith Wynne, Mlle. Irma di Murska, Mme. Patey, Mlle. Drasdil, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Vernon Rigby, W. H. Cummings, Santley, and Signor Poli. Instrumentalists:—Mme. Arabella Goddard, M. Sainton, and Mr. Stimpson. The festival will open on Tuesday morning with a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah. The other morning performances will be Costa's Naaman on Wednesday, The Messiah on Thursday, Benedict's new oratorio, St. Peter, composed expressly for this festival, and a miscellaneous selection. On Wednesday evening, a new instrumental work by Mr. A. S. Sullivan, and a choral ode by Dr. Stewart, both composed for this festival, followed by a selection from the works of Beethoven; on Thursday evening, a new cantata, Nala and Damayanti, composed for this festival by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, and a miscellaneous selection; on Friday evening Handel's Samson. The President is the Earl of Bradford; the conductor, Sir Michael Costa.

MUNICH.—It is proposed to get up a Beethoven Festival here, as in other places. Herr von Perfall, chairman of the committee, has offered to contribute, at the Theatre Royal, to the programme a performance of Prometheus, Fidelio, and Die Ruinen von Athen, with a new text by Herr Paul Heyse. The musical direction of the whole Festival is to be offered to Herr Franz Lachner.

The grand rehearsal of Herr R. Wagner's latest effusion, Die Walküre, took place on the 24th June before a select few—about a thousand—who had received invitations. It lasted from twelve o'clock till a quarter past five, p.m. Of course the Wagnerites present were in raptures—in ecstasies—in a frenzy of delight, but the majority of the audience were far from evincing a similar amount of undiluted enthusiasm. To tell the truth, they did exactly the reverse, and had the bad taste to manifest unmistakable signs of dissatisfaction. It was only after the first act that there was anything approaching hearty applause. During all the second act, which, laden with bombastic fustian, musical and verbal, dragged its slow length along, for one hour and a half, by Shrewsbury—and every other—clock, there was not a hand. At the conclusion of the third, and last, act, the audience were so thoroughly worn out that it was with difficulty they could muster strength and resolution to get up a call for their fellow-sufferers, the victims on the other side the foot-lights. The pains taken in mounting the work exceeds, in the opinion of very competent judges, anything previously known, even in the case of works by the Prophet of the Future himself. Every one, even the Prophet's most fanatic admirers, must acknowledge the untiring efforts of the Intendant, Baron von Perfall, and of the conductor Herr Willner. Herr R. Wagner is deeply indebted to both, for, should the work succeed, its success will be attributable quite as much to the unflagging zeal and energy of these two gentlemen as to the mise-en-scène, splendid—and dangerous—though that is.

As a German contemporary observes, Herr R. Wagner would experience some difficulty in meeting with another Intendant, who, after such gross attacks from a composer, would devote himself, from early morning to a late hour in the night, to ensuring the success of one whose aim it was morally to annihilate him.—The first regular performance took place on the 15th of June. Of course, the Wagnerites declare it was a great success—a splendid triumph, but others not quite so blindly devoted to the master of Lacerne, are bold enough to differ, and, what is more, to say so publicly. There is, however, one fact connected with the first performance which cannot fail to gratify even Herr R. Wagner's most bitter foes: despite the "fire effects"—effects which must strike terror into the hearts of those companies with whom the theatre is insured—the building was not burned down—at least, not on the first night.

Das Rheingold is to be revived, and will alternate with Die Walküre.—The Berlin Echo says:—"For the general rehearsal of the first act of Die Walküre, the theatre was completely lighted up. The scene represents 'the interior of a dwelling,' in the midst of which a mighty oak rears itself. The roots of the 'hero-tree' are hid beneath the ground, but its leafy summit spreads over the roof, which slopes down from the trunk. A room is erected around the latter; this is Hunding's habitation, and, we may add, a magnificent specimen of the scene-painter's art. On the rising of the curtain, a fearful thunder-storm is raging, and a stranger seeks refuge in the hut. He is speedily captivated, 'in increasing smittenness,'* by the longing glances of Siegelinde, Hunding's wife, and, on the conclusion of the song—a love-song of an undigested sensual character—"presses furiously to his breast" his hostess, in whom he has found and recognized his 'bride and sister'—his sister, too, by both the same parents. Upon this the 'curtain falls quickly.' This finale inhabitants of Munich already know, from having heard it at a concert at which Richard Wagner introduced himself to them, in December, 1864, by giving fragments from his later works. In the second act, the famous 'ride of the Walkyres' will probably be remembered by the public of Vienna, from having been performed at one of the seven concerts given by Wagner during his residence in that capital, seven years ago. The dangerous fire-machinery in the second and the third acts, when the sleeping Brunhilde is surrounded by glowing flames, has been done away with, since, after all, people did not feel inclined to endanger the building, together with a number of human lives, even though it was for a 'Walkyre.' The Echo might have interpolated "most" before "dangerous." There are still enough fire-effects left to satisfy a Guebre himself.—Mus. World.

BOSTON, AUG. 18, 1870.

Jules Padeloup.

In the want of other matter during the utter musical suspension, while war is raging abroad and the dog star here, we translate, from the Signale of Leipzig, a sketch of the originator and leader of the Popular Classical Orchestral Concerts in Paris, of which we have heard so much:—Not a man of the highest type of artistic character, by this showing; for while his diplomatic managerial gifts, his art of pushing himself forward in the world, are celebrated, not much is said of his intrinsic musicianship. That such a "man of the world" should go in for Wagner and new fashions is quite natural: but whether this is the kind of endorsement they are most in need of?

"Pas-de-loup (literally the German Wolfgang) is unquestionably one of the most interesting musical personalities who have come up in the epoch of the second French Empire. Thoroughly a child of his time, he knows just its needs and wishes; has a fine sense, not only of the now reigning, but also of the next to be expected direction of public opinion; understands how to seize the right moment, and how to choose his man. He trusts his star as he trusts himself, and makes others too believe in it. A man of the initiative, he possesses character and persistency enough to put through much which he perhaps could not accomplish merely by his talent. But he dares and wins. His motto is: Audentes fortuna juvat. He is the man of musical state-craft and diplomatic stratagem.

"Padeloup's youthful history is veiled in an impenetrable obscurity, which we have tried in vain to clear up. He himself refuses to give any information about it, and he may have his reasons for such silence. Not even can the year of his birth be ascertained exactly; but Padeloup must, so far as we can reckon, have been born in 1817. We know that he, as a pupil in the Conservatoire of Paris, in the year 1833 received a prize in Zimmermann's class for pianoforte playing. In the class of the excellent harmonist Leborne he studied the theory of composition, without getting very far along in it. His musical education seems to have been at that time but a superficial one; when he left the Conservatoire he earned his living in a modest way by giving lessons on the piano and by—dance compositions, which he was prudent enough, however, not to publish under his own name.

"Then came the revolutionary year of 1848, for him the year of fortune. He had given music lessons, among others, to the son of a M. Marie. This gentleman became a member of the provisional government. Padeloup understood how to turn his family acquaintances to some political account, and he became—Gouverneur in the palace of St. Cloud. But this position came to a speedy end with the end of the Republic. The approach of the Coup-d'Etat gave Padeloup a new watchword. He knew how to make himself agreeable to the family of President Napoleon, and succeeded in becoming the organizer of musical soirées at the house of the Princess Mathilde. There too he made the acquaintance of Count Nieuwerkerke, whose musical soirées at the Louvre he likewise helped to organize, and who has ever since remained his warm protector. In the same way Padeloup ingratiated himself with the then all-powerful Prefect of the Seine department, Baron Haussmann, whose lasting protection he secured no less.

"Through these influential channels Padeloup became Professor in the Conservatoire. He was entrusted with the direction of a class for ensemble-playing; in which the orchestra composed of pupils, became acquainted with the classical masterworks. Again did Padeloup turn this honorable musical position to account with his usual skill in getting upward. In all probability, it was in the capacity of Director of this ensemble class, that he first learned how to direct himself; but he went on building up an orchestra of his own out of the Conservatorists placed at his disposal, with which he gave concerts, which formed the beginning for the Concerts Populaires which afterwards became so celebrated. Immediately after the coup d'Etat he founded the 'Société des jeunes artistes du Conservatoire impérial de musique et de déclamation,' the first concert of which took place in the Saal Herz on the 20th Feb., 1851. This Concert Society lasted nine years; but, in spite of the high protectors who shielded and supported Padeloup's undertaking, it failed to acquire any independent vitality. An enthusiastic, wealthy friend of Art, whose name is universally known and respected in Paris, supported these concerts in the most generous manner, spending not less than 80,000 francs upon them during the nine years.

"Then Padeloup conceived the happy idea of quitting the little Saal Herz, and transporting his young Orchestra to the Cirque Napoléon, which can conveniently hold 5,000 persons. Of course his orchestra had to be strengthened for this purpose, and the whole plan of the undertaking became a new one and much greater. Thus arose the Concerts Populaires, whose great success soon bore the name of Padeloup beyond the boundaries of Paris and of France.

In the founding of this Concert institution Padeloup proceeded upon entirely correct calculations. By the low price of admission he enabled even those of small means to attend these classical concerts, upon which there still rested a certain reflected glory of the Conservatoire. While he thus covered himself pecuniarily, he at the same time gave in his allegiance to the Napoleonic-democratic principle of universal suffrage in music, to which he imparted the requisite imperialistic coloring through the selection of the concert hall, which bore the Emperor's name. But in an artistic point of view he arrayed himself in silent, if not express, opposition against the aristocratic, conservative concerts of the mother Conservatoire, who had to lend him her own pupils for the purpose. Pas-deloup is altogether a man of musical progress,—whether from deep inmost prompting, or only in consequence of a correct perception of the tendency of the times and the conviction, that for him a new and large arena was only to be won in this way, we know not. Nor does it matter which. Already the fact, that Padeloup has seized the banner of musical progress with success, and held it high for ten years without wavering, proves to us evidently, that the epoch of the musical Future has come for France also, breaking ground for itself triumphantly. Moreover Padeloup has personally the sincerest reverence and warmest sympathy for Richard Wagner; he is a Wagner enthusiast from inmost conviction. The other new and newest composers he adopts not less frequently into his programmes, recognizing that a normal Art institute of the present day cannot and ought not to ignore such any longer. He is not deterred by opposition, nor by seeming failure in the first trial of new works; often his energy and his persistency convert the failures into actual successes.

"It is purely on business grounds that Padeloup has been less lucky as director of the Theatre Lyrique. He undertook the charge of Carvalho's Opera establishment in September, 1868, in a very dilapidated condition; and, although protected here too by the Seine Prefect, Haussmann, he was only able, with severe exertion, to postpone the long expected fall of the Theatre Lyrique for a year and a half, but not prevent it finally. That Padeloup lost his great suit against Carvalho, and Haussmann lost the Prefecture, served to hasten the catastrophe.

"But Padeloup cannot be expected to rest a great while; he must soon be coming forward with some new undertaking. He is not the man to haul in his sails so soon and quit the scene. His Concerts Populaires have raised up various imitations, both abroad and in Paris itself, doing the original establishment so far more good than harm. When Gounod resigned the direction of the 'Orphéon,' Padeloup became his successor there. Since 1864 he has been a knight of the Legion of Honor."

In Memoriam.

The celebration of the centennial year of BEETHOVEN is not confined to musical festivals and concerts. These have occurred and will occur in many places throughout Christendom, and at various dates throughout the year; though possibly the war may seriously interfere with some of those in Germany, particularly that, which did bid fair to be one of the most interesting, at his birthplace, Bonn upon the Rhine. Let us hope, however, that the prompt way in which the Germans thus far have repelled invasion and turned the tables on Napoleon, may give them breathing time, and render them more prompt than ever to remember that the author of the Nine Symphonies was a great German and a hater of all forms of despotism. Did he not tear up the dedication page of his Eroica, when the first Napoleon became Emperor!

But besides the Festivals, the year is distinguished by memorial publications in the name of Beethoven. One now lies before us, which is perhaps the most elegant, artistic specimen of musical publication that has yet appeared. It is an édition de luxe of his unique and only opera, "Fidelio," (for voices and piano) issued by J. Rieter-Biedermann (Leipzig and Winterthur). Externally the book is most attractive; a large quarto, bound in scarlet cloth, very richly gilt and embossed; printed on smooth, heavy paper of the finest texture; while the music engraving and the type of the reading matter are simply perfect; so too are the impress and the even blackness of the ink. Opposite the exquisite title page is a portrait, engraved from careful comparison of the best existing likenesses with a mask taken from the face of the composer after death. It is the most impressive portrait of him that we have yet seen. Then follow: a poetical tribute "An Beethoven!" by Paul Heyse; a Preface both in German and in French; two pages of facsimile of the autograph score of the music, as it exists in the Royal Library at Berlin; and the complete libretto, first in German, then in French, since the story was originally taken from that language. The book is furthermore illustrated by beautiful designs from the pencil of Moritz von Schwind, embodying (somewhat in the style of Kaulbach) some of the leading scenes in the opera.

The arrangement of the music has been made expressly, with the greatest care, from the full score published in the Complete Works of Beethoven by Breitkopf and Härtel. There are frequent indications of the orchestration; and it is undoubtedly a much better pianoforte arrangement than we had before. Both the common Overture in E, and the great one in C (No. 3), are prefixed, arranged for four hands. Verily it is a luxury to recall the wondrous harmonies as you turn over pages all so beautifully perfect to the eye. Such a volume is most timely, and doubtless many a Christmas present next December among music-lovers (in Germany at least) will take this form. What the cost of the book might be, imported, we know not; but in Leipzig it costs less than ten dollars of our paper currency.

A curious contribution is mentioned in the American Bookseller's Guide, as follows:

From E. J. Gunther, of Leipzig, who is about to issue a new cheap edition of Beethoven's Life by L. Nohl, we have a most elegantly got up little volume entitled Beethoven's Breviary, being a collection of the passages from poets and authors extracted and annotated by himself, together with a sketch of Beethoven's intellectual development, edited by the author just mentioned. "Those who know Beethoven's eagerness to obtain new ideas by reading, and his invariable habit, in creating, of following some poetical idea, will at once appreciate the importance and interest that attaches to this selection of Nohl's." Nothing, indeed, could afford a better insight into the great master's mind; his moral and religious notions and his views of life are here laid bare. The principal extracts are from Shakespeare, Homer, Sturm's Reflections (Beethoven's solace for many years), Goethe's West-Eastern Divan, beside others from Müller, Werner, Senne, Herder, Schiller.

We also read that Mr. J. Towers, of Brighton, England, is preparing for publication during the year a Life of Beethoven, based on the contributions of Ries and Wegeler, Moscheles, A. W. Thayer, and others, and containing a correct chronological catalogue of the composer's works. This latter field has been, one would suppose, pretty nearly exhausted by Thayer, of whom Mr. Towers has been an intimate associate. Probably Mr. Towers intends merely a short and popular biography to serve until the completion of our friend Thayer's great work. Could we only hope to see that complete, and in English too, before the centennial birthday, it would be indeed a timely monument in which we all should heartily rejoice!—This reminds us of a neglected duty, namely, to correct the erroneous impression conveyed by a paragraph which has been widely circulated in the newspapers of late. It is taken from an interesting letter by the Rev. Dr. J. P. Thompson, of New York, about the "Beethoven Jubilee" farce (as it turned out) in that city, and is as follows:

Later in the year the Germans will commemorate Beethoven by a festival of their own. It is to the honor of America that the best life of Beethoven is that written by Mr. A. W. Thayer in the German language, and published at Berlin in 1866—though it is to our discredit that it has not found a translator, and a market in the author's native land.

Under the circumstances, it cannot properly find a translator, for the reason that Mr. Thayer writes his book himself in English. The first volume, in which he only gets the young Beethoven fairly settled in Vienna, he had translated into German by a German friend in Bonn, under the eye of the lamented Otto Jahn, and published in Berlin in 1866, in order to call out the German criticism upon that important part before completing the work; his intention being finally to bring it out both in German and in his own English.

Here too we would call attention to the advertisement of Messrs. L. Prang & Co., Art Publishers, who propose to issue, "in time for the Centennial," a Chromo portrait of Beethoven, after the celebrated original by Schimon in the Royal Library at Berlin; to be sold by subscription only.

And here again we are reminded that the Boston Music Hall has within the past year added to its valuable collection of original portraits of Beethoven's contemporaries in Vienna, an admirable copy in oil of the portrait painted there by Mähler, and which Mr. Thayer considers the best of all the portraits. This, like its companions, was the gift of Mr. Gardner Brewer.

SCOTCH MUSIC.—Mr. Macfarren, in his essay on "The National Music of our Native Land," printed in the London Musical Times, says that many things which we are wont to call Scotch have nothing Scotch in them but the calling. Much of the music called Scotch came from Ireland. Here are a couple of extracts:

The proximity of the north of Ireland to the western shore of this island, so facilitated intercourse between the inhabitants of the two regions, that, down to the time of Elizabeth, that is, for a thousand years, there appears to have been a constant influx of harpers into North Britain, many of whom are named among the bards of Scotland. Subsequently, when the arts of peace supplanted those of war, when commerce took the place of conquest, the natural ease of transit, increased by improvements in navigation, induced many a man from this side of the sea to cross over to the other in pursuit of profit. The characteristics of the music and the principles of its construction had been imported hither, with the instruments on which it was played: many of the tunes, modified by what I have called the editorship of the people, were now carried back. Hence, the difficult distinction between Scotch and Irish tunes has increased in difficulty, and lessened in distinctness. Such tunes as "Farewell to Lough-ber," (the march of James II. when he returned to Ireland), and as "Gramachree" and "Aileen Aroon" of earlier date, are samples of the confusion.

The particular tendency of the Reformation in North Britain was most pernicious to music. All singing, but of hymns, was accounted carnal and sinful; and to sing even sacred songs from written notes, was regarded as Popish and abominable. To read from note being forbidden, to study music was of course neglected, if indeed it was not included in the legal prescription. The use of musical instruments was interdicted in the churches, and it ceased to be practised in the people's homes. The violent epithets applied to dancing are shocking to an unprejudiced reader, and the horror in which this exercise was held compelled the silence of dance tunes. Bagpipe playing was restricted to marches, to military service, and to official, if not to state occasions. One among many examples of this musical intolerance is the magisterial prohibition, in 1680, of the town pipe to pipe at Aberdeen. "It being an uncivil form to be used in so famous a borough." In those days, a girl would be subject to the ducking-stool, were she found singing a ballad in the public street. Such principles have held ground from the days of John Knox to our own, and it is only quite lately that the public performances of Oratorios and the use of the organ in divine worship have been suffered in Scotland. Art withers without cultivation, and it could not but be that, under its circumstances, music fell soundly asleep, if not died out in the North.

By natural consequence, the Scotch appear to have been indifferent to their own tuneful wealth, if not unaware of its existence, until advised of it from England, which advice was of questionable authenticity.

Congregational Singing—Is it Possible?

[From the London Choir.]

The great problem which faces religionists of every creed is, how to induce the people as a whole to raise their voices in the service of song, and to unite heartily and yet "with the understanding" in the "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" which form so important a part of the worship of every body of Christians. Various are the methods adopted to secure this result. The Romanist borrows from the theatre and the concert-room the most ear-catching melodies and weds them to the hymns of Newman or of Faber. The Ritualist in the English Church puts forth the Gregorian tone as the most successful musical formula for inducing congregational singing. The Low Churchman, while uttering a protest against anything in which the people cannot unite, invites them to join in Jackson in F, or in that most melancholy introduction to Divine service, "I will arise." The Dissenter, unfettered by tradition, and not unfrequently more catholic than all, takes things new and old, securing in very many chapels a closer approximation to the people's song than any church, Roman or English, can boast of. And yet, practically, all fail alike; and it is, after all, but a miserable apology for heartiness at which we arrive in any one of the cases we have mentioned. The question thus arises, whether congregational singing is impossible of attainment, whether it is one of those fictions which clerical enthusiasts and musical dreamers fondly persuade themselves to be within reach, but which is in reality a thing beyond us and above us, and only to be arrived at under totally different conditions as to musical education from those which govern us at the present time. To this many of our readers will at first sight be inclined to answer with a strong affirmative; and we are not prepared to deny that in so doing their grounds are strong and their position far more capable of defence than that taken up by those who urge that the effort has not yet been made with sufficient earnestness, and that before the attempt is given up in despair much more must be done than has yet been done. At the same time, although looking at things as they are the prospect is far from cheering, and admitting that where anything approaching to general singing, even in psalms and hymns, is attained, it is too often a mere noisy shout, we are inclined to agree with the view that something far higher than we have yet obtained is within our grasp, and that too with nothing more than a fair and honest use of existing means.

But as the mere advocacy of this duty is insufficient unless some practical plan is provided for uniting the people in a general effort worthily to fulfil it, without which the mere enthusiasm created by an earnest sermon on the subject will soon pass away, or at the best result in a few solitary and scattered endeavors, we are glad to have the opportunity of calling attention to a scheme which is being tried with success in Scotland, and might with advantage be adopted in this country. Recognizing the duty of congregational singing as incumbent upon all Christians, some of the lovers of music in Aberdeen recently set on foot a series of great choral gatherings open to all persons without distinction as to creed, except the agreement on the great fundamental truths enunciated in the hymns and anthems sung at the practices. At these meetings a monster choir of twelve hundred voices, including members of the congregations of all the churches and chapels in the town and its vicinity, has assembled for some weeks; and, as a proof that not the slightest ill-feeling has ensued from the varying faith of the choristers, we may mention that upwards of thirty of the clergy and of the ministers of the various denominations have taken part in the proceedings. For those who were unable to join the choir, admission has been provided at a nominal sum, and the proceeds have been given to the funds of the Royal Infirmary, by the Treasurer and Secretary of which the whole of the music has been conducted. The hymns, chants, and anthems, with the music for each evening have been provided a week in advance, in order to give time for home practice; and, from a glance at the programmes and music sheets, we are inclined to think that the choice has been wisely made. The majority of the numbers have consisted of hymn tunes and chants of a popular character, many from Hymns Ancient and Modern finding their way to the front; but early anthems have not been omitted, and some of the fine old tunes from the Scotch and English psalters have served to give tone to the selection. The effect of the large mass of voices may be easily imagined; and we can scarcely feel surprised at the statement that, although the number of the choir was to have been limited to 1,000, it was speedily found necessary to enlarge it to 1,200. The success of the movement has of course been largely due to the ability and tact of the director, who has been entirely unassisted by an organ accompaniment. Out of the ten pieces sung at each practice the whole audience have been invited to join in two; but at the same time it must not be imagined that the choir itself has been composed of choristers, for the majority of the members have really been selected from ordinary congregations.

This is a brief outline of the system which has been pursued, and we cordially commend it to our readers' consideration. Its main feature, and indeed its chief element of success, has been the opportunity it has offered for a union of people ordinarily separated by religious differences, but who have been thus enabled to meet together and promote what must be to each and all an object of direct and practical importance. It seems to us to be a peculiarly happy idea; and, if in Scotland, where distinctions are at any rate quite as clearly drawn between kirk and kirk as they are with us, it is possible thus to sink divisions and unite in one grand service of song, it is equally within our reach in England. That some people will dismiss the scheme at once as impractical because of "the religious difficulty" is only natural, and doubtless in doing so they will be actuated by the highest motive; but it seems to us that all fears on this score are groundless. As we have virtually a common hymn-book, used alike by Churchmen and Nonconformists, so we believe we may with advantage have such united assemblies as these for practice of congregational singing. If rightly followed up by the establishment of elementary classes in connection with the various churches and chapels, they can hardly fail to increase in a large degree the number of those who are able to take an active part in the worship of God, and, from a merely artistic point of view, to effect a vast improvement in the rendering of choral services. In some places, perhaps, it may be desirable to adopt variations on the scheme so successfully inaugurated at Aberdeen by Mr. Carnie: but its leading features may be safely copied, and we cordially advise its trial wherever it is practicable. Reserving for the choir-practices the music used in the distinctive services of each church or sect, all can join in the hymns which are rightly esteemed to be the property of "all who call themselves Christians," and by this means secure that inspiring influence which invariably follows the union of a large body of voices. Our Choir Unions have done much to improve the singing of choirs; but a similar work still remains to be done among congregations, and we therefore trust that the plan will have a fair test.

MANNHEIM, fortunately, had its Beethoven Festival before war was declared. It was properly the regular Musikfest (the 7th of the Middle Rhine, and occurred on the 3d and 4th of July. The programme for the first day (evening) contained Beethoven's Overture in C, op. 124 ("Weihe des Hauses"); and the great Missa Solemnis for soli, chorus and orchestra. The solos were sung by Fr. Wilhelmine Ritter, court opera singer at Munich; Fr. Ullrich-Rohn, do. at Mannheim; Heinrich Vogl, do. at Munich, and Karl Hill, Chamber Singer at Schwerin.—Second Concert, July 4, at 4 P.M.: Overture to Genoveva, Schumann; Air for Tenor, sung by Herr Vogl; 114th Psalm for eight-part chorus, Mendelssohn; Concert Aria: Ah! perfido, Beethoven, sung by Fr. Eugénie Pappenheim, court opera singer at Brunswick; Crucifixus for eight-part choir, by Lotti; Chorus: "Jesu dulcis memoria," by Vittoria; Aria for Bass and Duet for Soprano and Bass from Weber's Furyanthe, by Herr Hill and Fr. Pappenheim; Miriam's "Song of Triumph," for soli, chorus and orchestra, Schubert; Symphony in C minor, Beethoven.

For the following items we are indebted to the Gazette:

—From a friendly letter just received, we gather that Master Richard Coker, the boy soprano who delighted Boston five years ago, is now in Peterborough, England, though he hopes to return to this country in the fall. He is now 15 years old, tall, and greatly improved in appearance. He sings in the same good style but more beautifully than ever. His voice is fast maturing into a powerful tenor or high baritone. He also plays well. It is his own and his father's desire that he should be brought out first in America.

—Max Strakosch has effected an engagement with the celebrated violinist, Vieuxtemps, to accompany Nilsson in her proposed concert tour in this country. Herr Strakosch has also engaged Verger, the French baritone, who enjoys a good reputation.

—It seems that there is to be no performance of the Oberammergau Passion-Play this year after all. Twenty four of the performers, including the players of the principal parts, have been called to join the army reserve. But for the war there would have been quite a pilgrimage from England to witness the representation.

—The composer of "Piff! Paff! Pouff! Tarrapa poum! Oh je suis le Général Boum!," has written a French war-song called "God speed the Emperor?" and somebody has expressed surprise thereat, because Offenbach is a German. It is true that he was born in Cologne, but he has lived in Paris since he was a boy, and is as truly a typical Parisian as the gayest native of the gay capital. But whatever he is, the Tribune thinks he ought to cry "God speed the Emperor." "Just think," it says, "what an opera bouffe he can make out of the imperial ballets!"

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- The Ball. 5. G minor to g. Peruzzi. 40
Another of the charming Nilsson airs. Beginning with a gay "Tra-la-la" in G minor, it suddenly changes to E major with a delightful effect.
I heard a Spirit sing. 2. Eb to e flat. Taylor. 30
A pretty melody, easily sung.
O teach me the past to forget. 3. E to e. Swansey. 35

"O teach me the past to forget,
Though strewn with the rose leaves of love,
And deem that we never had met,
Till meeting each other above."
A lover's sad and expressive lament.

- Sweet is the Dream. (Guarda che Bianca Luna).
Duett. 4. C to f. Campana. 40
An improved adaptation of English words, in an easy key, of this beautiful duett.

- A Loving heart, so pure and true. 3. Eb to f. Wm. H. Clarke. 30
A touching song which vividly pictures the living experience of many.

"A loving heart, so pure and true,
Inspired my young and happy hours;
Each passing day was dreamed away
In fancy's land of blooming flowers."

- Land of the Swallows. Duett. 4. Bb to g. Masimi. 40
A splendid two-part song with English and German words.

- Lonely Hours. 4. F to f. Fuller. 30
A very beautiful melody, with a chorus for mixed voices.
"Lonely hours come often stealing
O'er me with a holy charm,
While mem'ry's bells are softly pealing Forth some dream of days by-gone."

Instrumental.

- Rondino. Caprice. (Récréations Caractéristiques). 3. G. Op. 118. Leybach. 40
A graceful and easy theme, particularly facile for the left hand.

- Night Song. (Nachtgesang). 3. Eb. Op. 270. Jungmann. 30
An andante maestoso in sostenuto chords opening in the religious style, with the theme afterwards taken up with the left hand in chords, closing with the left hand in arpeggio octaves, with the theme in the right fortissimo.

- La Danse des Naiades. Caprice. 4. Bb. Op. 118. Leybach. 60
A delicate allegretto movement in 6-8 time, not difficult to execute and very pleasing, both to the performer and hearer.

- Dreaming of Home. 3. Eb. Op. 23. Wilson. 50
A quiet andante theme, turning memory back on the dreamy past. This American composer is quite happy in all his arrangements for the piano.
Third Air Varié. For Violin and Piano. 6. E. Op. 3. DeBeriat. 1.10
A piece found in the repertoire of the finished violinist, and which no amateur of merit should be without.

Books.

- BAKER'S HARMONY AND THOROUGH BASS. B. F. Baker. Cloth, 2.00

A work which enters minutely into the analysis of Chords, Scales, Modulations, &c., calculated to be of great assistance both to the student and musician.

- SILVER WINGS. A new collection of Sabbath School Music. Boards, 35
Paper, 30

A Collection, which, like the title is extremely happy in its adaptation to the wants of Sabbath Schools. It will secure a warm welcome from lovers of this class of sacred music.

- THE SABBATH GUEST. An entirely new collection of Anthems, Opening and Closing Pieces, Sentences, Choruses, &c. By L. O. Emerson and J. H. Morey. Boards, 1.60

- REED ORGAN COMPANION. A new collection of Popular Instrumental and Vocal Music, arranged expressly for Cabinet Organs and Melodeons. Wm. H. Clarke. Boards, 2.00

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Specimens of Wagner on Conducting.

Translations, for this Journal, from "Ueber das Dirigiren," by RICHARD WAGNER.

IV.

The same experience which I had with Reisinger, in regard to that very third movement of the eighth Symphony, occurred to me again soon after with another noted Conductor, one of Mendelssohn's successors in the direction of the Leipzig concerts. He too had pledged himself to my views about this Tempo di Menuetto, and promised to take the correct slow time of this movement in a concert to which he invited me. Droll enough was his excuse for not keeping his word: smilingly he confessed that, distracted by all sorts of cares of conductorship, his promise to me did not occur to him until after the beginning of the piece; of course he could not suddenly change the old accustomed tempo then, and so he was obliged to go through with it in that way! Much as this explanation pained me, I was pleased at least to find a person who admitted the distinction I had pointed out, and did not seem to think that it was all one whether we took this tempo or the other. I do not think I could tax the conductor in this case with wanton thoughtlessness, as he accused himself of "forgetfulness"; indeed the reason for his not taking the tempo slower was, unconsciously to himself, a very good one. To have sensibly changed such a kind of tempo at random between the rehearsal and the concert, would certainly have shown a most questionable levity, from the very evil consequences of which the conductor's fortunate "forgetfulness" saved him this time. Once accustomed to a rendering suggested by the quicker tempo, the orchestra would have lost all self-possession had a more moderate tempo been imposed upon them; for that of course would have required a wholly different style of rendering.

And here lies just the important and decisive point, which must be clearly apprehended before we can come to any profitable understanding about the rendering of our classical compositions, now so often very much neglected and so spoiled by evil habits. The vicious habit has a plausible right to insist upon its own tempo, inasmuch as a certain correspondence of the rendering with the tempo has formed itself, which on the one hand conceals the real evil, while on the other hand a simple change of time, without a change of rendering, would only make the matter worse and even unendurable.

To make this clear by one of the simplest of all examples, I select the beginning of the C-minor Symphony:

After a short hold upon the fermata of the second bar, our conductors start off, merely using this delay as it were to concentrate the attention of the musicians upon a precise seizing of the figure of the third bar. The note E flat is commonly held not longer than a forte lasts in a careless stroke of the bow with the stringed instruments. Now suppose the voice of Beethoven calling from his grave to a conductor: "Hold out my fermata long and terrible! I wrote no fermatas for fun, nor in despair to gain time to think of what was to come after; but the long, full tone in my Adagio,—tone to be completely sucked in—and which is there the expression of the full luxury of feeling,—that same tone, if I use it, I fling into the midst of the impetuous, swift figured Allegro as a prolonged spasm of ecstasy or terror. Then the life of the tone should be sucked out to its last drop of blood; then I arrest the billows of my sea, and let you look into its abyss; or I check the movement of the clouds, I part the confusing streaks of mist, and give a glimpse for once into the pure blue ether, into the sun's dazzling eye. For this I set fermatas, suddenly entering, long held notes, in my Allegros. And now mind, what a wholly definite thematic purpose I had with this prolonged E flat after the three short stormy notes, and what I meant to say wherever the same prolonged notes occur in what follows."—If now our conductor, in pursuance of this warning, should all at once require his orchestra to make that bar with the fermata as significant,—and consequently as prolonged, as Beethoven intended, what would the immediate result be? Truly a lamentable one. After the first vigor of the bow had squandered itself, the tone, under the necessity of longer holding out, would grow thinner and thinner, ending in a desperate piano; for,—and here I touch upon one of the evil consequences of the habits of our present conductors—nothing has become more foreign to our orchestras than the uniform strong holding out of a tone. I exhort all conductors, that they require of any and every instrument in the orchestra, an even, full, sustained forte, so that they may learn by experience what an astounding novelty this requirement will produce, and what an obstinate persistency of practice it will cost to properly succeed in it.

Yet this uniformly strong sustained tone is the basis of all Dynamics, in the orchestra, as well as in singing. From it alone is it possible to attain to all the modifications, whose variety mainly determines the character of the rendering. Without this foundation an orchestra gives plenty of noise, but no power; and herein lies a first mark of weakness in most of our orchestral performances. Since our present conductors know as good as nothing of this, they make much on the other hand of the effects of an over-soft piano. This can be got from the stringed instruments without much pains; but it is very hard to obtain it from the wind instruments, particularly from the reeds. From these, especially from the flutists, who have transformed their once so gentle instruments into real reeds of might, it is now scarcely possible to get a soft, sustained piano,—with the exception perhaps of the French oboe players, since they never overstep the pastoral character of their instrument, or of the clarinet-tists when the echo effect is required of them. This dilemma, which we meet in the performances of our best orchestras, raises the question, why, if the blowers of wind instruments are incapable of any even, smooth piano, why not give greater fullness to the over-soft play of the strings, now so often sounding in most ludicrous contrast with the wind, so as to restore some fair proportion? But evidently this false proportion quite escapes the minds of our conductors. The fault lies in great part in the character of the piano of the stringed instrument: for, as we have no true forte, so too we lack the true piano; fullness of tone is wanting in either case; and here our violinists, &c., might learn something from our blowers. For it is very easy to draw the bow right loosely over the strings, so as to set them softly whispering and murmuring; while on the contrary it requires great artistic control of the breath to produce a distinct, pure tone by blowing very moderately upon a wind instrument. Therefore the violinists ought to learn the true piano, full of real tone, from the distinguished players on wind instruments,—these having first acquired it from great singers.

Now this soft tone, and the strong sustained tone before indicated, are the two poles of the whole Dynamics of the orchestra, between which the performance has to move. How will it be then with the rendering if neither the one nor the other has been rightly cared for? What sort of modifications can it have, if the two dynamic extremes are neither of them clearly marked? Doubtless they will be so very faulty, that the Mendelssohnian maxim, to which I have alluded, of gliding swiftly (and imperceptibly) over a passage, must needs prove to be a very happy make-shift; on which account it has been elevated to an actual dogma by our conductors. And it is this very dogma, which just now possesses the whole Church of our Conductors with their followers, so that all attempts at a correct rendering of our classical music are decried by them as downright heresy.

The Songs of the War.

[From the Orchestra.]

Song, which is the handmaiden of religion, is also a powerful stimulant of the most irreligious of human aspirations—the passion for cutting one another's throats. To prove what influence song has always exercised upon the pugnacity of mortals, we need quote neither David nor Homer nor Ossian; for all History tells the same tale. Poetic narrations of the doings of the mighty men of old, mingled with thanksgiving to the local deity—Jehovah, or Wodin, or the Great Twin Brethren (for murderous humanity has ever been anxious to obtain supernatural sanction for its outbreaks)—inform the progress of all wars. The stronger the combative feeling is aroused, the more does the nation incline to sing. When the sympathies are but half excited, song flags. The Crimean war, for example, stimulated a natural desire in the British breast that the British cause should win; but there was no underlying fire and fervor of patriotism. Hearths and homes were untouched, and no bellicose song-literature had birth. We sang the old martial strains, it is true, much as we sang—or rather hummed—Garibaldi's hymn when that patriot was escorted along the Kennington Road, and with about as much excitement. Or as we tried (and failed) to sing the Brabangonne to the brave Belges two or three years ago. Very different is it with our neighbors at the present moment. There is no mistake about their singing; no half-heartedness about them. As yet there has scarcely been time to fashion a new lyrical literature to fit the immediate occasion. But it would be a mistake to suppose they "cannot sing the old songs." They can and do, and with extreme heartiness; and without being too particular as to applicability. Thus fervid France shouts the Marseillaise, that implacable song whose cause and effect was a frantic desire to exterminate all kings and emperors; and even calls now and then for the Carmagnole, a brutal and indecent explosion against a French monarch. The Chant du Départ, too, Chenier's verse to which Méhul set music amid the noise and bustle of a saloon full of patriots, commemorates the taking of the Bastille, and has the following refrain, thoroughly inappropriate to the present time:

La République nous appelle,
Faisons valere ou sachons périr:
Un Français doit vivre pour elle,
Pour elle un Français doit mourir.

But France at the present moment is too excited to think of the verbal sense. There is little doubt that if under the Emperor she were led into a war with the United States, she would sing the self-same verse with equal gusto and contempt of the à propos.

On the other hand Prussia is driven back to Arndt and Körner, the songs of 1813, and the memory of Blücher. At the present moment it seems curious that Germany, concerning the stout Field Marshal, should be reminded that—

Oh Katsbach on-the Water was glorious to him:
He gave the French a lesson, and taught them to swim,
Good-bye, pretty Frenchmen, to Baltic land and wave,
The fishes are ready to furnish you a grave.

With a rattling refrain of:

Juchheissasas!
Und die Deutschen sind da,
Die Deutschen sind lustig,
Sie rufen hurra!

In the next verse another bitter pill is handed to France:

At Lelpelo-on-the-Plain was a glad and gallant fight:
To grief he turn'd their glory, to mourning brought their might.

All breathless they lay there when that stout fight was won.
And Blücher was created a Field Marshal anon.

This song was composed too early to include Waterloo in its reminiscences; but for all we know, a supplementary verse may have been added by this time.

One of the most popular, if not the superlatively popular song of the German side is Arndt's "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland," to which Reichardt set music. In order to define the German's Fatherland, the poet proceeds on the exhaustive principle, by showing what it is not. As the whole is greater than its part, the Vaterland is presumed to scorn the supposition that it is composed of any individual portions. It is a grand totality, with lingual instead of political boundaries.

What is the German's Fatherland?
Or Swabia's hills or Prussia's strand?
Or on the Rhine where vine-cups pearl,
Or on the Belt where seamews whirl?
Oh no, no, no,
His Fatherland must greater grow.

What is the German's Fatherland?
Bavaria green, or Styria grand?
The title may not Austria claim,
So rich in honor, rich in fame?
Oh no, no, no,
His Fatherland must greater grow.

What is the German's Fatherland?
Oh tell me where its bounds expand:
Helvetia's peaks or gay Tyrol?
Their land, their peoples glad my soul.
Oh no, no, no,
His Fatherland must greater grow.

Finally the question is answered, and the frontiers poetically fixed thus:—

As far as e'er the German tongue
To God in heaven sings its song,
So far alone,
O gallant German, call thine own.

It is not often that the war-singers of belligerent nationalities exchange the retort discourteous. We English should be astonished and perhaps somewhat discomposed, if in answer to our musical assertion that "Britons never shall be slaves," an enemy burst forth with "Oh, but Britons often have been." Yet a parallel case is Alfred de Musset's retort to Nikolaus Becker, which all France is now singing. "Sie sollen ihn nicht haben, den freien deutschen Rhein," wrote Becker. "Nous l'avons eu, votre Rhin allemand," returned the mocking Frenchman. The following excellent translations of both songs are from the pen of Dr. J. P. Steele, and first appeared in print in the year 1866, when the Luxembourg demand and the rectification of frontiers threatened to precipitate the present state of affairs between France and Prussia. Of de Musset's retort we may remark that the allusion to the German maidens welcoming the French soldiery and being glad to pour out for them the thin white wine of the country (le petit vin blanc), is a little fiction contrary to history, morality and oinology.

THE GERMAN VIEW.

It never shall be France's,
The free, the German Rhine,
Tho' raven-like she glances
And croaks her foul design.

So long as calmly gliding
It wears its mantle green,
So long as oar dividing
Its mirrored wave is seen,

It never shall be France's,
The free, the German Rhine,
So long as youth enhances
His fervor with its wine.

So long as, sentry keeping,
The rocks its margin stud;
So long as spires are sleeping
Their image in its flood;

It never shall be France's,
The free, the German Rhine,
So long as festive dances
Its lover-groups combine;

So long as angler bringeth
Its lusty trout to shore,
So long as minstrel singeth
Its praises from door to door.

It never shall be France's,
The free, the German Rhine,
Until its broad expanse is
Its last defender's shrine.

THE FRENCH VIEW.

Your German Rhine has been ours before!
He has served our vassal bows to fill.
Can sing its praise from door to door
Efface the hoof-prints, legible still,
Of our cavalry charge that bathed its left bank in your gore!

Your German Rhine has been ours before!
On its breast the wound yet gapeth wide,
Which conquering Condé made, when he tore
Thro' its mantle of green to the farther side:
Where once the sire has ridden, shall the son not ride once more!

Your German Rhine has been ours before!
Of your German virtues what remains
When across its flood our legions pour
And the Empire over-clouds your plains?
When all your men have fallen, have ye other men in store?

Your German Rhine has been ours before!
If ye your annals would fain forget,
Your daughters remember the days of yore,
And wish the Frenchman among them yet,
For whom your vintage white they were always blithe to pour.

If your German Rhine be yours once more,
Then wash your liveries in its tide;
But pitch your arrogance somewhat lower!
Can ye recall with generous pride
Your myriad raven-beaks that drank the dying Eagle's gore?

May your German Rhine flow evermore
In peace; and modestly may each spire
Be mirrored fair in its glassy floor!
But, oh! keep down your bacchanal fire,
Which, else, may rouse to life again the victor hearts of yore.

In the latter translation Dr. Steele has adopted a metre foreign to French verse, but admirably fitted to convey the rollicking verve of the original.

One of the shrewdest moves in connection with this war on the part of the Emperor was the impressment into Imperial service of the "Marseillaise"—a chant ever associated not only with red republicanism, but with undying hostility to Napoleon personally. To enlist the "Marseillaise" was to excommunicate Rochefort's paper, the very name of which would thus be struck out of the revolutionary register. The trick succeeded: Rochefort threw up his hand, and the literary Marseillaise has ceased to appear. The vocal "Marseillaise," too, is having such a surfeit of popularity, that satiety will probably soon set in, and Paris will shelve the tune until—the next revolution. It is a grand but unhappy air. It was conceived—according to Lamartine's story—under the influence of wine and genius and moonshine and cold; its strains accompanied its author into banishment, and the man in whose house it was created to the guillotine. Rouget de Lisle, an officer garrisoned at Strasburg, composed it one cold night in the house of Dietrich, the mayor of the city. He had been drinking: his head was hot, his frame cold; and he tottered, says Lamartine, "into his lonely room, slowly seeking inspiration, now in his patriotic soul, now in his harpsichord; sometimes composing the air before the words, sometimes the words before the air, and so combining them in his thoughts that he himself did not know whether the notes or the verses came first, and that it was impossible to separate the poetry from the music, or the sentiment from the expression." Then he fell asleep over the harpsichord. The next day he noted down the composition with difficulty, and took it to Dietrich, who summoned his family to hear the new song. Their enthusiasm broke out of all bounds: the hymn of the country was found! A few months later Dietrich went to the scaffold to the sound of those notes; and a year or two afterwards de Lisle, proscribed as a royalist, and flying through a pass in the Upper Alps, asked his guide what was the name of that hymn, heard in the distance. "La Marseillaise," was the reply. The people of Marseilles had adopted the air, which afterwards bore their name. "The weapon," says Lamartine, "recoiled against the hand which had forged it; the revolution in its madness no longer recognized its own voice."

The following translation, whose fidelity is its chief merit, is by the practised hand of Mr. John Oxenford.

Come, children of your country, come;
New glory dawns upon the world.
Our tyrants, rushing to their doom,
Their bloody standards have unfurled;
Already on our plains we hear
The murmurs of a savage horde;
They threaten with the murderous sword
Your comrades and your children dear.
Then up and form your ranks, the hireling foe withstand,
March on—his craven blood must fertilize the land.

Those banded serfs, what would they have,
By tyrant kings together brought?
Whom are those fetters to enslave
Which long ago their hands have wrought?
You, Frenchmen—you they would enchain:
Doth not the thought your bosoms fire?
The ancient bondage they desire
To force upon your necks again.
Then up and form your ranks, the hireling foe withstand,
March on—his craven blood must fertilize the land.

Those marshalled foreigners, shall they Make laws to reach the Frenchman's hearth?
Shall hireling troops who fight for pay
Strike down our warriors to the earth?
God! shall we bow beneath the weight
Of hands that slayish fetters wear?
Shall ruthless despots once more dare
To be the masters of our fate?
Then up and form your ranks, the hireling foe withstand,
March on—his craven blood must fertilize the land.

Yet, generous warriors, still forbear
To deal on all your vengeful blows;
The train of hapless victims spare:
Against them will they are our foes.
But oh! these despots stain'd with blood,
These traitors leagu'd with base Bouillé,
Who make their native land their prey—
Death to the savage tiger brood!
Then up and form your ranks; the hireling foe withstand,
March on—his craven blood must fertilize the land.

Come, love of country guide us now,
Endow our vengeful arms with might;
And, dearest liberty, do thou
Aid thy defenders in the fight.
Unto our flags let victory
Called by thy stirring accents haste.
And may thy dying foes at last
Thy triumph and our glory see.
Then up and form your ranks; the hireling foe withstand,
March on—his craven blood must fertilize the land.

The fault of the above translation is that it does not sing easily. Now the "Marseillaise" is nothing without the tune: it is that which lends it all the expression. But Mr. Oxenford's first line gives "Come children" to quavers, "of" to a crotchet with a strong accent, the first in the bar, and "your country co-o-me," spreading the latter word (in French a disyllable) over D B and G. The result is very awkward. To be fair to Mr. Oxenford, he expressly puts forth his version as a reading translation, not a singing one; only in a poem like the "Marseillaise" one involuntarily hums the air in reading the verse. It is the air which invests with infinite pathos the third line in the last verse.

"Liberté, liberté, chérie, Combats avec tes défenseurs."

An apostrophe which is terribly weakened by the "dearest liberty" of the translator; which sounds like the beginning of a love letter.

Rouget de Lisle lived till 1836—long enough to see another revolution and another revolutionary chant—"La Parisienne" of Casimir Delavigne, to the sounds of which the throne of Charles X. tottered, and the Monarchy of July was established. Eighteen years later this dynasty also went, and Alexandre Dumas and Auguste Maquet took up the lyre and chanted the republic into fashion with "Mourir pour la patrie." Curiously enough, these three songs—the products of different epochs, but each abounding in savage invocations against French monarchs and all such as aid French monarchs—are sung at the present time in defiance of a foe whose crime is to have insulted the Emperor of the French.

A Contribution to the Beethoven Festival.

Professor Heinrich Dorn has published in the Post the following interesting article:—

According to an official report in the Voss Zeitung, the Berlin Musikverein and the Berlin Tonkünstlerverein have applied to Herr von Hülsen, and requested him to act as chairman of a new Festival Committee, about to be formed. Very sensible!

We well know that Herren Bumke, Phillip and Thadewald are most worthy men and sterling musicians; their efforts, by means of a Congregation which they founded, to improve the pecuniary circumstances of the poorer class of musicians, have already been attended with material benefits to the performers in small bands, and to the members of the Musical Exchange (Musikbörse) as it is called; but to do anything successfully in Berlin at the present moment, when the eyes of the whole artistic world are directed hither, and after Bonn, as the birthplace, and Vienna, as the residence, of the deceased master, have made every preparation for a Musical Festival of an extraordinary description—there needs a brilliant name, which these gentlemen do not possess, while the institution they represent does not enjoy sufficient credit to accomplish the task they would undertake. The intention, too, expressed in their address: "Of laying, with the surplus from the Beethoven Festival treasury, the foundation of a Concert Hall on a grand scale, shows only too plainly that they are as far from having formed a correct idea of the expenses to be incurred, as they have of other points, unless Herr von Hülsen were obliging enough to forward to a different address from the customary one the Operahouse receipts of Fidelio, and the Theatre Royal receipts for Egmont. Let the enterprising gentlemen, who have already retired, console themselves with the consciousness that their intentions were good, and let individual members of the Musikverein support, to the best of their ability, the forthcoming performances.

Just in the same way, the Berlin Tonkünstlerverein had no excuse for placing himself at the head of such an undertaking, save the very justifiable one, that some body or other must take the initiative. Its former partner, the Musikverein, was, it is true, in a position to get up, unaided, grand musical performances, and consequently to assist effectually in any performances of the same nature; but this power is utterly wanting to the Tonkünstlerverein; the very small number of members able to play any instrument save the piano are either members of the Royal orchestras, or their substitutes, and so little independent that no reliance can be placed upon their promises of co-operation. As I myself, in my character of ex-president, am still an honorary member of the Verein in question, I am well acquainted with the praiseworthy efforts made by it, and I fully appreciate them; but I cannot see in them the foundation on which to raise a Beethoven Festival Committee for Berlin. I, therefore, repeat my firm conviction that it is a very sensible proceeding to change the whole plan, and, with Herr von Hülsen as chairman, form a fresh committee, with which—in just consideration of the original promoters, and also because he would make a most able secretary—Dr. Alsleben should be associated as delegate of the two Associations.

Other names are now mentioned on the committee: Herr von Hülsen, Joachim, Radecke, Ries, and Taubert; these are men whom all Germany knows; men who have not first to be looked up in the Berlin Directory; men with whom it is certain that the artistic notabilities in the commercial world, and among the aristocracy, will gladly ally themselves. For this reason we can no longer doubt that Julius Stern, though not at present in Berlin, will not refuse another invitation to co-operate in the undertaking. Without vigorous support from Stern's Verein and the Singakademie, it would be difficult to get up a really imposing Beethoven Festival. In order to ensure the co-operation of the last-named body, its chief director, Professor Grell, was, of course, also appointed a committee-man, though, on account of his health, he gratefully declined the office, which must necessarily entail great fatigue. The writer, too, of the present lines did not deem it becoming to accept the honorable call made on him; it is sufficient that the future conductors, and the virtuosos who will cast a lustre over the Festival, should be invited by the practical musicians to attend the preliminary deliberations; there is always ballast enough on such occasions—but the vessel must not be needlessly overlaid. It certainly would not have been so by a man like Tausig, had he, in this instance, joined the cream of our artistic contemporaries in Berlin; but the set-off for his proposed co-operation was: that Richard Wagner should be offered the chief direction of the Festival. This ridiculously pretentious project was naturally enough rejected, and Herr Tausig subsequently thought fit to return his diploma as honorary member of the Berlin Tonkünstler Verein.

What a strange thing it is that certain persons never learn to distinguish what is becoming from what is unbecoming! For instance, the Vienna Committee asked Herr R. Wagner to be one of the conductors at the Beethoven Festival. Scarcely had the Illustrirte Zeitung of the 18th June published the fact that Herr R. Wagner, 'with grateful appreciation of the honor done him,' declined acceding to the invitation, than that gentleman trumpeted forth, in the columns of the Vienna papers, that he did not write and answer the committee, but had conveyed his refusal orally through a friend (because certain persons, not fanatic Wagnerites, were on the committee). That a man may be a celebrated composer, and yet not observe the slightest measure in his behavior, is a fact which—as all the world knows—Wagner has sufficiently shown for years past. This incident, not in the least surprising on the part of the composer of Tannhäuser, would, therefore, hardly have been touched upon here, were it not so different from the conduct of another great artist, who behaved in a diametrically opposite manner under similar circumstances. The Vienna Committee requested Herren Wagner, Liszt, and Lachner, to conduct the most important works; Herren Joachim, Laub, and Mme. Clara Schumann, to add lustre to the Festival, by taking part in it as solo instrumentalists. In consequence of the rude expectation of a man like Wagner, Joachim, the master, stated that though he much regretted it, it was impossible that he should respond to the flattering invitation. He might easily have assigned some material circumstance or other as a pretext for his refusal, if, out of consideration for the persons included in the same invitation, he had not deemed it his duty to be truthful; he would, he said, have gone, had he seen a possibility of his being able to co-operate joyously.

"Had, for instance, the direction of the concerts been confided to one of the local conductors of Vienna, I should not, on such an occasion, have cared about the greater or less amount of partiality I feel for one name or the other, but simply, like a pilgrim inspired by a hearty wish to dispose my best offerings on the holy shrine, have quietly accommodated myself to existing arrangements. But the direction of the concerts has been confided to artists from other places and with strongly expressed tendencies, and, though I must confess that it would have been impossible to select more celebrated names, I cannot, unfortunately, shut my eyes to the fact that in my opinion, the picture of Beethoven's sublime and simple grandeur, which in plain moral majesty has gradually subjected the entire globe, is thereby disturbed. As, under such circumstances, it would be impossible for me to enter, heart and soul, into the joyous work, I am, doubtlessly, acting in the spirit of the honorable Committee by keeping away from the Festival, in order not to interfere with the unanimous feeling of rejoicing."

This is the language and the behavior of a true artist!

Though our Berlin Committee, at its first meeting, on the 12th June, selected the 17th December, and following days, as the date of the Festival, their decision may be considered merely temporary. As regards the Theatre, it is, perhaps a matter of indifference whether the Festival is held shortly before or long after Christmas; but for the concert-room, and all the conveniences connected with it, the proximity of old Boguy, otherwise so profitable, might be attended with a certain amount of danger. Videant consules ne detrimentum respublica capiat.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" in London.

[From the Orchestra, July 29].

The production of Wagner's opera "L'Olandese Dannato" at Drury Lane, was, despite the late period of its performance in the season, and the disturbing influences of political excitement, aroused a large degree of interest. The first sensation upon hearing it was, as far as the outside public was concerned, wonder that music of this kind should be stigmatized as crude, incomprehensible, and unattractive. The audience found everything to understand and much to admire. They did not care to differentiate between Wagner's earlier and later manner; they only felt that this work was lofty and emotional and marked by genius. The libretto is itself a piece of high workmanship. It is founded on a story of strong psychological interest; it is written by the maestro himself in exalted style, contains excellent German verse, and preserves that intimate rapport between poem and music which exists at its best when composer can write and librettist compose. The old legend of Vanderdecken receives plain and straightforward illustration. The doomed man—doomed to endless restlessness on earth for having impiously sworn to outwit the elements, with the chance of rescue made conditional upon his finding a woman who will love him truly until her death—is thrown upon the coast of Norway in one of those septennial respite which are granted him for the purpose of finding the said daughter of Eve. Every seven years he has come to shore with the object of finding his guardian angel in a woman's love. Many women have given him their hearts, only to break troth afterwards, and lose their own souls. Hopeless of ever finding release from doom under conditions so hard, the Dutchman lands in the Norwegian bay. There he encounters a fisherman whose sloop is stranded, and who has a daughter Senta at home. The Dutchman asks for her hand, promising vast treasure. The Norwegian skipper is delighted at the prospect of gaining a wealthy son-in-law, and promises to guide him to his home and recommend him to his daughter. So ends the first act, which is musically made interesting by the elaboration and contrast of sombreness and gaiety suggested by the Norwegian's vessel and the doomed Dutch craft lying alongside in the bay. Constant change of time and rhythm are all in Wagner's mannerism—curious abandonment of a commenced phrase, and a gliding to something new and unexpected. The fault of the music is its tendency to repetition and to long involved soliloquies unbroken by dramatic incident and interesting only from the psycho-analytical point of view. But a fine duet between the Dutchman (Mr. Santley) and Daland the Norwegian (Signor Foli) created a good impression and brought down the curtain well. The second act leads us to the chamber of Senta, the daughter spoken of, surrounded by spinning girls, whose Spinnlied in rhythmic measure is altogether popular and deutsch, and very little Wagnerisch. This charming movement caused general pleasure. Senta herself neither spins nor sings; she is absorbed in dreamy contemplation of a portrait on the wall—that of the doomed Dutchman, with whose weird history she is conversant. This Senta, who is of a melancholy and cataleptic temperament, tells her companions the fearful story of the sinner's condemnation; until the awful nature of the doom so works upon her imagination that she vows to achieve his rescue by sacrificing her love and life to him. On this mood her lover Erik breaks, and is naturally perturbed at such devotion. The return of Daland is announced and the girls flock off to prepare for the sailors. Erik presses his suit, but his old love has little effect upon Senta now. Daland returns and introduces the Dutchman; and a scene of intense but unexpressed earnestness follows—a fascination which finds vent in words only when Daland retires, and Senta's devotedness is answered by the triumphant joy of the doomed Dutchman. The duet in which this expression takes place opens with a dreamy unison passage for the Dutchman, chiefly unaccompanied, in which he seems to recognize the realization of past visions; then proceeds to some smoothly written cantabile, lying well for Mr. Santley's voice; followed by concerted passages for the two, coming to a temporary close with a cadenza for both, in which the brilliant voice and execution of Mlle. de Murska (as Senta) was most effectively displayed. The subsequent portions of the duet, involving several changes of time and rhythm, express the devotion of Senta, and the joy of the lover at his hoped for release. Each phase of this important movement is replete with dramatic conception and powerful handling, coupled with a mastery over orchestral varieties and combinations that should suffice to establish Wagner's claims to recognition as a remarkable, if not a great composer. A burst of applause at the end attested that such music can command ready appreciation even among an audience strange to Wagnerism. From this duet we are led without interruption to a trio—the two lovers and Daland—which brings the second act to a highly effective close; and the three singers were twice called before the curtain. The third act opens with a lusty chorus of the Norwegian sailors, anchored in their vessel alongside the silent Dutch ship. Maidens from shore bring provisions to the Dutch vessel, which they hail in vain, a replica being supplied by the "chaff" of the Norwegian crew. The antique build and outlandish rig of the strange sail and her imperturbable stillness receive from the jolly Norwegian crew such ridicule as this:

"Say, have you no message nor letters for land?
To our great-great-grandfathers all such we will hand."

No response however is vouchsafed. The stage being clear, Erik and Senta enter in agitation: the former reproaching his affianced with her altered affections. The colloquy is overheard by the Dutchman, who releases Senta from her vow, and prepares to sail wearily away, his hope of salvation ended. But Senta is not to be outdone in generosity. She casts herself into the sea, after the Dutch vessel, crying out that she is true until death. The spell is broken; a true woman is found: the doomed vessel sinks, granting kindly death to the crew; and an apotheosis of Senta and her lover follows. The third act is not so powerful as the second, but it is full of exalted music, and the stage effect is very good. The opera was admirably filled. Mlle. de Murska realized to the life the trance-given maiden with her intense ideality and singleness of heart. Mr. Santley looked and sang like a hopeless and life-weary sufferer, stricken with inexpressible woe. Mary, Senta's friend, and Erik, her lover, were placed in the hands of Mme. Corsi and the new tenor Sig. Perotti, who has abundant merits. Sig. Foli, as stated, was Daland, and a helmsman with a single song received the attention of Sig. Rinaldini. The Italian translation, by Sig. Marchesi, is an accurate and meritorious version of the German text. To Sig. Arditì is due the credit of great and successful pains in the rehearsing and direction of the work.

[From the Musical World, July 30.]

The long-promised Italian version of Herr Richard Wagner's romantic opera, Der Fliegende Holländer, under the title of L'Olandese Dannato, was produced at this theatre on Saturday night, with every mark of success. Thus Mr. George Wood has, though late in the season, redeemed another promise, and again justified the confidence reposed in his management. The utmost care has been taken in putting the opera upon the stage; while, to judge from the result Sig. Arditì must have bestowed even more than his accustomed diligence in preparing the music, which, like all Herr Wagner has written, even his earliest known dramatic work, the grand opera of Rienzi (brought out some time ago at the Paris Thetre Lyrique), is trying in equal degrees for orchestra, chorus, and solo singers. The abandonment of the first idea of introducing Herr Wagner as an operatic composer at our Italian Opera by his Tannhäuser, and substituting his Fliegende Holländer, was, we think, judicious; for though between the composition of Tannhäuser, and that of the Fliegende Holländer there was only an interval of three years, the Thuringian opera is far more than three years in advance of its immediate predecessor. In the Holländer the composer may be said to have first tried the new system afterwards destined to make such a noise in the world, and to lead to such bitter and acrimonious controversy.

Having thus felt his way, he developed it more elaborately in Tannhäuser; and from Tannhäuser to Lohengrin was another step towards the goal which, through the successive stages of Tristan und Isolde and the Meistersinger von Nürnberg, was ultimately reached in the trilogy of the Nibelungen. If we are to welcome such music and ultimately to adopt the Wagnerian doctrine of the "Art-work of the Future," it is as well to begin from the beginning—with an opera, in short, composed when the Prophet was more like other men. We have always thought, moreover, that Herr Wagner's very best, because less extravagant, dramatic work, was the Holländer, which, amid much that is incoherent and formless, contains much genuine music, and the promise of much more to come. Every step since taken in advance of it seems to us a step in the wrong direction.

The opera is powerfully cast at Drury Lane, and in Senta and the nameless Dutchman, to save whom from perdition the Norwegian maiden sacrifices her life, Mlle. Irma di Murska and Mr. Santley are provided with parts which have, already in one performance, enabled them to win the highest possible distinction. The other characters are supported, and well supported by Signor Perotti (Erik the Hunter), Signor Foli (Daland, the Norwegian skipper), Signor Rinaldini (the Helmsman), and Mme. Corsi (Maria).

Strange to say, considering the attraction one might suppose would attach to an opera by a composer who, in one way or another, has been the incessant talk of the musical world for more than 30 years, and scarcely any of whose dramatic music, occasional selections at concerts allowed for, is known in England, the house was not very full. In revenge, however, the audience was uproarious from first to last. The overture which provides material for all the most important dramatic situations of the opera, was loudly encored; and no wonder, the executants being beyond reproach.

Happily, Herr Wagner allows few opportunities for encoring in the course of his work; and had Signor Arditì been satisfied with acknowledging the applause, instead of repeating the overture—perhaps the least coherent, certainly the noisiest piece of the whole—he would have acted more discreetly. However, almost every piece was applauded with more or less heartiness; and this may in a measure be explained by the fact that the audience, from the drawing up of the curtain and the exhibition of the Norwegian vessel at anchor, to the self-immolation of Senta and the disappearance of the Dutchman's ship in the last scene, found themselves in the presence of something quite new and strange, something for the greater part unlike anything whatever they had previously witnessed. The calls for the principal singers at the termination of each act were hearty and unanimous.

The operas performed during this week (the last of the season) have been Otello (Monday); L'Olandese Dannato (Tuesday); and Lucia di Lammermoor (Thursday). A composite entertainment—including an act from Traviata, an act from Marta, and an act from Lucia—for the benefit of Mlle. Nilsson, and her last appearance in England before her visit to America, is announced for this evening—the last performance of the season.

APPROPOS OF THE HOLLÄNDER.

"But there arose a colossal genius, a flaming spirit, to whom was decreed a crown of fire and gold." The speaker is Abbe Liszt; the individual spoken of, Herr Richard Wagner, whose star, last Saturday night, was visible above the English horizon for the first time. Previously, nothing but scintillations of its brightness could be detected; and not a few sympathetic souls chafed under the deprivation. Let us hope that, at last, they are happy.

One or two general reflections arise out of the production of Der Fliegende Holländer, and may be best dealt with at the outset. We shall probably hear many quotations of "Magna est veritas," &c., and many remarks to the effect that the English press, having kept Wagner out of the country for years, has at length been overcome. There will be great jubilation at the supposed victory of truth over prejudice, and great kindling of hope, now that the Apostle of Future Music has gained a footing in the land. The sight of happiness is always agreeable to a well-constituted mind, and we have not the smallest desire to interfere with the pleasure of young Anglo-Germans. It must be stated, nevertheless, that the idea of journalism keeping Wagner out of England is a chimera, only a little less wild than the poet-composer's own theory as to the opposition he encounters.

Herr Wagner went to sleep not long ago, and dreamed of a ubiquitous and omnipotent organization of Jews, which met him at every turn, eager to be avenged upon the man who sneered at Mendelssohn, and called Meyerbeer "the most despicable music-manufacturer of the period." With regard to England, Herr Wagner saw in his dream that our religion, being largely influenced by the Old Testament, made us very susceptible to the operations of the Jewish league, and secured for his enemies an easy victory. Waking up, he wrote a pamphlet, in which these fancies were put forward as realities; and his disciples naturally imitate their master; but the latter was not more self-deceived than are the former. Supposing, however, that the charge made against the press were true, there is an obvious and sufficient justification. It is possible to look upon Herr Wagner's music as destructive to the interests of art; and therefore, as music upon which all art-conservators should wage war. To establish a sanitary cordon, in hope of keeping out such poison, would be, therefore, an act of which the doers need feel no shame. We should question its policy, nevertheless; at all events, with reference to the fully-developed Wagnerian theory and practice. Pope's dictum,—

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen."

is thoroughly applicable to the art-vice of which we speak—applicable enough even to disprove the sequel; for under no circumstances should we "first endure, then pity, then embrace," say, Tristan und Isolde. It follows that Herr Wagner's opponents can desire no better thing than the production in England, of all his works, and if a manager could be found willing to sacrifice a fortune on their account, he would deserve recompensing from the national treasury, with a bonus added.

The foregoing observations are, however, very nearly beside the mark when connected with Der Fliegende Holländer. Whatever the fate of this opera, it can bear only in a slight degree upon the Wagnerian controversy—for the sufficient reason that the opera itself but faintly illustrates Wagnerian doctrines. The inventor of future music, if Herr Wagner be the inventor (which those will doubt who read the curious parallel between him and Lully in Richi's Culturstudien aus drei Jahrhunderten), is no Minerva, sprung, fully developed, from the brain of Jove. Like Beethoven he has had "styles," commencing with the Italian French Das Liebesverbot and Rienzi, just "feeling his feet," to use a nursery expression, in Der Fliegende Holländer—where, also, he came in contact with his beloved legends—and finally running off on his own account in Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Tristan und Isolde, and the Nibelungen. It is probable, therefore, that Herr Wagner now looks upon Der Fliegende Holländer as Goliath of Gath might have looked upon the toy-spear of his youthful days, and we can imagine how regretfully the composer of Lucerne has heard that London selected what he did at thirty years of age in preference to an illustration of his ripper genius. Herr Wagner may, however, console himself with the thought that Der Fliegende Holländer is very good milk for babes, and that, when the digestive powers of English amateurs are stronger, a cry will be raised for something more substantial.

Under the circumstances we have detailed, there is no need to argue for or against Herr Wagner's distinctive theories, which his third opera but dimly foreshadows. To those, however, who, knowing somewhat of their realistic character, are attracted by daring novelty, we would commend the words of Lortzing: "If art is to be anything at all, it must indulge in a great many things that are unnatural; and herein lies the charm of art, that, notwithstanding its heterogeneous means, it can bring about an illusion that shall resemble real life." To these remarks may fittingly be added those of Goethe: "Herein lies the dangerous demon for you youngsters: You are quick to create new ideas, but how about giving them shape and form? Every branch of art has its weak point in theory, which must be retained in practice, because by suppressing it you come too near to Nature and art is made inartistic." The passage we have italicized may be used as an exorcism, and ought effectually to "lay" the ghost of Future-Music whenever it appears.

THADDEUS EGO.

[From the Musical Times.]

So thoroughly has the public been warned off accepting the music of Wagner in this country, that we could scarcely wonder at the number of empty stalls which met the eye on Saturday the 23rd ult., when the curtain rose for the first performance of "Der Fliegende Holländer," or, as the title has been Italianized, "L'Olandese Dannato." But, in spite of much opposition, even concert frequenters have been now and then made acquainted with some of the works of the great prophet; for the overture to Tannhäuser has been often performed at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere, young ladies play the March from the same Opera on the pianoforte, and the Introduction to "Lohengrin" has been re-demanded with acclamations at the Philharmonic. All this of course shows that the public is gradually taking the liberty of judging for itself; and although, therefore, as we have said, the house was thin on the production of his Opera for the first time in England, there can be no doubt that Herr Wagner has made his mark here, and that it will not be very easily effaced. This was first apparent by the burst of applause which could scarcely be restrained until the overture had finished; and the encore which was most positively insisted upon almost unanimously. The original, we might almost say eccentric, instrumentation of this Prelude so strongly indicates a mind unaccustomed to be bound by the conventional rules of art that, were it not for the obvious power which underlies his innovative tendencies, the music would be simply thrown aside as worthless. Judged, however, as a characteristic foreshadowing of the romantic story which is to come, there is a dramatic feeling so strangely weird and thrilling in parts, so full of that sense of the supernatural throughout, that it is impossible to resist its fascination. The whole of the first act, although somewhat gloomy, from the nature of the subject, is remarkably dramatic, the only objection being that the passages of mere declamation are somewhat too much lengthened. The best music of the opera is in the second act, which opens with a charmingly fresh chorus of young girls, who are discovered spinning. Then comes the legend of the "Flying Dutchman," related by the half demented Senta, who believes that she is destined to remove the curse from the roving seaman by remaining constant in her attachment to him. The broken phrases to which this legend is set, are truly in sympathy with the words; and there is also some clever and effective writing in the Duet with the Hunter Erik, which follows. But the gem of the work is the grand duet between Senta and the Dutchman, in which she declares her love, and pledges her faith to him. The varied feelings throughout this long and elaborate duet are so felicitously expressed in the vocal parts, the instrumentation is so richly colored, and the situation itself has such deep interest, that the applause at the conclusion was loud and prolonged enough to amount to a positive Wagnerian demonstration. The last act opens with a chorus of Norwegian sailors, the theme of which is prominent in the overture. The music which follows has much dramatic interest; but it is so little moulded on the operatic plan of detaching portions of the action of the piece for the manufacture of songs, duets, trios and quartets that we can hold out but small hope for the music-shops. How far the composer has gained in effect by throwing over the usual conventionalities of the lyrical drama is a question which on one hearing of this remarkable Opera, we are not competent to pronounce; but that every one of the audience felt under the influence of a man who had struck out an original path for himself, and had power enough to make others accompany him, was apparent by the deep interest with which every note was listened to, and the enthusiastic applause with which the various pieces were received. Be it remembered, however, that "L'Olandese Dannato," is not to be accepted as an exponent of the developed style of Wagner, for it is an early opera, and contains much that he would now willingly expunge.

From "Tannhäuser," of which we know but little, to "Walkyrie," of which we know nothing, he has worked upon a theory which, for good or evil, has materially influenced public musical feeling in Germany, and is now likely, at least, to cause much division of opinion in England. That he may have a fair trial is our earnest wish; and we cannot but thank the manager of Drury Lane for giving us a chance of hearing even an immature specimen of the style of this much abused composer. In every respect the execution of the Opera must be commended in the highest degree. Mr. Sandley, as the Dutchman, and Mlle. Ilma di Murska as Senta, achieved a real triumph in the great duet in the second act, and indeed sang the whole of the music with a perfect mastery over its extreme difficulties. Signor Foli was an excellent representative of the Norwegian Skipper, Daland, and Signor Perotti (who lately made a successful debut as Faust), created quite an enthusiasm as Erik the Hunter. The Opera was well placed upon the stage, and Signor Arditi contributed much to its success by his watchful and intelligent conducting.

Provisional Statutes of the School for Practical Musicians in Connection with the Royal Academy of Arts, Berlin.

I.

In connection with the Royal Academy of Arts, besides the school founded, in virtue of a Royal Order of the 31st March, 1833, for musical composition, there has existed, since October 1st, 1869, a School of Practical Music, in which school instruction is now given on the violin, tenor, violoncello, and pianoforte, as well as in musical theory. The power is reserved of extending the school by establishing classes for solo and choral singing, and of completing the plan of study by including other instruments and other subjects.

II.

These several courses of instruction constitute together an Academic High School of Music, the objects of the said school being the maintenance, propagation, and development of a model classical style, by imparting as perfect an education as possible, to such students of talent as may entertain the same objects and be willing to carry them out, either as public artists, as composers and teachers, or in private life, by practising, spreading, and promoting art in this sense.

III.

With regard to the Academic School for Musical Composition, that will be carried on, until further notice, in conformity with the arrangements made by virtue of the regulation of the 30th July, 1833, affecting the musical section of the Royal Academy of Arts, and the regulation and plan of study, of the 4th September, 1834, affecting the Academic School for Musical Composition, provided such regulations be not subjected to revision.

IV.

Such persons only will be received into the Academic School for Practical Music as are in a condition to prove that they possess a previous education rendering them capable of higher efforts. Elementary musical instruction will not be imparted in the High School, except in so far as it may be in certain branches indispensable as a complement of general musical education, over and above the principal subject of study.

V.

As a rule, the qualifications for admission into the School for Practical Music are, that:

1. Candidates must have completed their sixteenth year.
2. They must prove they possess a general education, equal to that given to male pupils of the second class in a high school.
3. They must give a specimen of what their musical capabilities are.

VI.

The entire course of instruction in the School commences at the beginning of the month of September, and is continued uninterruptedly till its conclusion in the second week of the month of July. There is, however, a week's holiday at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, respectively.

Persons desiring to be admitted as students must address all communications to Professor Joachim, to whom they must, at the same time, forward a slight sketch of their life, written by themselves, and proofs of their fulfilling the necessary conditions.

VII.

The annual grand examination of candidates takes place during the first days of the month of September, but is more precisely fixed by the Director. It depends upon the will of the latter, and the necessities of the case, whether or no pupils, after a preparatory examination, shall be admitted also at Christmas and Easter.

If the examination prove satisfactory, and the conditions enumerated in Statute V. be fulfilled, the Directors will notify the fact to the Curators of the Royal Academy of Arts, who will order the admission of the candidates into the School of Practical Music, acquainting at the same time the Director of the Academy of the fact.

A candidate can be relieved from conditions Nos. 1 and 2, included under Statute V., in virtue of special musical talent, the dispensation to be accorded through the Curators of the Academy.

VIII.

Such pupils as are admitted are bound to attend regularly the course of instruction; to observe and perform punctually the tasks set them; and to lead a moral life, both during, and out of, the hours devoted to study, as, also, to follow implicitly the instructions given them by the Director and the masters.

Students failing to observe these rules will be reprimanded, and, if they still continue not to observe the said rules, they shall, after having been warned without effect, be, at the request of the Directors, dismissed by the Curators of the Academy.

In urgent cases, the Director is empowered provisionally to forbid a student from attending the classes or frequenting the Institution.

IX.

The students are, moreover, bound, supposing that such is the decision of the Director, to take part in the public performances of the High School; but they must not, without his permission, perform in public elsewhere, or cause compositions of theirs to be performed.

X.

The course of study at the School lasts generally three years. On leaving the School, each student receives a certificate of his capabilities, such certificate being signed by the Director and the student's special professor.

XI.

The students of the School for Practical Music will be considered, just as much as the students of the School for Composition, students of the Academy of Arts, and may attend the artistic and scientific lectures of the Academy and the University, as well as use the Library of the Academy.

XII.

For the above instruction, the charge will be 80 thalers a year, in four equal portions, payable in advance, the first instalment to be paid on the student's admission, and each of the following three on the 2nd January, 1st April, and 1st July respectively. In the case of necessitous students of unusual talent, the charge may be remitted, or lessened, by the Curators.

XIII.

Advanced artists, desirous of attending the High School temporarily, can, after signifying their intention and paying the sum of 50 thalers, be received for half a year. But, like the other students, they bind themselves to follow the usual course of study, and the special instructions of the Director, as well as to co-operate in any public performances which may be given during the said period by the Institution, either as soloists, in the chorus, or in the band. The same rule applies also to such amateurs as have not chosen to practise the art as the business of their life, though, they may, of course, seek admission to the entire course of instruction imparted in the School (Statute VI., X.), on their engaging to submit to all the conditions prescribed (Statutes VIII., IX., X., XII.), from certain ones of which they can be exempted only by the Director, if he shall judge fit.

XIV.

The Director of the School for Practical Music will, with the approbation of his Majesty the King, be appointed by the Minister of Public Instruction. Other permanent teachers are appointed by the Minister, on the recommendation of the Director. The other teachers are named by the Director with the approval of the Minister, who may, however, withdraw that approval.

XV.

The Director and the Professors of the School of Music hold the same position in the general organization of the Royal Academy of Arts, more especially as relates to the Director and the Curators, as all other professors of the Academy, having an equal share in the rights and advantages of the latter, without detriment to the especial position with regard to the Senate, of those who are at the same time members of the Musical Section of the Academy.

XVI.

The masters appointed to the School for Practical Music are, as such, placed immediately and directly under the authority of the Director. They engage to give punctually the lessons they have to give in accordance with the plan of study, and to conform to any other instructions they may receive from the Director.

They constitute, under the presidency of the Director, a College of Masters, which, as often as it may deem fit, shall meet to advise on the general affairs of the School of Music, and to decide on any thing else requiring its attention.

The masters are bound to support, with their talent, the public musical performances got up by the Institution.

XVII.

The masters in the School must not be at the same time masters in other public Musical Institutions in Berlin. Nor must they, without notifying the fact to the Director, and obtaining his consent, take part in any public musical performances in the said capital.

XVIII.

At the suggestion of the Director, public quartet performances will be given by the Instrumental Class of the School for Music, performances which will be carefully prepared and carried out by the masters, as models for the students and as a source of gratification to the public.

The students belonging to the Quartet-Class of the School of Music will be admitted free to the public quartet performances. The proceeds of these performances will, after the deduction of the expenses, and of the sum set aside for the Director and the Masters, be appropriated for the benefit of the School of Music, the Director having the right to propose how such proceeds shall be expended.

XIX.

The direction of such more important public performances, to be given by the School of Music, as may afterwards be decided on, is guaranteed to the Director of the Institution.

Handel's "Messiah."

How a great work of genius came to be,—how the flower springs up in a night, or the diamond in the cave became so full of light—is evermore a mystery. It is the same with the immortal masterworks of Poetry and Art, the same with "The Messiah." About the origin of the dear and noble Oratorio, among critics, there are several theories; as with the Iliad of Homer, and all works which live forever, there is mist and uncertainty about its beginning, though it is scarcely a century and a half old. The author, it is true, is known. But when and how did it originate in him? That is the question.

One theory makes it a mere money speculation of the harassed and brave composer. Having fairly used up and exhausted the soil of Italian Opera in London, he broke in upon new ground, and turned to more successful account his peculiar talent in the Fugue and great church style.

The usual account is this: Finding his operas fail, and weary with such trivial work, feeling that it was time now to do something far more worthy of his genius and more fitting his years, as he was getting old; having always had a religious turn; a staunch Lutheran in creed, well-read in his Bible; particularly fond of the prophets and of St. Paul, and impressed with the one pervading theme of the Scriptures, the fall and redemption of man, he resolved to put forth all his powers, and draw from all the resources of his art, to make an eloquent exposition of his faith in music, and interpret the Bible thus to the hearts of all men. In such a work he would discard the words and inventions of men. He would draw from the genuine fount of Inspiration, and from the Scriptures themselves cull out pregnant sentences, and arrange them in an epic unity, in which the whole great drama should lie hid, needing music only to warm it out into full life. The story goes, that an English Archbishop, hearing of his intention, sent and begged him to wait a while, and he would write the words for him. But Handel replied indignantly: "Does he think that he can write better than prophets and apostles, full of the Holy Ghost? or, that I have not read and loved my Bible as well as he?" So he chose for himself such passages as he wanted, and having set them all in due order, till they filled out the circle of his thought, began at the beginning and turned it into music.

So far as this is historical fact, it must not be disputed. But in the main point, namely, as regards its being a work of deliberate design on the part of Handel, it is evidently conjectural. If it was so, it was an exception to almost all great works of genius.

Far lovelier to the imagination is theory which supposes it the result of slow successive accretions, or rather that it had a fragmentary and accidental origin; that it had long existed in parts, scattered through his whole past life, till finally in one glowing hour of genius they were all fused into one perfect whole, to the surprise of himself as of every one. This makes it seem more as if the design lay in the eternal counsels of Fate and God, as if the work were the culminating flower, or fruit, of the man's whole nature, and not the arbitrary manufacture of his will. The view is thus naturally stated by Zelter, perhaps the first of musical critics in his day, in a letter to Goethe:

"Herder has somewhere called the Messiah a Christian Epos, and that is the very word for it. In fact, this work contains in its fragmentary composition the whole convolution of his Christianity, as faithful and reverential, as it is rationally poetic.

"The intention of the whole, taken as one work, I have always supposed to have arisen accidentally, and I can not wean myself from this opinion.

"The high festivals of the Church in Handel's time gave the composers an opportunity to set to music verses from all parts of the Bible, and from amongst it all some of the finest single pieces must have arisen. Handel, who had taste enough to reject the miserable church text of Broch, Picander and others, on which he and Bach and the rest had worked themselves weary, finally collected together the choruses which related to the Passion into one convolution, got some clever man to make the connecting hooks and rings between them, if he did not do it himself, and so there arose a cyclical work, which I divide into four or five parts, &c."

"* * * The good Rochlitz deserves great thanks, but his history of the origin of the Messiah a priori looks to me like all history (so called). The history of a work of Art (and every work of Art has its proper history) cannot be counted on the fingers, if Nature herself takes a thousand years to manufacture one such creature, who then, after all, seems to make his appearance accidentally. Necessity itself cannot exist without accident. Let every one think for himself: for me this accidental character is an indispensable beauty in every work of genius. I find it more convenient for my enjoyment of the piece; it does not require me to excuse anything."

Still better is Goethe's response to this suggestion:

"Your view of the rhapsodical origin of this work coincides with mine entirely; very naturally the soul may build up a funeral-pile of fragmentary elements, which it knows how to touch with its own fire at last, and send it blazing up, a pyramid, to heaven."

And again:

"I am not disinclined to the thought that it is a collection, and bringing together from a rich treasury of simple things; for at bottom it is all the same, whether it acquire its unity at the beginning, or at the end; it is still the soul that brings it out; and in the Christian Old and New Testament sense it lay there long ago all ready to his hand. So we may say about Homer," &c., &c.

This is simply saying, what in one sense is a truism, that a great work of genius and of Art is (spiritually, essentially) of no age, and no one can tell its birthday. For such a work is always new, and cannot lose its freshness. Just so in conversing with a great, true man, you forget to think what age he may be of; a white-haired octogenarian, still he seems younger than yourself, younger (in feeling, in appreciation, in lively interest in all things) than the fastest specimen of "Young America."

THE NATIONAL MUSICAL CONGRESS, which was organized in this city a year ago, mainly through the zeal and energy of Mr. Tourjée, the head of the New England Musical Conservatory,—with a view to greater unity of purpose and of method in the musical development of the American people,—will hold its second annual Convention at Steinway Hall, New York, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday next week (Aug. 30, 31, and Sept. 1). The following Programme of Exercises for the three days is given in the Circular of the Committee of Arrangements: Messrs. Henry C. Watson, John Stephenson, James Pech, Henry L. Stuart and Eben Tourjée:

Tuesday, August 30.

- 10 A.M. Transaction of Business, including the Appointment of Committees, Announcements, &c.
- 2.30 P.M. Opening Exercises. Addresses of Welcome. Response and Address, by the President.
- A Paper, by Henry C. Watson, Esq., New York. Subject: "The National Musical Congress; its Duties and its Objects."
- 4 P.M. A Paper by L. H. Southard, Mus. Doc., Director of Music, Peabody Institute, Baltimore, Md. Subject: "Musical Criticism."
- 8 P.M. A Paper by James Pech, Mus. Doc. Oxon., Senior Organist of Trinity Parish, New York. Subject: "Academical Degrees in Music."

Wednesday, August 31.

- 10 A.M. A Paper by Theo. F. Seward, Esq., Orange, N. J. Subject: "What can this Association do to Revive an Interest in Elementary Musical Instruction?"
- 11 A.M. An Illustration, by Luther Whiting Mason, Esq., Boston, Mass., of "The Method Employed in the Public Schools of Boston, in Teaching Vocal Music to Young Children," with practical exercises by a class of children from the Primary Schools of New York.
- 2.30 P.M. A Paper by Geo. F. Root, Esq., Chicago, Ill. Subject: "Philosophy of the Elementary Principles of Music."
- 4 P.M. A Paper by John P. Morgan, Esq., New York. Subject: "The Study of the Theory of Music, in its legitimate Relations to General Education."
- 8 P.M. A Paper by J. O'Neill, Esq., Boston, Mass. Subject: "The Voice Considered as the Organ of Aesthetic Feeling in Art."

Thursday, September 1.

- 10 A.M. Miscellaneous Business.
- A Paper by S. A. Emery, Esq., Boston, Mass. Subject: "The Popular Taste."
- 11 A.M. A Paper by C. C. Converse, Esq., New York. Subject: "The Moral Influence of Music."
- 2.30 P.M. A Paper by Rev. E. Wentworth, D.D., Pittsfield, Mass. Subject: "Congregational Singing; its Advantages and its Difficulties."
- 3.30 P.M. A Paper by J. H. Cornell, Esq., New York. Subject: "Appropriate Music for the Church Service."

4.15 P.M. An address by John Zundel, Esq., of Brooklyn, N. Y., upon the same subject to be followed by a Discussion.

P.M. A Paper by Prof. Geo. J. Stoerkel, Mus. Doc., of Yale College, New Haven, Conn. Subject: "Dramatic Music."

Closing Exercises.

Each Paper presented to the Association will be open for discussion for the members.

Valuable Papers from W. S. B. Mathews, Esq., Chicago, Ill. Subject: "The Art of Piano-Forte Playing," and from Carlo Bassini, Esq., Brooklyn, N. Y. Subject: "Vocal Culture," have been contributed, and will be read during the Anniversary.

The Exercises will be interspersed by Vocal and Instrumental Music of a high order by leading artists.

How is THIS? We have not been present at the Great Organ "Nooings" lately, and we print the following complaint in the hope that, in so far as it may be just, it may prompt to a reform.

"MR. EDITOR: A stranger in this city, I went to the Music Hall this noon, expecting to hear a musician-like exhibition of the capabilities of the Great Organ, and was most signally disappointed. The selections of music were not made in good taste, the rapid passages were badly blurred, and the music was not played in time. It was simply impossible for my ear—though it is a trained one—to distinguish in what kind of time the pieces were written, and what were the time combinations used. Making long waits in order to adjust the stops, and recommencing phrases in order to rectify mistakes in combination, were faults in the performance.

"Can you not exert your influence to make the Organ performances a credit to the musical culture of the city, and a pleasure, instead of a bitter disappointment, to musicians who may attend them?"

MUSICUS."

PARISIAN NOTES. The gay metropolis has no thought now for its Opera Grand or Comique, its Padeloup Concerts, Cafés Chantantes, Musard and the rest, but waiting in sullen fear and rage for quite another kind of music. Even the Marseillaise and other war hymns must have lost the exulting tone with which they were sung two weeks ago; the roar of besieging cannon and the hiss of bombshells threaten soon to set their wild strains to a gloomier harmony. Of musical items we find chiefly such as these:

According to one of our French exchanges, the progress made by the Prussians in the present war is entirely due to the fact that the King of Bavaria, being the proprietor of the copyright of Wagner's operas, and with an eye to business, has managed to introduce the melodies of these operas into the military bands of the Prussians. According to our contemporary, the French troops could stand the needle gun but not Wagner's music.—Weekly Review.

MM. Auber and Mme. Veuve Scribe have given up their authors' rights (500 francs a night) in Masaniello, so long as the Marseillaise is sung during the performance. Here is the letter of the distinguished composer, addressed to M. Perrin:

"MON CHER AMI.—Moi aussi, je veux apporter mon obole. N'étant plus assez jeune pour voler à la frontière, je pense avec attendrissement à ceux qui, plus favorisés, vont défendre le drapeau, et je renonce en leur faveur à mes droits sur les bénéfices de la Muette, tant que la Marseillaise lui referra un succès. — Amitié, — AUBER."

M. GUSTAVE BERTRAND, writing to the Nord, recommends the orchestra of the Imperial Opera House to adopt the accompaniment written by Hector Berlioz for the "Marseillaise." It is, he says, not only characterized by musicianlike effects, but its publication was dictated by a genuine spirit of patriotism, of which a proof is given in the assignment of the chorus to "every one who has a voice, a heart, and blood in his veins."

The annual free performances at the Parisian theatres on the 15th of August (Emperor's fête day) will not take place, but the ordinary prices of admission will be charged, and the entire proceeds devoted to the Patriotic Fund for the Sick and Wounded.

A singular illustration of hereditary talent for music has just been furnished at the Paris Conservatoire, where the first prize for singing, for opera, and opera comique, has fallen to Mlle. Blanche Thibault; her sister, Mlle. Gabrielle, being also one of the lauréats. These young ladies, who last year obtained prizes for pianoforte playing, and are good practical musicians, are the daughters of the chief of the band of the National Guard, one of the most popular artistes in Paris.

The announcement that Paris is in a state of siege, coupled with the news that the workmen on the exterior of the new opera-house have nearly completed their task, suggests some unpleasant reflections as to the use which the new and much talked of building may be put to. To those who remember the lessons of history and are acquainted with the versatility of a French mob, the prospect must, to say the least of it, be filled with gloom for the architect and the chief decorator.

The most curious musical manifestation which the war has produced is that by Offenbach, who has composed an Imperial battle-song, called "Dien, garde l'Empereur." As Offenbach is a native of Cologne, his future career in Germany will be closed by this composition.

The subject of the following more cheerful notice made many warm friends and admirers in musical circles here in Boston a few years ago:

Report says that there is now studying under M. Roger (the well-known tenor of the Grand Opera), an American young lady, whose career as a songstress he predicts will be unusually brilliant. He has a private theatre, in which the pupils frequently appear. The audience is composed of managers of operas, composers, and musical critics, and is as competent an assembly as could well be collected. They confirm M. Roger's predictions. The young lady is Miss Mackie, and she has adopted for the stage the pseudonym, Mlle. Gastano. She passes in Paris generally for a Spaniard, and she looks like a daughter of Seville. Her admirers also accredit her with great beauty.

The Orchestra cites a couple of grim specimens of the excited French Muse; to wit:

The religious aspect which the war has to a certain extent assumed is oddly illustrated by some verses entitled "Les Français au Rhin," which have appeared in the French press. The lines might be taken for a burlesque were it not that they originated with the Univers. The sombre gaiety of the Catholic organ, is, it must be confessed, more curious than pleasant:—

Les Rhénans, tribu catholique,
Tremblent sous un roi protestant,
Dont le seul code est une trique,
La schlague le maître argument.
Bismarck veut Metz, Bitché et l'Alsace,
Pour y faire adorer Luther;
Ce démon xomi par l'enfer
Veut nous réduire à la besace.

Sur le Rhin
Portons notre frontière!
Plantons notre bannière
Sur le Rhin!

A Paris journal publishes in its first page the words and music of a war song worthy of the aborigines of New Caledonia. The second verse commences with these amiable sentiments:

Si l'ennemi dort dans la grange
Mets-y le feu, sans hésiter,
Pour balayer pareille fange.

The poet then expresses the hope "Qu'ils râleront sur nos fumiers," &c.

The musicians in Paris, amidst the din of arms and wars' alarms, have been busily engaged in the distribution of musical prizes—at the Conservatoire, under the President Auber; at the School of Religious Music, by its founder (1853), Louis Niedermeyer; and at the seventy-seven communal schools of Paris, for singing, under the direction of Padeloup. The above institutions, collectively, give gratuitous musical instruction, in various branches of the art, to some three or four thousand students of both sexes. When shall we see similar institutions?

Elmira Female College.

[The State of New York, it seems, has more than one largely endowed College for young women, in which musical instruction is made of great account. We have received the following communication.]

This College, located at Elmira, New York, is to the south-western part of the State what Vassar is to the Eastern. It was founded in 1855 by Simeon Benjamin, Esq., whose donations amounted to $80,000. During the last year there has been an appropriation of $25,000 by the State Legislature of New York, which had been depending upon the raising of $50,000 by citizens of Elmira. There is also, in addition to this, an Aid Fund of $25,000 for the encouragement of young ladies of limited means. Its total property is upwards of $200,000. It has provided a Course of Study, with advantages of libraries, observatories, apparatus, literary societies and lectures.

By the terms of its Charter it has the right of Confering Degrees, Academic and Honorary, and every year it sends out its Bachelors of Arts (generic term including maidens) with Diplomas delivered into their hands, after a truly classical formula, by the worthy President, Rev. A. W. Cowles, D.D.

The Musical Department of the College has many advantages not enjoyed in any other institution for young ladies in our country. A very superior organ from the celebrated establishment of Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook, of Boston, has recently been added to the Department. This instrument is pronounced by the most competent judges to be unsurpassed for excellence of tone and finish, by any instrument of its size and volume in the country. It has two banks of keys with full compass from CC to A in Alt, fifty-eight notes, with pedal twenty-five notes. It has seventeen of the most approved stops, with all the modern improvements, which have rendered the Messrs. Hook & Co., distinguished as organ builders.

The fourth story of the octagon of the building, containing sixteen rooms, is devoted to the practise of Vocal and Instrumental Music (Piano and Guitar). During the past year the College has been furnished throughout with new pianos. Dumb Pianos are used for the practise of exercises, as in European Conservatories, to correct bad habits in fingering and position of hands.

There is a Course of Study in both Vocal and Instrumental Music. Pupils are requested to finish the first part of the Course, after which they can proceed with it, or abandon the practise of exercises. That the greater part prefer to continue the Course is encouraging to those who are endeavoring to create an ambition for thorough practice, and to establish a high standard of music in the College.

Of the Music Department the Elmira Gazette of June 24th says:

"The deservedly high reputation of the musical department of the College has been attained under its present management with Miss Laura A. Wentworth, Instructor and Directress.

"To this estimable lady, an unsurpassed worker in this field of labor, all the excellence this department now possesses must be attributed. Her energy, indefatigable industry, rare tact and splendid attainments in music, have raised the department to its present high rank.

"The Choruses during the present Commencement Week have illustrated her success as an instructor and directress as gratifyingly as her solo singing evinced her rare attainments in fine vocalization. The time was excellent, the concord exact. They were sung with fine expression and, what with good time is of the utmost importance in choruses, there was the most distinct enunciation."

The following pieces were sung during Commencement weeks of 1869-70.

PIANO SOLOS.

Sonata Pathétique.....Beethoven.
Murmures Eolennes.....Gottschalk.
Erl King.....Liszt.
Andante.....Thalberg.
Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn.

VOCAL DUETS.

"Return of Spring".....Kücken.
"Greeting".....Mendelssohn.

VOCAL TRIOS.

"Tu sol quest Arina".....Verdi.
"Lift thine eyes".....Eljah.
"Protect us through the coming night".....Curshman.

VOCAL SOLOS.

"Una voce poco fa".....Rossini.
"Echo Song," with Flute Obligato.....Bishop.

OVERTURES.

To "William Tell," "Don Giovanni," "Barber of Seville," "Der Freischütz," "Dichter und Bauer," and "Jubel" Overture for Organ and Pianos, sixteen and eight hands.

CHORUSES.

"The Heavens are telling"....."Creation."
"Hallelujah"....."Messiah."
"Our land is Free"....."Moses in Egypt."
"Green be your fame forever".....
"Hark, again the thrilling horn".....Cinderella.
"Mighty Jehovah".....Bellini.
"Gloria".....Mozart's 12th Mass.

FLORENCE.—A grand concert lately given in the Principe Umberto Theatre, by Dr. Hans von Bülow, has created quite a sensation. Works by Cherubini, Mozart, Rossini, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and von Bülow, were executed by an orchestra of a hundred performers. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which had never before been given here on so grand a scale, produced a deep impression on all present. The concert may justly be said to be a triumph for German classical music in Italy.—The Boccherini Quartet Association celebrated Beethoven's Centenary by a performance of the Quintet in C major; the "Kroutzer" Sonata; selections from Fidelio; and the Septet.

Herr Joseph Strauss died on the 22nd July. He was born on the 22nd August, 1827, in the St. Ulrich suburb, Vienna, and was, therefore, in his 43rd year. It is a well-known fact that the father, Johann Strauss, was strongly opposed to Joseph and his two brothers cultivating music, even as a relaxation; but their mother had them taught secretly. Herr Joseph Strauss first appeared before the public in the year 1853. He has composed about 300 different pieces.

A short time since, in consequence of a second communication, Herr Wagner replied to the Committee of the Beethoven Festival at Vienna. His letter was not, however, addressed to the Committee itself, but to the vice-chairman, Herr Dumba, personally. According to the Alle Presse, it ran as follows:—

"In reply to your especial enquiry of the 24th June last, I regret having to inform you, in writing, that I consider as not existing any written or printed document bearing either of the names, Hanslik, or Schelle. However honorable the other names of which a committee may boast, immediately the above two names are among them, any invitation from such a community is, for me, as though it had never been sent. If the Imperial University, and Press selected those two individuals as their representatives, neither side can really suppose that there was ever any serious intention of inviting me. As, however, I mean no longer to put up with jokes in certain quarters, I beg, my dear Sir, that you will understand it is impossible for me to answer the invitation sent."

Professor Hanslik has published his view of the matter, in the shape of a feuilleton, in the Neue Freie Presse.

The Athenæum speaks very well of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," which was produced in London on the 23d of July, for the first time on the English stage. In this opera Wagner "has adhered strictly to conventional rules in the composition; he has violated no laws in the setting of the legend; he has simply followed in the beaten track of his predecessors in operatic writing. His score is laid out in routine order; his overture is a prelude to the leading themes of the singer; his numbers are divided in the orthodox fashion of recitative and cabaletta; nay, more, he has even maintained the point d'orgue, so completely is his air or scena noted like other reasonable musicians. O si sic omnia! The musician who could write such a second act as that of the "Fliegende Holländer" might have entered the lists with the master-minds of any epoch." While Wagner was engaged upon this opera, and doing miscellaneous work for the Paris music publishers, his "Rienzi" was trying in vain to get admission at one opera-house after another. At last, through the influence of Mme. Schröder-Devrient, the celebrated singer, it was accepted at Dresden; but, when the news reached the composer, he was so poor that he had to sell the libretto of the "Flying Dutchman" for 500 francs, to pay his travelling expenses to the Saxon capital. The text he thus relinquished was set to music by M. Dietrich; but this gentleman's work proved an entire failure. "Rienzi" was received so favorably at Dresden that Wagner was encouraged to produce another opera; and accordingly finished the present work, and brought it out with entire success in 1842. The performance in London seems to have been mediocre. The scenery and mechanical effects were indifferently arranged, and none of the principal artists satisfied the critics except Mlle. Ilma di Murka.

A MS. composition by Handel has been discovered by Mr. Brinley Richards, in the British Museum. It is a concerto for the triple-stringed harp of Wales, written by the great composer for Powell, the harper to King George II., and consisting of an allegro, a larghetto, and a rondo finale. It was performed recently at a concert of Welsh music given by Lady Llanover, Herr Sjöden playing the harp part, and the tutti being two violins, a viola, a 'cello, and a double bass.

Hector Berlioz and Friedrich Wilhelm IV.

Speaking of the late king of Prussia Hector Berlioz, in his Memoirs, says:—"But I must now tell you about a dinner at Sans Souci, to which the King sent me an invitation through Meyerbeer. Among the guests were Alexander von Humboldt, Count Wielhorski, and the Princesses of Prussia. After the dessert coffee was served in the gardens. The King walked about, holding his cup in his hand. Having gone up the steps of a summer-house, he suddenly caught sight of me, and called out:

"Hi! Berlioz, come here. You shall tell me about my sister, and your journey to Russia."

"I hastened to fulfil his Majesty's wishes, and soon, I forget by what mad ideas, put my august Amphytrion in a most merry humor."

"Have you learnt Russian?"

"No, your Majesty; all I can say is: Na prava, na lave (to the right, to the left), to make myself intelligible to a sledge-driver, and Dourack, if the conductor is wrong."

"What's Dourack?"

"Blockhead, your Majesty!"

"Blockhead, your Majesty! Oh! that is splendid! Your Majesty, Blockhead; Blockhead, your Majesty." And his Majesty shook so with laughter that all the contents of his cup became acquainted with the ground.

This merriment of the King's, in which I shared without affectation, made me suddenly an important personage. Several officers, chamberlains, and others, who had been watching the scene, deemed it advisable to put themselves on a good footing with a man who had just laughed so heartily and unreservedly with the King. I was quickly surrounded by a crowd of grand gentlemen, whom I had not previously remarked, and who, for their part, had not taken the slightest notice of me. They bowed to me, and gently breathed in modest accents: 'I am, sir, Prince —, and shall feel happy to make your acquaintance.' 'Sir, I am Count —, allow me to congratulate you on the success you have just achieved.' 'Sir, I am the Baron —; I had the honor of meeting you six years ago in Brunswick. I am delighted,' &c., &c.

"I could not imagine to what I was all at once indebted for this nimbus at the Prussian Court, when I recollected the scene in the first act of Les Huguenots, where Raoul, after receiving the note from the Queen, finds himself surrounded by cavaliers, who all offer him their friendship in the most pressing manner. He is supposed to be a favorite of her Majesty's. Oh! how comic is the little world which is called the great!"

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Village Blacksmith's Bride Ballad. (Mein Liebster ist im Dorf der Schmied). 4. A to a. Idled. 40

"My Lover is the village smith,
I love him well and true!
As up and down his hammer beats,
My heart beats with it too."

An effective song with English and German words, modulating in pleasing changes, with a very striking accompaniment.

Sunset on the waters. 3. Bb to f. Lyle. 30

"The golden sun is streaming
Across the waters bright,
Where gentle wavelets playing
Are crowned with golden light."

An Andante con affettuoso movement, with a fine melody and good accompaniment.

Dying Alone. Song and Chorus. 3. Ab to f. Fuller. 35

"Homeless and sad I have wandered along,
No one to help me in all the gay throng;
Hopeless and heart sick, in tears and despair,
Bowed with misfortune, and sorrow and care.

A melody well adapted to express the words.

Instrumental.

Etudes de Style. For the Piano. Book I. 6.

Various Keys. Op. 14. Ravina. 1.50

Book I. contains 7 Etudes, viz.: 1. Allegretto voluttuoso. C.—2. Tempo giusto e lusingando. Ab.—3. Allegretto sciolto. A.—4. Andantino e con sentimento. Gb.—5. Moderato e con garbo. A minor.—6. Allegro agitato. B minor.—7. Fanfare. Allegro spiritoso. Eb.

Fantasia on Scotch Airs, for Six hands (Three performers). 5. G. Czerny. 1.25

Grand Offertoire de St. Cecile. No. 2, for the Organ. 6. D. Op. 8. E. Batiste. 1.00

A very beautiful composition in the Free Style of Organ Music. The melody is first given out with the Pedale coupled to the full manuals in an Andante maestoso movement followed by a brilliant Allegro in D minor, preparatory to the introduction of the touching theme for the small oboe, with an accompaniment of arpeggio chords on the obor organ, after which the first allegro is again taken up and finally modulates preparatory to introducing the theme on the Vox Humana in chords with the Tremulant, for the left hand, with a series of liquid arpeggio runs for the right hand on the choir manual. At the close of this fascinating phrase, the stops are gradually added until the full power of the organ is attained, when the grand theme is taken up in D major, with full chords in both hands and the pedals in rolling notes through the whole scale, giving the most majestic effect conceivable.

The Battle.

FROM THE GERMAN OF SCHILLER.

Heavy and solemn,
A cloudy column,
Through the green plain they marching come,
Measureless spread, like a table drend,
For the cold, grim dice of the iron game.
Looks are bent on the shaking ground,
Hearts beat low with a knelling sound;
Swift by the breasts that must bear the brunt Gallops the major along the front.
"Halt!"
And fettered they stand at the stark command,
And the warriors silent halt.

Proud in the blush of morning glowing,
What on the hill-top shines in flowing?
"See you the foeman's banners waving?"
"We see the foeman's banners waving;
God be with you, children and wife!"
Hark to the music—the drum and fife—
How they ring through the ranks which they rouse to the strife!
Thrilling they sound with their glorious tone,
Thrilling they go through the marrow and bone;
Brothers, God grant when this life is o'er,
In the life to come that we meet once more!

See the smoke, how the lightning is cleaving asunder!
Hark! the guns, peal on peal, how they boom in their thunder!
From host to host, with kindling sound,
The shouted signal circles round,
Freer already breathes the breath!
The war is raging, slaughter raging,
And heavy through the reeking pall,
The iron death-dice fall!
Nearer they close—foes upon foes—
"Ready!"—from square to square it goes.

They kneel, as one man, from flank to flank,
And the fire comes sharp from the foremost rank;
Many a soldier to earth is sent,
Many a gap by ball is rent;
O'er the corpse before springs the hindmost man,
That the line may not fall to the fearless van;
To the right, to the left, and around and around,
Death whirls in its dance on the bloody ground.
God's sunlight is quenched in the fiery fight,
Over the hosts falls a brooding night!
Brother, God grant, when this life is o'er,
In the life to come we may meet once more!

The dead men are bathed in the weltering blood,
And the living are blent in the slippery flood,
And the feet, as they reeling and sliding go,
Stumble still on the corpses that sleep below.
"What? Francis!"—"Give Charlotte my last farewell!"
As the dying man murmurs, the thunders swell—
"I'll give—oh, God! are the guns so near?"
Ho, comrades!—yon volley!—look sharp to the rear!
I'll give to thy Charlotte thy last farewell;
Sleep soft, where Death thickest descendeth in rain,
The friend thou forsakest, thy side may regain!"
Hitherward, thitherward, reels the fight,
Dark and more darkly, day glooms into night.
Brethren, God grant when this life is o'er,
In the life to come that we meet once more!

Hark to the hoots that galloping go!
The adjutants flying,
The horsemen press hard on the panting foe;
Their thunder booms in dying—
Victory!

Tremor has seized on the dastards all,
And their leaders fall!
Victory!

Closed is the brunt of the glorious fight,
And the day, like a conqueror, bursts on the night.
Trumpet and fife swelling choral along,
The triumph, already, sweeps marching in song.
Farewell, fallen brothers, though this life be o'er,
There's another in which we shall meet you once more.

Music a Means of Culture.

BY J. S. DWIGHT.

(From the Atlantic Monthly for September.)

OUR musical history has been peculiar. We were in no sense a musical people forty years ago. Nothing could be further from the old New England character and "bringing up,"—we will not call it culture. But, strangely (and not much in accordance with the common theory that the way to elevate the taste is to begin with what is light and popular), the first real and deep interest in music awakened here in Boston was an interest in the greatest kind of music. Handel, and then more irresistibly Beethoven, were the first to take deep hold on thoughtful, earnest, influential souls. This was when the new spirit of culture, in the fullest, freest, highest sense, became in various ways so rife in this community. So that it is scarcely paradoxical to say, that music in this country, or at least this portion of the country, "came in with the conqueror." That is to say, the love for the highest kind of music (for it is only the love of it, not the creative gift as yet), which has for some time been imputed to this once Puritanical Boston and the regions spiritually watered from it, came in with the conquering ideas,—with the ideas of spiritual freedom, of self-reliance, of the dignity of human nature, of the insignificance of creeds compared with life and practice, of social justice, equal opportunities to all, a common birthright in the beautiful,—ideas which from the time of Channing began to quicken the whole thought and conscience of the young Republic, and which were glowing with fresh fervor of conviction in the light of that ideal philosophy which, where it made one mystic, made a dozen practical and sound reformers,—ideas fitly summed up in the one idea of CULTURE, in the nobler sense in which it then began to haunt the mind, as something distinct from, and superior to, the barren routine of a narrow, utilitarian, provincial, and timid education; culture in the sense of free unfolding of intrinsic germs of character, of conscious, quick, sincere relationship and sympathy with all the beauty and the order of the universe, instead of in the old sense of a mere makeshift clothing upon from without with approved special knowledges, conventional beliefs and maxims, and time-honored prejudices. Intimately implied in this idea of culture is the æsthetic principle. For what is culture without art?—art, the type and mirror of ideal, complete life, the one free mode of man's activity, wherein he may become partaker in the Divine creative energy? And what form of art, what ministry to the æsthetic instinct, was so peculiarly the need and product of our age, so widely, easily available, as music? It was not strange that it should come in with the conquering ideas, as we have said.

At all events, it is a fact of some significance that the interest here felt in Beethoven began at the same moment with the interest in Emerson, and notably in the same minds who found such quickening in his free and bracing utterance. It was to a great extent the young souls drawn to "Transcendentalism" (as it was nicknamed), to escape spiritual starvation, who were most drawn also to the great, deep music which we began to hear at that time. For, be it remembered, the first great awakening of the musical instinct here was when the C Minor Symphony of Beethoven was played, thirty years ago or more, in that old theatre, long since vanished from the heart of the drygoods part of Boston, which had been converted into an "Odeon," where an "Academy of Music" gave us some first glimpses of the glories of great orchestral music. Some may yet remember how young men and women of the most cultured circles, whom the new intellectual day-spring had made thoughtful and at the same time open and impressible to all appeals of art and beauty, used to sit there through the concert in that far-off upper gallery or sky-parlor, secluded in the shade, and give themselves up completely to the influence of the sublime harmonies that sank into their souls, enlarging and coloring thenceforth the whole horizon of their life. Then came the Brook Farm experiment; and it is equally a curious fact, that music, and of the best kind, the Beethoven Sonatas, the Masses of Mozart and Haydn, got at, indeed, in a very humble, home-made, and imperfect way, was one of the chief interests and refreshments of those halcyon days. Nay, it was among the singing portion of those plain farmers, teachers, and (but for such cheer) domestic drudges, that the first example sprang up of the so-called "Mass Clubs," once so much in vogue among small knots of amateurs. They met to practise music which to them seemed heavenly, after the old hackneyed glees and psalm-tunes, though little many of them thought or cared about the creed embodied in the Latin words that formed the convenient vehicle for tones so thrilling; the music was quite innocent of creed, except that of the heart and of the common deepest wants and aspirations of all souls, darkly locked up in formulas, till set free by the subtle solvent of the delicious harmonies. And our genial friend who sits in Harper's "Easy Chair" has lately told the world what parties from "the Farm" (and he was "one of them") would come to town to drink in the symphonies, and then walk back the whole way, seven miles, at night, elated and unconscious of fatigue, carrying home with them a new good genius, beautiful and strong, to help them through the next day's labors. Then, too, and among the same class of minds (the same "Transcendental set"), began the writing and the lecturing on music and its great masters, treating it from a high spiritual point of view, and seeking (too imaginatively, no doubt) the key and meaning to the symphony, but anyhow establishing a vital, true affinity between the great tone-poems and all great ideals of the human mind. In the "Harbinger," for years printed at Brook Farm, in the "Dial," which told the time of day so far ahead, in the writings of Margaret Fuller and others, these became favorite and glowing topics of discourse; and such discussion did at least contribute much to make music more respected, to lift it in the esteem of thoughtful persons to a level with the rest of the "humanities" of culture, and especially to turn attention to the nobler compositions, and away from that which is but idle, sensual, and vulgar.

The kind reader will grant plenary indulgence to these gossiping memories, and must not for a moment think it is intended by them to claim for any one class the exclusive credit of the impulse given in those days to music. Cecilia had her ardent friends and votaries among conservatives as well. But is it not significant as well as curious, that the free-thinking and idealistic class referred to (call them "Transcendental dreamers" if you will, they can afford to bear the title now!) were so largely engaged in the movement,—that among the "select few," constant to all opportunities of hearing the great music in its days of small things here, so many of this class were found? The ideas of those enthusiasts, if we look around us now, have leavened the whole thought and culture of this people; have melted icy creeds, and opened genial communion between sects; have set the whole breast of the nation heaving, till it has cast off the vampire of at least one of its great established crimes and curses; have set all men thinking of the elevation of mankind. These are the conquering ideas, and with them came in the respect for music, which now in its way, too, is leavening, refining, humanizing our too crude and swaggering young democratic civilization. A short pedigree! but great ideas, by their transforming power, work centuries of change in a few years.

The great music came in then because it was in full affinity with the best thoughts stirring in fresh, earnest souls. The same unsatisfied, deep want that shrank from the old Puritanic creed and practice; that sought a positive soul's joy instead of abnegation; that yearned for the "beauty of holiness," and for communion with the Father in some sincere way of one's own without profession; that kindled with ideals of a heaven on earth and of a reign of love in harmony with Nature's beauties and the prophecies of Art,—found just then and here unwonted comfort, courage, and expression in the strains of the divine composers, of which we were then getting the first visitations. It was as if our social globe, charged with the electricity of new divine ideas and longings, germs of a new era, were beginning to be haunted by auroral gleams and flashes of strange melody and harmony. Young souls, resolved to keep their youth and be true to themselves, felt a mysterious attraction to all this, though without culture musically. Persons not technically musical at all would feel the music as they felt the rhythm of the ocean rolling in upon the beach. They understood as little of the laws of one as of the other fascinating and prophetic mystery. Beethoven, above all, struck the key-note of the age; in his deep music, so profoundly human, one heard, as in a sea shell, the murmur of a grander future. Beethoven, Handel, Mozart, found no more eager audience than among these "disciples of the newness" (as some sneeringly called them), these believing ones, who would not have belief imposed upon them, who cared more for life than doctrine, and to whom it was a prime necessity of heart and soul to make life genial. This was to them "music of the future," in a more deep and real sense than any Wagner of these later times has been inspired to write.

All this, to be sure, does not prove us to be a "musical people." It does prove that the great music, into which great, earnest men like Beethoven breathed the secret of their lives, has a magnetic, quick affinity with the great thought and impulses beginning at that time to renew religion, politics, society, and the whole spirit and complexion of the age. With the casting adrift from old authorities and creeds came this instinctive feeling forth for Art, as for a tangible assurance of the essential "substance of things hoped for." The æsthetic instinct woke in us (to music's touch more quickly than to any other) to save this radicalism from sheer discomfortable, boisterous, quarrelsome negation, from the rude, antagonistic, and destructive attitude, from that hard, dry, killing prose of life, unquickening, discouraging, conceited, overbearing, which is of the very essence of atheism, and overturns the altars of the old religions only to worship self and the all mighty dollar. True radicalism is positive, affirmative, not negative; a seeker of agreement, unity, and not of difference; a puller down of only what obstructs the rising of a more divine and universal temple. Resenting imposition and authority, it has respect for all sincere beliefs, and loves to find the truth there is or ever was in each. Now much of that transcendental radicalism was of this temper, and naturally found a reconciling, saving grace in Art; in music, most of all, as the most fluid, subtle, sympathetic of the arts; the Christian, modern, youngest art, which, weaving airy motion into forms immortal, best illustrates life's perpetual becoming, and does not stand a milestone of arrested progress; the art which, while it is infinitely expressive and suggestive, does not limit to precise interpretations, to mere word meanings, or too inquisitive thought meanings; does not tie us down to definitions.

We were but babes in music, doubtless, and capable of little scientific understanding of the works we heard with rapture. Shall it be said, then, that this love was mostly affectation, or illusion?

What was the so great need of understanding? Are great poems written, are great pictures painted, were the old cathedrals planned and reared, only for those who have themselves the knowledge and the power to do the like? The picture in the window which all passers stop to see was not made solely or mainly for professional enjoyment, but for mere laymen also, ignorant of the art that made it, yet open, it may be, to the full influence and beauty of the thing made. Is nature spread out only for astronomers and physicists and chemists, or to rejoice and raise, refine and harmonize, the unscientific heart and soul of you and me? The least instructed of us may like the greatest kind of music, for the same reason that he likes the greatest kind of man; for the same reason that we enjoy real poetry more than that which is weak and commonplace, or find ourselves happier with Shakespeare than with Tupper. May not a community which prefers an Emerson for its lecturer be credited with all sincerity in choosing to sit under the influence of Beethoven rather than of Verdi, finding itself more warmed thereby? And if you are personally attracted to a fine, deep, genial nature, rather than to a shallow creature of convention, why should you not be to the music into which some finer, deeper natures put their very lives? It is not our own fault, surely, if we find that we love Mozart, as we love Raphael or Shakespeare, and turn to such when we most need strengthening refreshment, while we should be simply bored by miscellaneous concerts, pot-pourris of the hackneyed sentimentalities or flash fancies of third and tenth rate composers. And if a man insist that this is all sheer self-illusion, and that we really do not like the thing we think we do, of what use can it be to argue with him? Friend, be you true to your love, as we too would be true to ours! We will not quarrel.

Calvin on Music.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TONIC SOL-FA REPORTER.

SIR,—The curiosities of history sometimes startle us. When we began to examine for ourselves we feel that too often histories have been written rather to conceal or pervert, than to record the truth. When you and I began to study the history of our country, all we could find written of Oliver Cromwell or John Knox impressed us very much with the idea that these worthies should be classed with Draco or Bluebeard. The researches of Macaulay, Carlyle, and M'Crie have wrought a wonderful change by bringing the truth to light.

In studying musical history nothing has surprised me more than its perversions and fallacies, arising from prejudices and preconceived notions. I could give you many examples—at present only one. An early historian of Martin Luther gravely writes that he could not pollute the French language by expressing in it much of the history of his life, therefore he records it in Latin, and it is a mercy that such a record can only be found in the libraries of the curious, and in languages which comparatively few can read. In one particular, however, all historians of Luther are agreed, viz., that he was a great musician, and in this respect a perfect contrast to his contemporary John Calvin. The concentrated essence of musical history regarding Calvin as a musician may be found embodied in the history recognized in our Government examinations, where all that is said about him is contained in the following sentence (see Hullah's History, page 73):—

Indeed Calvin, unlike Luther, seems never to have recognized music as a means of religious expression, scarcely even to have appreciated it as an aid to devotion; and the music of his followers has suffered accordingly.

Founded upon such historical statements, so able a lecturer as the Rev. Henry Allon addressed the Young Men's Christian Association in Exeter Hall in 1862 as follows (see Lectures, page 304):

Calvin was utterly destitute of musical sensibility as every page of his works and every element of his character indicate; he was too much of a theological formula to have much of the genius of song. And this unhappy defect has deprived his writings of the broad human sympathy which so characterized Luther's, and has entailed upon all the churches that bear his name such musical asceticism and poverty. In no Calvinistic Country—American, Scotch, Dutch, and in so far as it is Calvinistic, English, is there a church song. The musical Luther has filled Germany with rich church hymnody; the unmusical Calvin has impoverished Puritan and Presbyterian worship, that its rugged, inartistic, slovenly psalmody has become a bye word and a needless repulsion; for surely there is no piety in discord, nor any especial devoutness in slovenliness; our nature craves something better than the traditional psalm singing of the inharmonious "meeting house." Our affinities are with whatever is best, whether in eloquence, poetry, or music.

And yet, strange to say, it is to Calvin that we owe the introduction of metrical psalmody into the reformed churches of France.

Strange indeed, but let Calvin answer for himself, first by his labors for psalmody, next by his preface to his Psalter.

In 1538-40, Calvin, Miles Coverdale, and the Wedderburns met in exile in Saxony and sat at the feet of Luther. The German singing of praise surprised them all, and each set to work to do for his own countrymen what Luther had done for the German speaking people. Calvin began by putting into French metre the 25th and 46th psalms. He got them set to music at Strasbourg (presumably by Guillaume Franc) and printed a number of copies which he brought to his own congregation on his return to Geneva. They became so popular that he, through a friend in Paris induced Clement Marot to apply his poetical powers to the rendering of David's psalms into French Metre. Marot completed fifty-one before his death, and the remaining ninety-nine were, at Calvin's urgent request, supplied by Beza. Luther had only rendered sixteen into German metre, so that to Calvin belongs the honor of being the first man at whose instance the whole book of psalms was rendered into metre for praise in any living language.

Again as to the music. While the psalms of Luther, Coverdale, and the Wedderburns were sung to the most popular ballad tunes of Germany, England, and Scotland, Calvin's soul revolted from such words being so desecrated, and he set to work to get music supplied suitable for, and worthy of them. He employed first, for this work, Guillaume Franc of Strasbourg, and next Claude Goudimel of Rome. So in music as well as in words he was the first who ever supplied a true and distinctive psalmody. His Psalter is a monument of beauty, which all ages following have used as a mine and a model. The Old 1, Old 44, 46, 68, Old 100, Old 113, 119, 124, 134, 137, 148, and others are familiarly known to all lovers of psalmody as unsurpassed for simplicity, beauty, and grandeur in any country or in any age.

But Calvin not only produced the first French psalter, he also produced the first English one. The title-page bears his name and his express sanction. It was printed at Geneva in 1556, for the use of the English-speaking congregation of which, at that time, John Knox was minister. This psalter was brought to England and Scotland on the return of the exiles and was the foundation of Knox's psalter, published in Edinburgh, 1565, and of the English psalter published in London in the same year.

Calvin's labors in this work began in 1538, and did not cease till his "fully HARMONIZED psalter for use in public worship" appeared in 1561; thus he labored during twenty-three years of his life in this cause.

The first edition, containing 51 psalms with music, appeared at Geneva in 1543, bearing a remarkable preface, which appeared with all the numberless future editions of this work, but which, surely, historians and critics have either shut their eyes to, or been unable to read.

Let it speak for itself. No more thorough, hearty, comprehensive, and exalted views of psalmody have ever been expressed. Let his torians and critics reconcile them with their own expressed statements as they best can.

[Extract from Calvin's preface to the Genevan Psalter].

To all Christians, lovers of the Word of God, greeting. — As for public prayers, there are two kinds of them — the one is expressed in words only, the other with song; and this is no recent invention, for from the first origin of the church this has been the case, as appears in history. And even St. Paul does not speak of verbal prayer alone, but also of singing. And in truth, we know by experience that song has great force and power in moving and inflaming the heart of man to invoke and praise God with more vehement and ardent zeal.

It should always be seen to that the song should not be light and frivolous, but that it have weight and majesty, as saith Saint Augustine; and also that there is a great difference between the music that is employed for the enjoyment of men at table, and in their houses, and the psalms which they sing in church in the presence of God and his angels. But when the form here given is rightly judged of, we hope that it will be found holy and pure; seeing that it is simply constructed for the edification of which we have spoken, as well as that the use of singing may be greatly extended. So that even in the houses and on the fields, it may be to us an incitement and an instrument or means to praise God and raise our hearts to Him; and to console us in meditating on His power, goodness, wisdom, and justice, which is more necessary for us than we know how to express.

For the first, it is not without cause that the Holy Spirit exhorts us so carefully, by the Holy Scripture, to rejoice ourselves in God, and that all our joy should rest there as its true end. For He knows how truly we are inclined to please ourselves in vanity. Thus while our nature draws and leads us to seek all means of foolish and vicious enjoyment — on the contrary, our Lord, to separate and draw us from the allurements of the flesh and of the world, presents to us every possible means to fill us with that spiritual joy which He commends so much to us.

But amongst other things which are suitable for the recreation of men, and for yielding them pleasure, music is either the first, or one of the chief, and we must esteem it a gift of God bestowed for that end. Therefore, by so much the more, we ought to see that it is not abused, for fear of soiling and contaminating it; turning that to our condemnation which was given for our profit and good. Even were there no other consideration than this alone, it ought to move us to regulate the use of music, so as to make it subservient to all good morals, and that it should not give occasion for loosing the bridle of dissoluteness, that it should not lead to voluptuousness, nor be the instrument of immodesty and impurity.

But further, there is scarcely anything in this world which can more powerfully turn or bend hither and thither the manners of men, as Plato has wisely remarked. And in fact we experimentally feel that it has a secret and incredible power over our hearts to move them one way or other. Therefore we ought to be so much the more careful to regulate it in such a manner, that it may be useful to us, and in no way pernicious. For this reason, the ancient doctors of the church often complained that the people of their time were addicted to disgraceful and immodest songs, which, not without cause, they esteemed and called a deadly and satanic poison for corrupting the world.

But in speaking of music I include two parts, to wit, the words, or subject and matter; secondly, the song or melody. It is true that all evil words, as saith St. Paul, corrupt good manners, but when melody is united to them, they much more powerfully pierce the heart, and enter in: just as when by a funnel wine is poured into a vessel, so poison and corruption is infused into the depth of the heart by the melody.

What then is to be done? It is to have songs not only pure, but also holy, that they may be incitements to stir us up to pray to and praise God, and to meditate on His works, in order to love Him, fear Him, honor and glorify Him. But what St. Augustine says is true, that none can sing things worthy of God but he who has received the power from Himself. Wherefore when we have sought all round, searching here and there, we shall find no songs better and more suitable for this end than the Psalms of David which the Holy Spirit dictated and gave him. And therefore when we sing them, we are ascertain that God has put words into our mouths as if He Himself sang within us to exalt His glory. Wherefore Chrysostom exhorts all men and women and little children to accustom themselves to sing them as a means of associating themselves with the company of angels; further, we must remember what St. Paul says, that spiritual songs cannot be sung well but with the heart; but the heart requires the understanding: and in that, saith St. Augustine, lies the difference between the song of man and that of birds; for a linnet, a nightingale, and a jay (papegay), may sing well, but it will be without understanding.

But the peculiar gift of man is to sing knowing what he says. Further, the understanding ought to accompany the heart and affections, which cannot be unless we have the song imprinted in our memory, that we may ever be singing it.

This present book, for this cause, besides what otherwise has been said, ought to be particularly acceptable to every one who desires, without reproach, and according to God, to rejoice in seeing his own salvation, and the good of his neighbours; and thus has no need to be much recommended by me, as it carries in itself its own value and praise. Only let the world be well advised, that instead of songs partly vain and frivolous, partly foolish and dull, partly filthy and vile, and consequently wicked and hurtful, which it has heretofore used, it should accustom itself hereafter to sing these heavenly and divine songs, with good king David.

Touching the music, it appeared best that it should be simple in the way we have put it, to carry weight and majesty suitable for the subject, and even to be sung in church as has been said.

GENEVA, 10th June 1543.

Bethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas.

From Domenico Scarlatti down to Frederick Chopin, a series of cembalists, clavecinists, and pianists, rich in talent, art, and genius, have produced such a collection of select works, that the like of it can probably be shown by no other branch of musical literature. But there are two collections pre-eminent above the rest in this abundant store of rich musical creations: the Fugues and Preludes (the Wohltemperirtes Klavier) of Johann Sebastian Bach, and the Sonatas of Ludwig Beethoven. Both works have been so fully discussed and so fully analyzed; such varied meanings have been attributed to them; they have been so celebrated and praised from so many different points of view, that every person who thinks about the matter must come to the conviction that they are inexhaustible. And so they are. They are a never-failing source of study for the composer and the pianist, and of delight for the educated listener. At present, however, our business is confined to the Sonatas of Beethoven, and these we will now proceed to consider.

Most of our German composers have grown up at the piano. They learned to employ practically this compendium of instrumental sound, vocal melody, harmony and polyphony, and it became for them an organ, a second tongue, a part of themselves. Upon it they could adequately render even the slightest musical emotions — could, so to speak, lend words to every momentary mood of their tone-filled soul. What Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven expressed upon the piano in their hours of solitude, exceeded probably, in purport, if not in finished form, anything they ever noted down. But this confidential intimacy between a composer and his instrument, strikes us in no case with such marvellous clearness as in that of Beethoven. If, in his mighty Symphonies, he speaks like, as it were, some ideal popular orator to the masses, raising them to the highest sentiments of refined humanity; and if, in his stringed Quartets, he endeavors to attain almost dramatic multiplicity of form, in his Pianoforte Sonatas he talks to himself, or, if the reader prefers it, to his instrument; as to his most dearly loved friend. He tells his most secret joys and woes, his yearnings and his love, his hopes and his despair. We perceive, hard before us, an entire, full, genuine, inward human life — healthy, solid and manly. Whether Beethoven gives way to the outpourings of passion, or to mournful laments; whether he jokes, plays, dreams, laughs or weeps, he is always simple and true. We discover in him nothing far-fetched, nothing stilted, nothing affected, and nothing falsely sentimental; the profoundest things appear before us unvarnished and unpretentious. There are some great and extraordinary men who utter the most important things, without desiring them to be heard; and, at the same time, have no reason to dread anyone hearing their slightest utterance — and this is the case with Beethoven in his Pianoforte Sonatas.

We frequently come across people who have a notion that, contrary to other composers of the highest rank, Beethoven is more especially the singer of sorrow and of mourning, of the most violent and passionate anguish of the soul. Nothing can be less true. It is certainly a fact that he has lent the night sides of the mind such tones as no one ever lent it before. But, if we glance over his compositions as a whole, we find, even in his latest and most ragged ones, that the most prominent feature is: them are vigorous cheerfulness, good natured joy, pleasing reflection, serious and resolute vitality. How often does he sink into blissful dreams! how often give himself up to the most childlike enjoyment! The high spirits of a youth seize on him, even after he has attained ripe manhood; the battle of life renders him serious, and sometimes gloomy, but never down-hearted, far less sick of existence. "He was a man — take him all in all," we never looked upon his like before.

The application of what has been said to the various Sonatas separately would lead to nothing. Just as it is indisputable that these Sonatas run through an endless circle of human sensations and moods of mind, it would be difficult to designate, in the case of each one, those sensations and moods, by words, the assumed precision of which would in the end prove insufficient after all. It is no empty phrase, though it has been so often repeated, that music commences where speech leaves off — provided, of course, that the former is content to exercise sway in its own proper sphere. How often would the character of different compositions, even though a man possessed Goethe's copious vocabulary, have to be described by similar, nay, by counterpart, words; and yet how great would be the variety of tone-forms apparent to the most musically ignorant hearer!

A much more important occupation than discovering or accepting expressions portraying our various mental moods, is, without a doubt, for those who intend devoting themselves to the study of Beethoven's Sonatas, the task of obtaining a clear idea of the structure of those Sonatas, both in the general outlines and in the details. By doing this, they will more easily understand the Sonatas, and derive higher intellectual gratification from them. Is it not something elevating to see how the boldest fancy, after seeking sustenance in the deepest recesses of the soul, willingly performs a subject's duty under the ordering mind? Never, not even in what was apparently the wildest flight of his genius, never did Beethoven lose the reins; however high the regions to which his Pegasus may rise, he is able to guide and manage him.

No serious, conscientious teacher should neglect explaining to those entrusted to his charge the principles and nature of the laws developed, for centuries, by a sort of natural necessity, in the forms of instrumental music. They are so simple that their leading characteristics may be made clear to the most childlike intellect — every step forward will of course enable the student to penetrate into them more deeply. That Beethoven, in close connection with his great predecessors, submitted to these laws renders him doubly great; he did not come to annul the law, but to fulfil it.

Would that our art, which is more full of soul than any other, were not bound by so many tight bonds to matter! Would that Beethoven's Sonatas were as accessible to every educated man, as the poems of our great lyric poet! But the nature of our art not only forbids this — it even deprives the majority of those who busy themselves with music and the piano, of the full enjoyment of these high works, at least in their entirety. For these works make demands upon the executant which it is not easy to satisfy. The necessary natural gifts are found here and there; would that the indispensable seriousness and industry were always found with them!

Beethoven's pianoforte music—even leaving out of consideration the few extraordinarily difficult pieces—requires the roughly good and solid execution. But the first requisites of such execution are, likewise, almost the rarest—a vigorous, and yet soft touch, and the greatest possible independence of the fingers. Beethoven never writes difficulties in order that the executant may gain laurels by overcoming them, but he is deterred by no practical inconvenience which may be necessary to express decisively and clearly his idea. Thus we meet in works, which are reckoned among his easier ones, detached passages presupposing a tolerably high degree of digital dexterity; and if a fine style of execution always demands, properly speaking, that whatever the performer executes should be half-play to him, this is an almost indispensable condition with compositions of such intellectual profundity as Beethoven's. It is, therefore, not advisable that his Sonatas should be taken by, or confided to, hands not properly prepared for them. If anyone is so far advanced as to be able to master their execution, he will derive double pleasure, and double advantage from a thorough study of them, and be able to raise himself without hindrance by their aid.

The most essential figures employed by Beethoven are based upon the scale, and upon broken chords. They belong to that style of playing which is described more especially as the Clementi-Cramer school. The Studies of these noble representatives of sterling pianoforte playing will always constitute the best foundation for playing Beethoven's works, and the practice of the former should be uninterruptedly pursued with the study of the latter.

Fortunately, Beethoven's fertile creative powers have produced fruit for every epoch of life, and—of pianoforte playing. We may reward even the zeal of a studious child by letting him play the two short Sonatas published after the composer's death, Sonatas which seem to us rather as though written for beginners, and not by a beginner. But care should be taken not to offer young minds, while too immature, pieces which, though easy (but, in some degree, easy only apparently) as far as absolute execution is concerned, demand a power of conception and of realization far beyond the demands which can be made on the fingers. What person with any experience of musical life does not remember, for instance, having heard the Pathetic Sonata played with a naïveté of style proving how near the Sublime and the Ridiculous lie to each other! Such mistakes are of everyday occurrence.

We have endeavored to append to these lines a list of Beethoven's Sonatas, arranged with regard to the demands they make on the heart and mind, as well as upon the fingers of the performer. It is hardly necessary to say that such a list could not be drawn up with mathematical accuracy, and that, besides this, it was necessarily influenced by personal views, perhaps more so than was right. What is more or less easy to master or to comprehend, depends, in every case, on different premises. But if our well-meant experiment simply resulted in our rendering the task of selection more easy for anyone, or in our saving him from any very great mistakes, we should not consider the pains we have taken as being thrown away.

The present system of music publishing has facilitated, in a manner which would formerly have been incredible, the acquisition of our classical masterpieces. New editions of them, especially of those by Beethoven, are published everywhere. Any one can purchase his Beethoven for a very little. It is only to be hoped that the master will be as frequently played as purchased, and realized by the fingers as beautifully as by the graver; in which case he will become an inmate not only of every house but of every heart.

Beethoven as a "Postillon D'Amour."

In an article headed "A Contribution to the Beethoven Festival," in the Nue Freie Presse, appears the following account of the meeting of Beethoven and Herr Ludwig Löwe, of the Imperial Theatre, Vienna. The circumstance was known probably to but very few, and was never before published.

Ludwig Löwe—says the writer of the article in question—that everlastingly youthful artist, who is quite as captivating a virtuoso in narrating in private, as he is in impersonating on the stage, told me a good deal of his eventful life one evening as we were sitting in the gardens of the jovial "Spezi-Wirth," at Velden, on the banks of the Würthorse. We were about separating, when Löwe stopped me by exclaiming, "Hallo! I must tell you about my acquaintanceship with Beethoven." What! did you really know Beethoven? I enquired with joyful curiosity. "Aye, that I did. He was my postillon d'amour at Teplitz." Taking a complacent pull at his pipe, Löwe continued: "It was in the summer of 1811. I was a perfect novice, and obtained an engagement at Prague, under the celebrated manager, Liebich. At his order, I began, however, my professional duties at the watering-place of Teplitz, where a part of his company performed during the summer. I used to dine regularly at a modest inn called the Blue Star, between the 'Platz' and the Post Office. It is no longer in existence. The landlord's daughter, a well behaved, charming creature, used, in the old patriarchal fashion, to wait upon the customers. She and I soon took a liking to each other; our glances kept meeting more and more frequently, and growing more and more expressive, but the number of other customers, who were impatient and wanted to be served, rendered all conversation between us impossible. 'Come at a later hour,' she whispered to me one day, 'when the other customers are gone. At three o'clock you will seldom find any one, except Beethoven, the composer, and he will not be in the way. His hearing is bad.' I joyfully took the hint, and used to go every afternoon at three o'clock, Beethoven, who dined at a side table, really being the only person there. As he paid little attention to us, he proved not merely not to be in the way, but was even welcome as a means of diverting suspicion. My liking for the maiden was profound and passionate, and it was my intention to marry her. Her stern parents looked, however, askance upon her acquaintanceship with the poor young actor, and at last, without more ado, forbade me their house. How great was our despair! We wanted to correspond secretly, but through whom? Suddenly I thought of my neighbor at table, Beethoven. He would help us. Despite his serious taciturnity, he had struck me as not being unfriendly. A gleam of kindly feeling frequently shot from out his bold and defiant face. He was accustomed to take a walk every morning at eleven o'clock, in the most retired part of the Park. I lay in wait, and approached him with a most respectful salutation. He recognized me instantly, and inquired why I did not dine any more at the Blue Star. The question greatly facilitated the introduction of the subject for which I had come. With the utmost frankness, I told him all about the state of my heart, and my expulsion from my Paradise, concluding with a timid interrogation as to whether he would not take charge of a note, and give it, unobserved, at dinner time, to the maiden. 'Why not?' he exclaimed, seemingly pleased at my confidence in him. 'You mean nothing wrong; so hand it over.' With these words he stuck the note in his pocket, and was again about to set off at a trot. 'I beg your pardon, Herr van Beethoven,' I said, detaining him, 'that is not all.' 'Oh! what else is there?' 'You must also bring back the answer.' 'All right! Then wait for me to-morrow in the walk.' I really received the coveted answer through Beethoven. In this manner, like a good fellow as he was, he carried our love-letters backwards and forwards for five or six weeks, until he—and, shortly afterwards, I myself—was obliged to leave Teplitz."

Such was Löwe's story; I cannot convey in writing the charm with which it was told, but (with Löwe's express permission) I have given a correct account of its purport. I have simply to add that Löwe corresponded for a year or so with the landlord's pretty daughter. Typhus, the unfailing follower of a period of sanguinary war, carried her off. Löwe, whose brilliant talent had soon displayed itself at Prague, obtained an engagement, in 1824, at the Burgtheater, Vienna. He lost no time in visiting Beethoven. He found him very much aged; broken physically and morally, and completely deaf. Beethoven did not recollect his visitor, who despite all his endeavors, could not make himself understood. So their second meeting was their last. But Löwe preserves a grateful remembrance of the service which Beethoven rendered him at Teplitz, and which was probably one of the most original and friendly episodes in the great composer's life.—London Musical World.

Mr. Benedict's St. Peter.

The critic of the Birmingham Daily Post, after attending the band rehearsals for the Birmingham Festival, thus reports of the new Oratorio:

"Mr. Benedict's St. Peter, which constituted the second and weightiest subject of rehearsal yesterday, is still in too imperfect a state to allow of detailed description or definite judgment, more particularly in the absence of the choral effects; but it is evident, by the care and elaboration bestowed on the instrumental parts, and the general elevation and refinement of the principal vocal themes, that the composer has laid himself out in this instance for a test work—one that may bear the same relation to his St. Cecilia as Mendelssohn's Elijah did to his St. Paul. The theme is certainly a suggestive one, and worthy of the loftiest effort of musical art which it may inspire. Mendelssohn long ago recognized its suitability for musical treatment, and in a long and thoughtful letter which he addressed to Pastor Schnbring, the friend to whom he was so deeply indebted for suggestions and contributions for St. Paul, he discusses at considerable length the merits of the theme. 'Several outward reasons,' he observes, 'are in favor of choosing St. Peter for the particular festival he had then in view; but independently of these, he had a great wish in connection with some plan for a later oratorio "to bring the two chief apostles and pillars of the Christian Church side by side in oratorio"—in short, that he should have a St. Peter as well as a St. Paul. There were sufficient internal grounds to make him prize the subject, chief among them being the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, which he thought should form the central point or chief object; but he was apparently in doubt if the position occupied by St. Peter in Scripture, and apart from the dignity he enjoys in the Catholic and Protestant Churches as Pope and Martyr, would suffice for the basis of a symbolical oratorio, and it was chiefly to resolve this doubt that he consulted Pastor Schnbring. What was the issue of that consultation we are not informed, but, inasmuch as the projected oratorio was never begun, we may assume that Pastor Schnbring's reply did not favor the possibility of a libretto of St. Peter derived entirely from Scripture. As Mendelssohn's ideas of the manner in which this subject should be treated necessarily possess great interest in connection with Mr. Benedict's work, we extract the passage in which his difficulties are expressed. It is as follows:—"The question, therefore, is, and this you can decide far better than I can (because you possess the knowledge in which I am deficient, to guide you), whether the place that Peter assumes in the Bible, divested of the dignity which he enjoys in the Catholic or Protestant Churches, as a martyr, or the first Pope, &c., &c.—whether what is said of him in the Bible, in alone and in itself, sufficiently important to form the basis of a symbolical oratorio. For, according to my feeling, the subject must not be treated historically, however indispensable this was in the case of St. Paul. In historic handling, Christ must appear in the earlier part of St. Peter's career, and, when he appears, St. Peter could not lay claim to the chief interest. I think, therefore, it must be symbolical; though all the historical points might probably be introduced,—the betrayal and repentance, the keys of heaven given him by Christ, his preaching at Pentecost—but all this, not in a historical, but prophetic light, if I may so express myself, in close connection." * * * * "The chief thing, however, is the first point, for I am still in the dark about it; in fact, about the possibility of the whole undertaking. Write to me as soon as you can on the matter. In thinking it over, my first idea was that the subject must be divided into two parts: the first, from the moment of forsaking the fishermen's nets down to the 'Tu es Petrus,' with which it must close; the second to consist of the feast of the Pentecost only; from the misery after the death of Christ and repentance of Peter, to the outpouring of the Holy Ghost.' We have been thus circumstantial in setting forth Mendelssohn's views as to the mode in which the theme might be treated, not only on account of the interest always attached to the plans of so accomplished a master of oratorio, but because we are still in the dark as to that which Mr. Benedict has followed. At present, our only information regarding either the text or the music, is derived from the vocal solos and hand parts rehearsed in London, yesterday; and even these, we understand, were not complete. Under these circumstances it would be manifestly impossible to furnish any outline of the oratorio, and we can only speak in the most vague and general terms of its distribution and style. As well as can be gathered from the skeleton programme contained in the Festival scheme, the work consists altogether of some fifty-four numbers, comprising, besides the more ordinary elements and combinations peculiar to oratorio, an orchestral interlude suggestive of evening prayer, followed by the rising of a storm, a dead march, a choral recitative, an unaccompanied quartet, and choruses, for male and female voices separately. Many of the most effective numbers consist of solos accompanied by, or interspersed with, chorus—a combination to which Mr. Benedict is very partial. Even a catalogue raisonné of so lengthy a series of movements would be beyond our time and limits, besides being unfair to the composer in the present stage of his work; and we must therefore defer all analysis. We may observe in general terms, however, that the writing is in a much stricter style than any of the composer's works. The fugal form is freely employed in more than one of the choruses, and in all the ideas are developed with great thoroughness and elaboration, and with every diversity of contrapuntal treatment. Although the composer appears to have chosen for his oratoria the historical, in preference to the symbolical form favored by Mendelssohn, and to have relied mainly, if not wholly, on Scriptural texts, the treatment is less dramatic than might be supposed from the known predilections of Mr. Benedict. Nevertheless there is a striking example of tone painting in the orchestral interlude already referred to, and the accompaniments to the contralto recitative: 'But the ship.' All the phases of a sea storm are here suggested in forms as impressive as they are artistic and appropriate; and not even the composer's old master, Weher, could have depicted the fury of the winds, and the trouble of the waters, the flashing of the lightning, or the rolling of the thunder with more vividness and vigor, than they are here represented. The unaccompanied quartet which ushers in the final chorus of the first part is remarkable chiefly for the skill and ingenuity of its modulations; but its melodic beauty is not in proportion to its harmonic subtlety, as the extreme difficulty of the music for unaccompanied voices renders a certain loss of tonality in the course of the performance scarcely avoidable. Though the chorus was absent yesterday, the general effect of some of the choral numbers could be fairly gathered from the instrumental performance; and among these may be mentioned as specially impressive the opening chorus, 'They that go down to the sea,' an exceedingly graceful and captivating movement, in six-eight time; the so-called 'chorus of Benediction' commencing 'The Lord be a lamp unto thy feet,' a sweet and soothing andante very charmingly instrumented; the descriptive storm chorus, 'The deep uttereth,' the grand final chorus of the first part, 'Praise ye the Lord,' which is developed with impressive breadth and vigor; 'How art thou fallen?' an exceedingly spirited and dramatic allegro, in six-eight time; and the angry and not less dramatic chorus, 'They are all revellers,' with its fine antiphonal effects and agitated accompaniment. All the solos and concerted pieces are of great merit, and several of them are exceedingly captivating. There is an exceedingly brilliant and effective bravura for the soprano voice, with chorus, 'The Lord hath His way,' in which Mdlle. Tietjens yesterday produced a great sensation; and in a different style the tender, plaintive, wailing air, 'I mourn as a dove,' for the same voice, is also deserving of high praise. For the chief contralto there is abundance of excellent recitatives, in addition to a fine air in triple time, 'O thou afflicted,' which is as melodious as it is plaintive and expressive. Madame Patey's fine voice was heard to great advantage yesterday in this music. In the absence of Mr. Sims Reeves from the rehearsal, we can only faintly imagine how his voice is likely to be suited in the principal tenor music of St. Peter: but the composer, at all events, has provided ample opportunities for the tenor voice in the air, 'I am the voice,' 'O, house of Jacob,' and 'The Lord is very pitiful' to say nothing of numerous recitations and concerted pieces. Mr. Santley, who is always in earnest in what he attempts, produced a great impression by his singing of the fine baritone airs, 'How great, O Lord,' 'Now know I,' 'Though all men shall me offend,' 'O that my head,' 'Remember, O Lord,' 'I call upon Thy name,' and the solo, with chorus, 'As thy soul lies.' Indeed the baritone voice has been specially favored by Mr. Benedict.

The "National Musical Congress."

(Reported for the New York Tribune.)

First Day, Aug. 30.

PAPERS BY MESSRS. HENRY C. WATSON, L. H. SOUTHARD, AND JAMES PECH.

The second annual meeting of the National Musical Congress began yesterday at Steinway Hall. At the business session held in the morning, the reports of the Secretary and Treasurer were read, and the standing committees were appointed. Among the leading musical gentlemen were Mr. Eben Tourjée of Boston, Dr. J. G. Barnett, of Hartford, Mr. T. F. Seward of Orange, N. J., Mr. S. A. Emory of Boston, Dr. E. Wentworth of Pittsfield, Mass.; Mr. Benj. Jepson of New Haven, Mr. C. C. Converse of Brooklyn, Mr. John P. Morgan, organist of Trinity Church, and Samuel Jackson of New York, besides others who took part in the public exercises. Fifty ladies and gentlemen assembled in the afternoon. After an organ voluntary by C. B. Schuyler, the meeting was called to order at 3 o'clock by L. H. Southard of Baltimore, who made a few remarks concerning the objects of the Congress. The Rev. Charles F. Deems of the "Church of the Strangers" then offered prayer, and Henry C. Watson of New York followed with a paper entitled "The National Musical Congress—its Duties and its Objects."

Those unpretentious Conventions have done missionary work in music, and laid a deep foundation, on which we hope to raise a beautiful structure whose breadth and individuality shall, at no distant day, command the attention and admiration of the world. Besides these gatherings, the Peace Jubilee at Boston in 1869 was a great link in the chain of events which led to the formation of what I believe will be the most important musical organization in the world, namely, the National Musical Congress. This body has several important objects. First: It aims to bind in one bond of brotherhood all the musicians of the United States. To do this it proposes to aid and promote the formation of choral societies wherever sufficient singers can be found to combine together for practice and performance. Such societies, affiliating with the Congress, will be furnished with the necessary music for practice at cost price. Other assistance will be granted when the funds of the Congress admit, and advice will be promptly given as to the balance of voices, the music to be studied, and the best method of practice. Second: To urge the universality of musical instruction by note in the public schools. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are annually spent on the pretext that our public school children are taught singing, and all we have to show for it is an occasional vocal exhibition. There all the singers sing by ear! This instruction is all a lie and a sham, a fraud which it will be the duty of this Congress to expose, and, if possible, remedy. The teachers do their best, and the fault really lies in the system, and in the ignorance of Boards of Education. In Massachusetts the children are taught to read notes in the public schools with remarkable and admirable facility. Third: Musical instruction for working men and women. The Germans, much wiser and happier than the Americans, number their singing societies by hundreds. Our City Government has ordained that the tired laboring men and women shall stand up two hours each afternoon, if they choose, to listen to the performance of a wind instrument band. The time appointed almost precludes the true laboring class from enjoying this music. These entertainments are costly, and practically of little service. The authorities might much better give the use of some public buildings, armories, for instance, where workmen and women could assemble and receive gratuitous instruction in sight-singing and music. Fourth: To establish a standard of musical taste in sacred and secular music. The present general standard of musical taste is at the very lowest ebb, owing in large measure to the flooding of the market with compositions bad in grammar, maudlin in sentiment, and wretched in taste. It should be the duty of this Congress to discountenance those flash compositions, and to endeavor to create a purer taste. Moreover, the market is flooded with bad church music books, and everywhere the taste of the people is vitiated. This subject will require decided yet delicate treatment. The Congress may assume, in connection with organists and choir leaders, the preparation of church music books, as well as vocal and instrumental books of instruction. Fifth: To encourage and assist native talent. Such are the salient points in the platform of the National Musical Congress. It is young yet, only a year old, but its present strength, numbers over 2,300 members, is an earnest of what it will be in a few years. We shall yet see every man, woman, and child in the country who has a voice, joining in a grand choral harmony, and then the mission of the National Musical Congress will in part be accomplished.

Mr. Carlyle Petersilea, a leading Boston pianist, played Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, and Mr. William Mason of Orange, N. J., played a Ballade by Chopin in A flat op. 47, and a little piece entitled "Silver Spring," of his own composition.

L. H. Southard, Director of Music at the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, then read a paper on Musical Criticism. A musical literature, a musical criticism, is an indispensable necessity toward a national school of art and a cultivated popular taste. Without it is mere anarchy. With it comes real culture, and the elevation of musical art to its proper share in the daily thought and life of the people. True, we must not lose sight of the fact that to a certain extent the public is to blame for whatever may be faulty in the musical press of the day. If there is little or no demand for high-toned and instructive articles, there will certainly be but a small supply. It is beyond question that we have in our three or four leading musical journals, and attached to a few of our most influential newspapers, gentlemen fully capable of writing with keen insight and just discrimination, and who sometimes give us articles which justly deserve to become part of our standard literature. But it cannot be denied that they reach a comparatively small class of readers, and that any marked improvement in popular taste must be heralded, or at least accompanied by a corresponding change in the method of treatment of musical matters by the average daily press. Let us urge then upon those who undertake to enlighten the public, the duty of making themselves at least a little acquainted with the estimation of elaborate works; of freeing themselves completely from all merely personal professions or prejudices, of merging the artist completely in the art itself, and of separating the private interests of the individual from the public interest so far as they may be incompatible.

Nor is the essayist's influence in educating the public taste and appreciation of less importance than the critic's. A great composer must have a proper musical atmosphere or his works die of suffocation, and it is the peculiar province of those who lead public opinion through the press to furnish such an atmosphere; which is obviously not to be done by merely accommodating one's self to the average taste of the general public. It is the critic's duty to pry the public out of those ruts to which it continually gravitates if left to itself, to make it feel the ugliness of tinsel and commonplace, and appreciate the sublime and beautiful. In doing this he becomes at once a public benefactor. No amount of merely material prosperity, wealth, or enterprise alone, constitutes a great nation. There must be added to those a love for science and art in their highest forms, and a general love for them as most important elements in the formation of national character. As a young nation, with heretofore urgently imperative geographical and political problems to solve, with hundreds of thousands of square miles to prepare for human habitation, and with gigantic public works to construct, it is not at all discreditable to us that we have as yet produced no Shakespeare or Milton, no Michael Angelo or Brunelleschi, no Handel or Beethoven, as indeed there has been no atmosphere for them. But the time seems to be ripe for a movement to prepare for such an atmosphere.

The attendance in the evening was nearly as large as in the afternoon. The Rev. Dr. E. Wentworth presided, and, after a voluntary on the organ, by J. H. Cornoll, Dr. James Pech of New York read an able paper on "Academical Degrees in Music," in which he aimed to refute the objections urged against professors and faculties of music, and urged forcibly that great advantages would result from the establishment of choirs of music and collegiate courses of scientific musical instruction.

Second Day, August 31.

PAPERS BY MESSRS. T. F. SEWARD, S. D. TILLMAN, C. PETERSILEA, AND J. O'NEILL.

The sessions of Wednesday were well attended, and the proceedings were interesting throughout. At the opening of the morning meeting Theodore F. Seward of Orange, N. J., read a paper discussing the question, "What can this association do to revive an interest in elementary musical instruction?" Mr. Seward, while admitting that in the higher forms of musical culture the progress of this country during the past twenty-five years has been truly wonderful, said that the foundation of the superstructure has been gradually crumbling away till there is scarcely anything of it to be seen. The results may be observed on every side. Many choir members, who sing in excellent style and taste, cannot analyze the simplest tune, and give an intelligent account of the characters by which it is represented. The grand cause of the lack of elementary knowledge is that the old fashioned singing school is passing out of existence, and nothing has arisen to take its place. It is true that much of the instruction at such schools was inexpressibly bad, yet there was withal much thorough practice, and so a knowledge of the subject was finally gained as a result of prolonged experience. The remedy is the holding of short, continuous courses of instruction in different places, in which meetings shall be held every night for two weeks, or such time as may be found most practicable. Such courses are termed "Musical Institutes." The advantages of the system are: 1st. That communities can be more thoroughly aroused and interested by such a special effort than by an ordinarily weekly singing school. 2d. It has been demonstrated by actual experience that at least one-half more can be taught by a given number of daily lessons than by the same number of lessons occurring but once a week. 3d. The remuneration of the teacher will be greatly increased. The only way in which congregational singing can be built up and sustained is by a plan like the following: 1. Let the services of a thoroughly competent musician, who is also an earnest Christian, be secured. Let the musical interest of the congregation be committed to his care, just as its spiritual interests are given into the care of the pastor. 2. Let the salary be large, that he may be free to spend whatever time may be necessary for the training of classes and of individuals. 3. Let it be understood that this arrangement is a permanent one. Then in course of years the good results will follow just as surely as harvests follow seed-sowing. He proposed that a committee of three be appointed to organize musical institutes, the chairman of such committee to report at each annual meeting, stating the number of institutes held during the year, the increase of the work over the preceding year, the number of persons who had been led by the direct influence of the institutes, or of the backers conducting them, to lead the music of the church or the Sunday school, and any other items of interest.

Mr. Seward closed by moving the appointment of a committee of three, one from Boston, one from New York and one from Chicago, to promote and sustain musical institutes on behalf of the congress, as recommended in his paper. Dr. Wentworth doubted the feasibility of this enterprise, for who would pay the teachers? He recommended a bureau of correspondence in New York or Boston for the purpose of establishing communication between such communities as desire musical instruction, and such teachers as desire employment. Mr. Seward, Mr. O'Neil, Mr. Tourjée, Mr. Emery and others shared in the discussion, and the motion was finally referred to a committee of three, consisting of Mr. Seward, Mr. Emery, and Dr. Wentworth.

Professor S. D. Tillman of New York read two papers, one explaining an improvement in the sol-feggio, and another upon a new musical notation. The latter was lately read before the American Association at Troy.

At the afternoon session, Dr. Wentworth presided, and Carlyle Petersilea of Boston read a paper on "Reform in the Method of Teaching the Piano-forte." He deprecated the want of systematic arrangement, of accuracy, and of order in our piano-forte instruction books. The contrast between a mechanical finger-stroke and the melodious touch is not even hinted at, and yet it is the most important matter in the whole course of instruction. The mechanical touch is simple; the melodious touch complex. The former, therefore is naturally and absolutely suitable to the beginner, while the latter ought to be taught at a more advanced period of time. It is hence injudicious to awaken a feeling for melodic expression too early, by selecting such pieces for study as require expression. Artificial means which prevent faults and insure certain success should not be despised. The hand-rest is one of them—the metronome another. Another great error seriously interfering with a good mechanism is the neglect of the memory. There is no doubt that without the power of retaining musical ideas, a correct conception of the whole piece, and, of course, a correct performance, is impossible. In teaching, never expect too much of a beginner. Do not crowd different things together. Everything must be simple, perfectly understood and done, before another step can be made. There is no need of perplexing a child with the name of every note, and even different clefs. Everything is to be learned, but only at a time when it is wanted.

At the close of his paper, Mr. Petersilea was asked to give an example of his method, and responded by playing Liszt's concert paraphrase of Mendelssohn's wedding march and fairy-dance, which was received with applause.

In the evening, John O'Neil of Boston read a paper on "The Voice Considered as the Organ of Esthetical Feeling in Art." The speaker aptly compared the human voice to an organ which perpetually shifts its sounding board, and adjusts itself to the true position and proper degree of tension for every note in the scale. And here we find a philosophical analysis of the musical scale afforded by no other instrument, and based on the nature and operation of the passions. All profound emotions of the heart tend to the exclusion of objective imagery and are subjectively absorbed in the contemplation of themselves, while the passions of joy and pleasure abound in all the outward illustrations which nature and the intellect afford. Hence the brilliant high notes of the vocal scale sound in the direction of the head, the seat of fancy and thought, while the grave, deep notes, excluded as it were from the diverting influence of fancy, are directed downward by this intelligent organ to seek their natural dwelling in the breast, the seat of the heart and the passions. Here, then, we perceive a philosophical explanation of the use and import of the ascending and descending series of notes in the musical scale, and this is the first step to the understanding of the voice as the organ of feeling. It is very important to comprehend the effects of passion on the human body and the human voice, if we would acquire the power of giving vocal expression to æsthetical feeling.

Third Day, September 1.

PAPERS BY S. A. EMERY, JOHN P. MORGAN, AND OTHERS—RESOLUTIONS AND OFFICERS.

The Musical Congress at Steinway Hall opened its last day's session yesterday morning with about forty ladies and gentlemen in attendance. C. C. Converse of New York presided, and R. W. Husted read an interesting paper written by Geo. F. Root of Chicago on the "Philosophy of the Elementary Principles of Music." Geo. W. Haselwood of Providence, R. I., sang "In Native Worth," from The Creation, with piano accompaniment by Mr. Petersilea. S. A. Emery of Boston followed with a paper on "The popular taste of America." The subject, said he, assumes at once a paramount importance when we justly estimate the intellectual, moral and religious power of music, and remember the intimate connection of the popular taste with all departments of musical composition and performance. Regarded as a people, Americans must be considered musical, talented, in fact, judging by what they have accomplished. But now arises an important question. Assuming to be true that, as a nation, we are musical, we must candidly ask ourselves if our music be of the best school, so that it shall exert the legitimate influence of true music, refining and elevating us. For the shame I feel I could wish this question to remain unanswered. America, that in all things else requiring profound learning, indomitable enterprise and consummate skill, equals the world, leading in truth, is yet behind all the great nations of the earth, save one, in the Divine Art.

It would be humiliating to rehearse the facts—how songs possessing absolutely no intrinsic merit have reached a sale of many thousands of copies; how meaningless combinations of notes have proved almost fortunes to their owners; how illustrated title pages of "Songs and Dances" have filled the pockets of men whose only music was the ring of a dollar. We all know that popular music is trash. "Old Hundred" is popular, to be sure, in a certain sense, and its solemn goodness, so strong and pure and steadfast, will never cease to make men better. So, too, though in different ways, are "Home, Sweet Home," "America," and scores of other such productions truly popular. But what is known as "popular music" includes none of these. It is even unworthy of the name of music, and yet it must be accepted as the taste of the mass of American people, for it finds a reader and larger sale than all the rest united. It is a national disgrace, and the sooner we regard it in its true light, the sooner we may hope to have it remedied.

John P. Morgan, organist of Trinity Church, was then introduced, and read a paper on "The Study of the Theory of Music in its legitimate Relations to General Education." What question is there, he asked, that our choirs should learn, intellectually as well as instinctively, to refer the tones they sing to their harmonies and to follow intelligently the leading of all the voices or parts? The idea is a false one that a great amount of time is needed for this study. We are convinced that twenty minutes in each week's rehearsal of two hours' duration, if devoted properly to this purpose, would be sufficient to accomplish very great good, no dependence being placed upon study outside of the rehearsals, and the singers would benefit by the rest afforded to the voices. Look at the sad results of the mechanical, unmusical method of conducting the exercise of a choir, as they may be seen in the fate of our used up choir boys. Under the present system, even its best application, a boy enters the choir, perhaps as a soprano, at ten or twelve years of age. The choir-master is faithful in the performance of his duty as he has been led to view it by the universal practice of choir-masters. The boy learns to read music, that is, to read his part. He hears good music, and, having a musical soul, learns to love it, he knows not why. Had he any opportunity of learning the laws of composition, so as to be able to compare one work with another, and understand the details of each, even if his knowledge during his course as a choir boy should extend no further than harmony, simple counterpoint, and the outlines of the simplest modulatory forms, he would have learned something of music in such a manner that all his life would have afforded him an intellectual and not a mere sensuous enjoyment. We are in favor, of course, of the introduction of music as a branch of study into our schools. Our children should learn musical notation as they learn to read letter-press. But is this learning music? No more than learning to read letter-press is becoming well-informed in literature; it is only acquiring the means by which one may begin to study music. We are convinced that to rescue the mass of young people who innocently suppose that they are studying music from the slavery to mere mechanical labor under which they are suffering is the great work to be done now. Let the study of the principles of composition be once generally introduced as an essential part of our choir practice, and let our young people, who suppose they are studying music, actually begin to do so, and it will not be long before the introduction of the study of musical philosophy as a profound science into our colleges will be a matter of course, and a man with defective musical organization will be considered among the learned equally unfortunate, at least, with one having no natural perception of mathematical relations or logical sequences.

Mr. Stephenson proposed, and the Congress adopted, some modifications of the Constitution, fixing the rate of life membership at $10, making women eligible as delegates to the Congress, and allowing any choral society to join the Congress upon payment of one or more dollars, and to send to the annual convention a number of delegates equal to the number of dollars in its annual payment. A resolution, presented by Mr. Emery in favor of appointing a committee of three to promote musical institutes, was referred to the Board of Managers. The following named persons were admitted as life members of the Congress: Parepa Rosa, C. Louise Kellogg, Christine Nilsson, Adelina Patti, Anna Mehlig, John Stephenson, M. Ruger, E. Tourjée, T. F. Seward, G. W. Pottit, C. Petersilea, J. G. Barnett, J. P. Morgan, W. Lee Batterson, J. O'Neill, C. C. Converse, H. C. Watson, and C. J. Stoeckel. At 12 1/2 o'clock the Congress adjourned to attend, by invitation, an organ concert at St. George's Church. Mr. Geo. W. Morgan and Mr. Charles B. Schuyler were the organists and Mrs. Watson and Miss Powell the vocalists. Mr. Morgan played Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" the overture to Rossini's "William Tell," Benedict's "By the Sad Sea Waves" and his own arrangement of "God Save the King." Mr. Schuyler played the "Toccata and Fugue" No. 2, Vol. 3, of Bach and Dudley Buck's organ arrangement of the Star Spangled Banner. Mrs. Watson sang the Ave Maria of Gounod and Miss Powell the Ave Maria of Küken.

In the afternoon E. Tourjée presided, and the Rev. E. Wentworth, D. D., of Pittsfield, Mass., read a long and interesting paper on "Congregational Singing—Its Advantages, and its Difficulties." After some remarks on the church music of Germany, by J. P. Morgan, a useful paper was read by J. H. Cornell of New York, on "Appropriate Music for the Church Service." Another discussion ensued, in which the average church music of the present day was soundly berated, and its publishers and composers were alike set down as "mercenary individuals."

The following officers of the Congress were elected for the ensuing year:

President—William Mason, New York.
Corresponding and Recording Secretary—Eben Tourjée, Boston, Mass.
Treasurer—H. K. Oliver, Salem, Mass.
Vice Presidents—J. H. Cornell, Dr. R. Ogden Doremus, in short, "all the world and the rest of mankind."
Directors—John P. Morgan, John Stephenson, Carl Bergman, Geo. F. Bristol, Theo. Thomas, Henry C. Watson, Jas. Pech, Mus. Doc, Otto Singer, Theo. F. Seward, Charles W. Harris, Chas. C. Converse, R. J. Johnson, New York; John K. Paine, P. S. Gilmore, S. A. Emery, Luther H. Holden, Carl Zerrahn, Boston; Charles Jarvis, Philadelphia; Hans Balatka, Chicago; J. J. Barnett, Mus. Doc., New Haven.

The programme for the evening included a song by Miss Nettie Sterling, and papers by Prof. G. J. Sybbeckel of Yale College on "Dramatic Poetry" and C. C. Converse of New York on "The Moral Influence of Music."

BOSTON, SEPT. 10, 1870.

The Coming Season in Boston.

We have promise of a great abundance of good music from the first week in October until June. Our home organizations, choral, orchestral, and those for chamber music, are laying their plans and making ready to begin. Doubtless, too, the number of classical Piano-forte Concerts, by individual artists, of whom we have so many of a high grade, will be even larger than last winter. And artists from abroad, Nilsson especially, will come to bring us new sensations,—perhaps something better.

The Prelude to our season will be furnished from New York, and doubtless will be stimulating and instructive for our own musicians in the solid Acts to follow. Pleased with his brilliant "raids" on Boston last year, both before and after our own concerts, THEODORE THOMAS, with his model orchestra, announces himself again in greater force. With orchestra increased to nearly sixty instruments, and with Miss ANNA MEHLIG for pianist, he will give ten "Symphony and Popular Concerts," in the Boston Music Hall, during the first half of October, beginning on Tuesday evening, the 4th, and following it up night by night, besides Saturday afternoon, until Monday evening, the 10th; then three more on Friday evening, Saturday afternoon and evening, on the 14th and 15th. The programmes are mainly of the same mixed character as before, but with a somewhat larger portion of the field allotted to the classical element,—to Beethoven especially, in recognition of the centennial anniversary of his birth. Borrowing a hint from the plans of the "Harvard Concerts, which we announced early in the summer, Mr. Thomas will devote one of his evenings and one of his Saturday afternoons to works of Beethoven,—naturally enough anticipating in a great degree our own Beethoven programmes; but there can be no harm in double opportunities of listening to these noble works. For instance, the "Eroica" and 8th Symphonies, the 4th and 5th Piano forte Concertos, the Choral Fantasia, the Overtures to "Egmont," "Coriolan," and "Leonore" (No. 3), are set down for both orchestras. Mr. Thomas will also give of Beethoven: the Pastoral Symphony; portions of the Septet (with all the strings); Andante and Variations from a stringed Quartet, op. 18; the "Kreutzer" Sonata for piano and violin; and the Overture to "King Stephen."

Other classical works in the Thomas programmes are: of Bach: Concerto for 3 violins, 3 violas, 3 cellos and Contra Bass (first time). Gluck: Ballet music from "Paris et Helene." Mozart: Piano Concerto in D minor; Overture to "Magic Flute." Weber: Overtures to "Euryanthe," "Freyshütz"; Concertstück for piano. Schubert: Andante and Scherzo from Symphony in C; Ent'acte from "Rosamunde" (new); "Reitermarsch." Mendelssohn: Overture to "Ruy Blas." Schumann: Piano Concerto; Overture to "Genèveva." Spohr: part of the "Weihe der Töne" Symphony. Rossini: Overtures to "Toll" and "Siege of Corinth." Field: Hiller: Piano Concerto in F-sharp minor (new). Henselt: Piano Concerto in F minor.

There will be such familiar light Overtures as: Nicolai's "Merry Wives," Herold's "Zampa," Suppe's "Poet and Peasant," Flotow's "Stradella," and other Overtures quite new to us, as: "Mignon" by A. Thomas, "Medea" by Bargiel, "Semiramis," by Catel (whether the old Professor in the French Conservatoire we are not informed.

The Liszt-Wagner element is to assail our unresponsive ears again, this time with more and heavier siege batteries. Of Liszt, we are to have: "Die Ideale," a Symphonic poem; the "Mephisto Waltz," an episode from Lenau's Faust; "Gretchen," a character portrait from the Faust Symphony; and two Piano Concertos. Of Wagner: Vorspiel to "Lohengrin"; "A Faust Overture"; Overture to "Flying Dutchman," and to "Rienzi." Of Berlioz: March of Pilgrims in his "Harold" Symphony.—With these exceptions, there would seem to be less of the positively noisy element than before; noteworthy is it, that the name of Meyerbeer is utterly withdrawn; he figures neither by "torchlight" nor by Parisian Grand Opera gas daylight. On the other hand, the dear little piuissimi, the "Träumerei's," &c., will win young sentimental hearts not the less surely, though unheralded by such obstreperous thunder. Of the Strauss Waltzes, Polkas, and the like, there is liberal promise; and of course, with such an orchestra of virtuosos, there will be no lack of solos (for trombone, cello, oboe, French horn, flute, &c.) to please the lovers of such feats of skill. In precision, fineness, brilliancy, and general good style of performance, the Thomas Orchestra will no doubt more than hold its reputation.

Next in order of time comes the opening of the SYMPHONY CONCERTS (Harvard Musical Association), on Tuesday afternoon, Nov. 3,—ten in number, to be continued once a fortnight, regularly, (with two exceptions), ending March 23, 1871. Pains are taken to make the orchestra as much better as possible, both by more careful selection and by more rehearsals. This involving new expense, the subscription price of season tickets has been placed at ten dollars. We have already mentioned that three of the Concerts will be devoted to the recognition of the CENTENNIAL YEAR OF BEETHOVEN: namely, the opening (Nov. 3), the fourth (Dec. 15,—just before the birthday, 17th), and the closing Concert (March 23). On each of these occasions one of his great Symphonies will be given; besides which the Beethoven offerings will include the Dedication Overture (op. 124), the Overtures to "Egmont," "Coriolanus," and, for an instructive novelty, all the four Overtures which he composed for Fidelio (or Leonore) in four successive concerts, the great No. 3 to come in the birthday week; also the two greatest of the piano Concertos, No. 4, in G, and No. 5, in E flat, and (first time for many years) the Fantasia for Piano, Orchestra and Chorus. As this chorus contains the first hint of the Ninth Symphony, it may be expected that the Handel and Haydn Society will perform that great work, for their share of the Beethoven week, on the Saturday or Sunday evening following; and, to make the Festival complete, that all our classical Societies and Clubs,—the Quintette Club, the Listemann Quartet, as well as several of our leading pianists—will each give a Beethoven Concert, at some hour of day or evening that week.

The Symphonies for the seven concerts before and after the birthday concert will represent Beethoven's great predecessors and followers in that line, in their historical order. Thus for the second concert, Haydn in C minor (first time); for the third, Mozart in C ("Jupiter"); then BEETHOVEN, No. 7, in A; after which Schubert (the great No. 9, in C,—and also, later, if the parts arrive in time, another in C, arranged by Joachim from the Grand Duo, op. 140, which is so symphonic in ideas and plan), Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Gade (a new one, No. 3, in A minor).

Other choice selections (many for the first time) have been made from the orchestral works of Bach, Gluck, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Gade, Rietz, Liszt, Wagner, Rossini, Raff, Grimm, Volkmann, &c.;—from Concertos and Solos by Bach, Viotti, Spohr, Moscheles, Chopin, &c.; besides some vocal pieces. It would be premature as yet to enter into more particulars. The Orchestra will be, as before, under the direction of Mr. CARL ZERRAÏN, with Mr. B. LISTEMANN for leading violin.—The time for the sale of season tickets (not before the middle of October) will be duly announced.

The Swedish singer, CHRISTINE NILSSON, brightest star that has risen on Europe since the Lind, they say, and now in the ascendant, will soon be in this country. Her concert troupe, conveyed by Maurice Strakosch, includes Vieuxtemps, the famous violinist; Miss Anna Cary, our Boston contralto, who has sung for a year or two past with much success in opera in Europe; Fri. Canissa; a new baritone, Verger by name; and well-known Brignoli for tenor, who has been losing neither flesh nor voice. Their first Boston concerts will be given in the Music Hall on the 21st, 22d and 25th of October.

It is understood that the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY are making arrangements to give three or four Oratorios with Mlle. NILSSON in November, about Thanksgiving time. What Oratorios, it is not yet decided, though there can be little doubt that among them will be "Elijah" and "Judas Maccabæus."—Of course the old society will give the "Messiah" and something else at Christmas time; and then they will be preparing for their great Triennial Festival, which comes round next May. What noble new tasks this involves, we have not learned. The government had set their hearts strongly upon "Israel in Egypt;" which resolution, we trust, will remain firm, so that at last we may hear the whole of this great oratorio worthily presented. With all this extra work, we suppose we must be resigned to the postponement of the noblest plan of all, the bringing out of Bach's St. Matthew Passion, for still another year. But we would ask if it be not practicable, as well as in every way desirable, that one part of one of the Festival concerts should be devoted to a judicious series of selections from the Passion music,—say, just the selections which were studied last winter, and which interested most of the singers very deeply, to wit:—the opening chorus, perhaps; the chorus with tenor solo: "O grief," and "I'll watch with my dear Jesu alway;" the thunder and lightning chorus, and by all means the concluding chorus; by all means, also, several of the unspeakably beautiful Chorales;—these, interspersed with two or three of the fine solo Aïrs, and scenes of wonderfully expressive Recitative. Think of it, brethren, and think seriously.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club; the Listemann Quartette; the pianists: Perabo, Leonhard, Lang, (who is on his way home), Parker, Miss Mehlig too, no doubt,—will all be giving concerts singly or in combination; and the Vocal Clubs (Parker's, Cecilia, Orpheus), will be heard from. But neither their plans, nor those of the operatic raids, are yet sufficiently mature to be announced.

DEATH OF THE MANAGER OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE. Not a few musical Americans, who have been in London, have pleasant recollections of Mr. Bowley. The Orchestra, of Aug. 27, just received, contains the following sad intelligence:

Our readers will hear with regret of the sudden and accidental death of Mr. Bowley, the well-known indefatigable manager of the Crystal Palace, and treasurer of the Sacred Harmonic Society. He fell into the water from the deck of one of the river steamers, near Greenwich, yesterday afternoon; and although he was quickly extricated by Inspector Goode, of the Thames Police, and taken to the shore, life was extinct, notwithstanding all possible restoratives were applied.

We find this in the London Musical World:

The sketch of Michael Kelly, who knew Mozart—says Deight's Journal of Music—strangely omits to mention that very interesting book of Reminiscences, published in his latter days, and even reprinted in this country many years ago. Copies are rare, but it is well worth reading. [A reprint of this interesting book will shortly be commenced in the Musical World.—Ed.]

WAR NOTES. A correspondent writes from Munich: "We have just had the last performance of the Ammergau Passion Play. The Christus has had to join the artillery; he had an interview with the king to beg to be allowed to retain his long hair, so that, when the war was over, he might be able to resume his part. The request was granted."—The representative of Peter, also, is in a light-horse regiment; instead of the car of Malchus, he may now hew off a score of ears from Frenchmen, says a German paper.

Of the Berlin theatres the only one which successfully struggles against the depression produced by war, which has closed most of the others, is the Friedrich-Wilhelmsstädtische Theatre. And this flourishes by reason of the traitor Offenbach's "Kakadu,"—that Offenbach who has renounced his country and written a "Hymn to the Emperor." And patriotic Prussia supports him!

Owing to the war in Germany, Dr. Hiller has been unable to conduct the rehearsals of his cantata for the Birmingham Festival, and they have in consequence been taken by Sir Michael Costa.

The amateurs interested in the Beethoven Festival, which are to be given in Germany may be glad to learn that the war will not prevent the performance.

cos from taking place at the various cities recently specified, namely, Vienna, Berlin, and Bonn.

We hear from Vienna of the death of Gustav Vogt, well known as an oboe player, at ninety years of age. He was a bandsman in the Imperial Guard at the battle of Austerlitz.

We translate from Le Menestrel, July 31.—At a concert in the Champs-Élysées, M. Basselievre anticipates events; he has performed, alternately with the Marseillaise, a triumphal march entitled: Entrée à Berlin.

—Here is the patriotic programme every evening of the Alcazar d'été in the Champs Élysées: "La Marseillaise," "Le Rhin Allemand," "Les Girondins," "Le Reveil du Lion," "Les Prussiens," "A nous le Rhin," "La Française," "Nos Ennemis," "Le Bataillon de la Moselle," "A la Frontière," "Vive la France," and "La Garde Mobile." Needless to say that all these French songs are received with acclamation every night, though drowned in floods of German beer!

It is stated that during the past musical season in Paris more than three hundred concerts were given, exclusive of those of the Conservatoire, the Sunday Popular Concerts, the choral societies, matinées, &c.

Two Suggestions.

(From the Philadelphia Morning Post.)

In an excellent article upon "Music as a Means of Culture," published in the September Atlantic, the author, John S. Dwight, who has not yet received all the credit due him for his unceasing, intelligent labor in the interests of music, touches upon several points worthy of more extended notice and attention than is possible in newspaper limits. One of his suggestions, that Beethoven and Emerson dawned upon New England at the same time, and that the transcendentalists were very influential in the recognition of the true mission of music, not only furnishes data in the æsthetic history of the country, but gives opportunity of doing justice to one or two writers who are passed over in musical history, but who had a strong contemporaneous influence. We would hardly rank Emerson among musical pioneers, for his feeling toward it is not active. He appreciates it as he does everything that is beautiful, and recognizes its utility, but it is not a necessity with him, and certainly has had very little share in shaping his life or works. But he deserves this credit: he put his whole strength into the task of opening the gates to all forms of liberal art and thought, and music owes much of her freedom to his power. But when we count up the names of those who were really active in the cause, we think, among the first, of Margaret Fuller. She had for weapons talents as a writer and a musical soul. Her art education was necessarily defective, as she grew up in a land where music was known only as a part of church service, and where it rarely went above "Dundee," an arrangement from a Gregorian chant, or a slow opera air. She had access to very limited musical libraries, and Bombet, and a few authors of his class, made up her sources of information. But she had so kindred a spirit that she interpreted the meaning of their lives and works as no American had done before, and few since, and the one paper on the "Lives of the Great Composers" is still suggestive and useful. It is impossible to overrate the importance of the musical author to the art and to society. He stands between the two as a priest between the oracle and the worshippers, and understanding the utterance of the one and the ignorance of the other, brings the first into a more intelligible form and the other into a more intelligent appreciation. It is a profession that needs not only special natural qualifications, but also a special education. Margaret Fuller had the one, not the other; but by the force of genius she worked herself into a position of both power and usefulness, and ought to receive credit for it.

Another topic which Mr. Dwight touches only too slightly upon, ought to be more frequently dwelt upon by the critics of the daily press who have a conscientious regard for a right progress in music. (We say the daily press, for it is only through it that the public can be reached; art journals have too limited a circle of readers.) And this relates to the order of programmes. If we concede that music is something more than a sensuous expression, that it addresses itself to the intellect as well as to the ear, we will see that it is necessary to have some regard to congruity and harmony in the programme; but even for the ears' sake it is improper to open with Beethoven's septet and close with a potpourri from "Stradella."

This pretty little opera is good enough in its way, but its pale pink fades when contrasted with the vivid crimson of Beethoven's music. There are two rules that are, however, strictly observed by concert-givers; one, that the instruments must alternate; the other, that the heaviest music must open or close the performance. The spirit of the compositions is very rarely taken into account; and if the pianist plays Chopin and the vocalist sings Schumann, the violinist will probably play them a Shoo-fly tremolo, or something as elevating, and is applauded by the crowd, while the Schumann solo falls flat, and reasonably enough, for the train of feeling has been diverted, for shoo-fly melodies are hardly fit to prepare the mind for Schumann or his peers. But that audiences have souls, concert-givers rarely consider; they like them to have pockets, and to bring their hands and feet with them. Their hearts and heads are secondary considerations. But ask a conductor why he gives his most important, perhaps his most delicate work first, and he will tell you that the performers and audience are more fresh. This is nonsense. No programme should contain the element of weariness to such an extent, and we all know we warm up to music as it progresses. No one can listen or play properly when a crowd is coming in or going out, and this should be remembered in making up programmes. The great fault, however, is in the slovenly, thoughtless way in which musicians try to please everybody, and loading their programmes with all sorts of incongruous selections ruin the whole effect, prevent the appreciation of the separate performances, and are at last as successful in suiting every one as the man and his son who tried to manage their donkey so as to please the crowd.

Dr. Hiller's Nala and Damayanti.*

The poem, Nala and Damayanti, is founded on a Hindy poem of great antiquity—the Nala, which is itself only one of the episodes of the Mahabharata. The two great epic poems of Ancient India, the Mahabharata, and the Ramayana, bear something like the same relation to Hindu literature, with respect to national importance, as the Iliad and the Odyssey to the literature of Ancient Greece. The Mahabharata is an aggregate of epic poems founded on popular legends. Though impossible to fix the date, it may be mentioned that the compiler is said to have been Vyasa, who lived about 500 years before Homer.

The episode of Nala occurs in the Mahabharata as incidental. A holy Brahmin, to restore hope to a fallen prince, ruined by gambling, relates to him the history of the Raja, Nala, who, in older times, had, like him, lost everything at two games at dice, and nevertheless had not sunk into despair. This episode is the subject of the third of eighteen cantos, or parvas, of the Mahabharata. King Bhima has a fair daughter, Damayanti. Nala hears praises of Damayanti, and the Princess like praises of Nala. Though at a distance, they fall desperately in love, and miraculous swans convey tidings of fondness. The king desires to marry his daughter, there is a competition of princes for her hand, but Damayanti will not accept any one but Nala. Nala appears at last in person, but has a message to deliver from the gods, who have bound him to declare to Damayanti that she must choose one of the immortals. Fortunately the gods do not insist. The marriage takes place, and Nala conducts his wife to the kingdom of Nishadha. Misfortune comes. The god Kali, jealous of Nala, induces him to play at dice with his brother, and Nala loses all—wealth, chariots, robes, kingdom and wife. Nala flies to a wild forest: his wife will not forsake him, but he cannot bear the idea of dragging her into his misfortune. He flies again from her. Damayanti wanders in search of him; each encounters dangers and sufferings, racked by the thought of the possible fate of the beloved one. The constant lovers, wife and husband, at last succeed in finding each other, and, by a fortunate occurrence, Nala wins again his treasures and his kingdom, and lives happily with Damayanti.

The subject of the dramatic cantata, set to music by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, is the earlier part of the story of the loves of Nala and Damayanti. It comprises the desolation of the princess, dreaming of her unseen lover; the ceremony, ordained by King Bhima, of disposing of her hand by choice among royal suitors; the communication of the behest of the gods to Nala; Nala's despair; his appearance on the scene of competition at the climax of Damayanti's anxiety, only to give his stern message; Damayanti's refusal and choice; the appearance of the gods, offering her immortality, and their retirement before the unflinching resolve of the Princess; the cantata concluding with the union of Nala and Damayanti.

*To be performed at the approaching Birmingham Festival.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

At Ten o'clock To-morrow. 4. Eb to g. Lyle. 35

"There are lilies in bloom in the valley to-day,
Where the sun leaves a golden trace;
But the light my spirits and life obey
Is the sunshine of thy face.
The springtime is breathing a soft farewell,
And summer its wealth will borrow:
Then good bye love, we'll meet in the dell,
At ten o'clock to-morrow."

The Vivandiere. Song and dance. 3. A to c sharp. Maas. 30

Suggested by the spirit of the times in Europe.

"You see I am a Vivandiere,
The pet of the whole Brigade,
The men salute me as I pass,
When they are on parade."

The Ball. 5. G minor to g. Peruzzi. 40

Another of the charming Nilsson airs. Beginning with a gay 'Tra-la-la,' in G minor, it suddenly changes to E major with a delightful effect.

Sweet is the Dream. (Guarda che Bianca Luna).

Duett. 4. C to f. Campana. 40

An improved adaptation of English words, in an easy key, of this beautiful duett.

Land of the Swallows. Duett. 4. Bb to g. Masimi. 40

A splendid two-part song with English and German words.

Instrumental.

Original Polka. 3. D. Busenius. 30

A decidedly interesting Polka. This composer always succeeds in striking the popular vein.

Lucile. Mazurka Sentimental. 4. Eb. Frey. 40

A graceful composition in very pleasing style.

Rondino. Caprice. (Récitations Caractéristiques). 3. G. Op. 118. Leybach. 40

A graceful and easy theme, particularly facile for the left hand.

Dreaming of Home. 3. Eb. Op. 23. Wilson. 50

A quiet andante theme, turning memory back on the dreamy past. This American composer is quite happy in all his arrangements for the piano.

La Danse des Nautades. Caprice. 4. Bb. Op. 118. Leybach. 60

A delicate allegretto movement in 5-8 time, not difficult to execute and very pleasing, both to the performer and hearer.

Music a Means of Culture.

BY J. S. DWIGHT.

Our point is simply: The great music has been so much followed and admired here, not by reason of any great musical knowledge in said followers, not because we have any technical musicianship or proper musicality, but purely because the music was great, deep, true, making itself felt as such; we love the music for the great life that is in it. Let the emphasis fall on the word great,—great music,—if you still find it hard to credit our capacity of pleasure in mere music pure and simple.

From such beginnings, by degrees, and for a long time through the medium of very poor means of performance,—which only confirms our theory, that it was some inkling of the divine ideas, the life within the symphony, that first caught the imagination of listeners not very musical, it might be,—there grew up here a pretty deep and general love of noble music; until, at length, for better or for worse (we think for better), music occupies this people's time and thought quite largely, yet not so largely as it will and must do. What may be called a "musical movement" is making headway. Much froth about it, no doubt, there is; much vainglory, splurge, and sounding advertisement; too much passion for excitement, for the extraordinary, for "big things." Our great choral societies, for example, may shrink from the real great work, from the sincere, quiet, outwardly unrewarding tasks, which build up the artistic character, which are the true tests of sufficiency in art, in favor of the easier enterprise that carries with it more eclat and advertisement. They may postpone solid everyday excellence to exhibition splendors, festivals, and jubilees on some unprecedented scale. But all this implies a genuine heart-life in music somewhere. Where there is smoke there must be fire. Fuss and feathers make the greater show and catch the vulgar; but it is because heroes have been and will be again when God and a great crisis call. Do not charge all the egotism and vanity of musical artists, their catering to low tastes by cheap display, their grandiloquent announcements, their jealousies of one another, to music, or even wholly to themselves. It is the speculating, sordid, money-getting fever of the whole world around them that does the mischief, sets the singers at loggerheads, lowers the standard of composers and performers, and tempts the artist soul to sell its birthright and become a travelling thaumaturgic virtuoso. Music would make all this better, could she become ten times the public mistress that she is.

So much by way of introduction to the real purpose of this paper, which is to show THE WORTH OF MUSIC TO THIS PEOPLE AS A MEANS OF CULTURE.

But for the present we confine ourselves to culture in a general sense, too well foreseeing that it will require a special paper to exhibit music as a type of law, a revelation in its way of the divine organic movement through all spheres of matter and of mind, hence as a means of Intellectual Culture; and still another, to deduce from this the right of music to be regarded as a Universal Language, and therefore as the native language, pure and perfect, of what in man is universal and most human, The Religious Sentiment.

Music must become a great part of our common, we may say our atmospheric education. It has already gone too far for us to doubt it. Let its importance but begin to be appreciated, and the next Peabody will feel his way to general gratitude by liberal endowment of an art of vital interest to millions, where only tens of hundreds can know how to care for some of the learned branches for which professorships are founded. Money will yet be poured out freely for true colleges of music, as it has been for those of literature and science. Is it not worth as much fostering as a boat-race, international or other?

1. Consider, first, the simplest, prima facie claim of music; consider its civilizing agency, so far as it may become part of the popular, the public education.

We, as a democratic people, a great mixed people of all races, overrunning a vast continent, need music even more than others. We need some ever-present, ever-welcome influence that shall insensibly tone down our self-asserting and aggressive manners, round off the sharp, offensive angularity of character, subdue and harmonize the free and ceaseless conflict of opinions, warm out the genial individual humanity of each and every unit of society, lest he become a mere member of a party, or a slave of business or fashion. This rampant liberty will rush to its own ruin, unless there shall be found some gentler, harmonizing, humanizing culture, such as may pervade whole masses with a fine enthusiasm, a sweet sense of reverence for something far above us, beautiful and pure, awakening some ideality in every soul, and often lifting us out of the hard, hopeless prose of daily life. We need this beautiful corrective of our crudities. Our radicalism will pull itself up by the roots, if it do not cultivate the instinct of reverence. The first impulse of freedom is centrifugal, to fly off the handle, unless it be restrained by a no less free, impassioned love of order. We need to be so enamored of the divine idea of unity, that that alone,—the enriching of that,—shall be the real motive for assertion of our individuality. What shall so temper and tone down our "fierce democracy?" It must be something better, lovelier, more congenial to human nature than mere stern prohibition, cold Puritanic "Thou shalt not!" What can so quickly magnetize a people into this harmonic mood as music? Have we not seen it, felt it?

The hard-working, jaded millions need expansion, need the rejuvenating, the ennobling experience of JOY. Their toil, their church and creed, perhaps, their party livery, and very vote, are narrowing; they need to taste, to breathe a larger, freer life. Has it not come to thousands while they have listened to or joined their voices in some thrilling chorus that made the heavens seem to open and come down? The governments of the Old World do much to make the people cheerful and contented; here it is all laissez faire, each for himself, in an ever-keener strife of competition. We must look very much to music to do this good work for us; we are open to that appeal; we can forget ourselves in that; we blend in joyous fellowship when we can sing together; perhaps quite as much so when we can listen together to a noble orchestra of instruments interpreting the highest inspirations of a master. The higher and purer the character and kind of music, the more of real genius there is in it, the deeper will this influence be.

Judge of what can be done by what already within our own experience has been done and daily is done. Think what the children in our schools are getting through the little that they learn of vocal music,—elasticity of spirit, joy in harmonious co-operation, in the blending of each happy life in others; a rhythmical instinct of order and of measure in all movement; and a quickening of the ear and sense, whereby they will grow up susceptible to music as well as with some use of their own voices, so that they may take part in it; for from these spacious nurseries (loveliest flower-gardens, apple-orchards in full bloom, say, on their annual fête days) shall our future choirs and oratorio choruses be replenished with good, sound material.
